3. In short, my Association recognizes that one of the chief difficulties with which the Commission will be faced will be the demand that all members of the Services should be brought under the unfettered control of the Local Government. Even now, although the Secretary of State still retains ultimate control of the All-India Services, it is the authority in India which passes judgment on the work of the members of the Services and in most respects exercises de facto control over their destinies. It is inevitable that, as political consciousness develops in India, this authority should become more and more sensitive to political pressure. My Association recognizes that a safeguard has been provided in paragraph 7 (4) of the Instrument of Instructions to Governors promulgated under the Government of India Act, but there is a further responsibility imposed upon the Governor for the proper working of the constitution. The conflict between these two responsibilities may at any time nullify the protection which the Governor can afford to the Services, for when the interests of the Services appear to be opposed to those of an elected Ministry it is inevitable that the Governor should be influenced in his decision by the exigencies of the political situation. The further control exercised by the Secretary of State will, and must, be confined to major issues only. It cannot be invoked on every-day questions of internal administration, and must therefore inevitably have no practical effect in a number of matters which go to make up the sum total of the conditions of Service. Moreover, the entire body of political opinion in India is opposed to the continuance of the Secretary of State's control, and even if this control is continued, its operation must become more and more infrequent. The best solution appears to lie in the development of the powers and functions of a Public Service Commission entirely independent of political pressure on the models which exist in England, Australia and elsewhere; and although this may not be agreeable at present to Indian political opinion, there is no reason why it should not ultimately be accepted.

4. It is relevant at this stage to observe that while the Reforms have introduced an element of insecurity in the conditions of services of British officials, the need for those services has been accentuated. "The contentment of the Indian masses" has been disturbed and there is less respect for authority than formerly. The communal question, though not so urgent in this Province as in some parts of India, emphasises the necessity for an impartial Executive; and impartiality can only be secured at present by the inclusion of a substantial proportion of British officials. Conditions of service must therefore be such as will attract and retain those officials.

5. The first point which my Association wishes to urge is the necessity for the continuance and extension of the right to retire on adequate terms in the event of conditions of service becoming unbearable. If it be admitted, as it must be, that no accurate forecast can be made of future conditions in India, recruitment of suitable candidates in England is not likely to be secured, unless the right to retire on adequate terms is conceded; and after service in India has been undertaken this right will go a long way to secure equitable treatment to an officer whose services are of value to India. The rules under which officials recruited overseas can retire at present are defective for the following reasons:—

(1) There is no guarantee that the scheme will be continued after effect has been given to the next instalment of Reforms.

(2) The scheme is not applicable to Officers recruited after the 1st January, 1919, or to certain Specialist Officers and Officers not entitled to pension.

(3) The terms on which retirement is permitted include no compensation for loss of career.

My Association is informed that the terms on which Egyptian Civil Servants were permitted to retire included a substantial cash bonus intended to compensate these officers for the difficulty of obtaining suitable employment at a late stage in their career. This difficulty is equally real in the case of the British official who has spent his service in India.

6. The second point on which my Association desires to lay stress is the necessity for a guarantee by the British Parliament of pensionary and provident fund payments which at present are merely a charge on Indian revenues. The British official has to the best of his ability assisted the operation of the Reforms, but he is not responsible for them; it is not, therefore, equitable that any risks that have arisen from them should be shouldered by him. Possibilities of default or hardship arise from two factors; unwillingness and inability to accept past liabilities and the fact that a considerable depreciation of the rupee may at any time decrease the actual value of the savings credited in the various provident funds. It is true that the improved financial position of India removes any immediate fears of default through inability to pay or of depreciation, of the rupee. Many years, however, must elapse before this liability is fully discharged. The finances of Oriental nations are notoriously liable to dislocation and should the finances of India, divorced from British control, suffer this fate, it may well happen that obligations contracted many years previously under a different form of Government will not be honoured. The risk though seemingly remote, is a real one, and should not fall on the shoulders of the British official in India, but on the British Parliament with whom the responsibility for Constitutional progress in India rests.

7. My Association does not desire to comment at length on the other ways in which conditions of service have deteriorated or may deteriorate, but as an illustration of the problems which are causing anxiety, a copy of a circular questionnaire* issued by my Association to its members is appended as Appendix I to this Memorandum. The amenities of life of British officials in small and less important stations have greatly diminished; the absence of adequate provision for medical attendance by British doctors is causing grave anxiety; further, there is occasional difficulty in securing suitable housing accommodation caused by the improved standard of living of educated Indians—a difficulty which would be enhanced by any recrudescence of social or official boycott such as occurred during the days of active non-co-operation. These difficulties might be alleviated by such measures as the concentration of Europeans at the more important centres, and the introduction of a well thought-out scheme for medical attendance† by British doctors, but they are inherent in the position of a small number of Englishmen scattered over a large country; and the possibility exists that these very difficulties may be used as a means to victimize particular officers—a form of victimization against which it might be difficult for the Governor to afford adequate protection. As a last resort, therefore, it is necessary that an officer who finds the conditions of his service made intolerable for him should be given the option to retire on fair terms. The fact that an officer could retire on such terms would in itself secure him a large measure of protection against such victimization.

8. In conclusion, the essential points which my Association wishes to emphasise as necessary to the well-being of the Services are—

(1) The continuance of the right to retire on a proportionate pension to British officers at present so entitled, and the extension of that right to all those appointed by the Secretary of State and recruited after the 1st January, 1919;

(2) the inclusion in the terms of retirement of compensation for loss of career to the above officers, to those not entitled to pension and to Specialist officers;

(3) the concentration of British officers in stations where adequate medical attendance will be available for themselves and their families;

(4) the acceptance of responsibility by the British Government for all liabilities towards the Services.

* Not enclosed.

† Note.—In this connection it is observed that in the scheme recently announced, the number of civil posts in the Indian Medical Service has been reduced so considerably that it is apprehended that the result will be to deprive the Service of its attractions on the civil side. Further grounds for criticism of the new scheme are that while seven Civil Surgeoncies in this Province are reserved for the Indian Medical Service, the post of the Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals, the head of the department, is not so reserved. This latter fact in itself will deter most officers in the Service from electing for civil employment. In these circumstances, it is feared that the scheme will fail of its purpose and British Medical Officers required will not be forthcoming; meanwhile the number of British Medical Officers in this Province has decreased to a disquieting extent and most of those left are senior officers, who will retire in the course of a year or two.

Note prepared by the United Provinces Association of European Government Servants for the All-India Association of European Government Servants on the Memorandum to be submitted to the Statutory Commission.

My Council has considered the preliminary Memorandum submitted by the Bengal Association. It does not entirely agree with the statement made in paragraph 5 thereof that if no changes are made there is nothing to discuss. One point, at least, my Association considers should be brought prominently to notice, namely, that the right to retire on proportionate pension should not be done away with when it is known what action is to be taken on the Report of the Statutory Commission, even though no further changes are made. Further, in paragraph 11 (4) of the Bengal Association Memorandum it is desirable to note that in the case of the officers referred to therein the right to retire on proportionate pension should be continued indefinitely. In other respects my Council is in general agreement with the Bengal Association's preliminary Memorandum.

2. My Association considers that stress should be laid on the changes that have already taken place in consequence of the passing of the Government of India Act, 1919, on the conditions of service of European Government Servants in India. Europeans who were in service previous to the enforcement of that Act joined service on the understanding that the Secretary of State, the Viceroy, the Governors and the Lieutenant-Governors of Provinces were their masters and owned a single allegiance to the Crown. In the case of the transferred services the authority vested in the Local Government over officers employed in a Governor's province is now exercised in the case of officers serving in a department dealing with transferred subjects by the Governor acting with the Minister in charge of the department. (Vide Part I, Rule 10 of the Devolution Rules under the Government of India Act).* This constitutes a very definite change of master for all European Government servants employed in transferred departments, a change which has had marked effects. Further, in the Governor's Instrument of Instructions it is expressly laid down "that in considering the minister's advice and deciding whether or not there is sufficient cause in any case to dissent from his opinion, you shall have due regard to his relations with the Legislative Council." The Governor acting with his minister is thus influenced by considerations other than those of justice to the Government servants employed in the department and the efficiency of the work of the department in a way in which a Governor or Lieutenant-Governor was not previously influenced.

3. The minister is, it is true, appointed by the Governor under Section 52(1) of the Government of India Act and holds office during his pleasure, but no minister can in practice hold office for any considerable period unless he can command adequate support in the Legislative Council. Consequently the choice of ministers is limited by the composition of the Council, and a Governor is not free to choose the man who would make the best administrator. The Governor cannot change a minister easily. He has to consider, in dealing with officers of transferred departments, whether any action proposed by a minister which the Governor himself would not take singly is of such importance as to justify his differing from the minister—a difference of opinion which, if insisted on, might lead, if not to the resignation of the minister, at least to inharmonious working between the Governor and his minister. A Governor interested in the passing of an important Tenancy Bill, in securing adequate provision in the Budget for some necessary object, or in defeating a troublesome resolution, is not likely to quarrel with a minister over an appointment to a selection grade, a promotion to the post of Superintending Engineer or a transfer to headquarters of an officer favoured by the minister. Political loyalty to his minister is a phrase which has been used to express the obligation a Governor acknowledges to a minister whose support in the Council is required. In consequence the power of the minister over the officers is great and that power is liable to be influenced by political considerations, by Council speeches and discussions, by the need for placating this individual or that section of the Council, by articles in the newspapers, often uninformed and ill-founded, and by racial considerations.

4. In the case of departments dealing with reserved subjects the Governor in Council exercises authority over the officers of the public services. In the United Provinces the members of the Council are the Home Member (Vice-President) and the Finance Member. The Home Member appointed by His Majesty by warrant under the Royal Sign Manual (vide Section 47(1) of the Government of India Act) is not so liable to political influence as a minister, but even to him and to the Finance Member, dependent as they are on the Legislative Council for votes in matters of finance and administration, political considerations are important.

5. The effect of the Government of India Act on all European Government Servants working under Local Governments in India has in short been that the political situation has frequently influenced adversely the conditions of their service. It has resulted in an almost complete change of master for the Government servant. Many officers have in consequence retired on proportionate pensions; many more, particularly men with families, would have gone had they not been deterred by the difficulty of securing a career elsewhere in a short space of time and the consequent hardship to which their families would be subjected.

6. The European Government servant's master has been changed without his previous consent. This point did not escape Parliament or the Secretary of State when the Reforms were introduced and measures have been passed in the Act and the Rules made thereunder to make the change acceptable. They are (i) salaries and pensions of persons appointed by or with the approval of His Majesty or by the Secretary of State in Council shall not be submitted to the vote of the Legislative Assembly (vide Section 67 A of the Government of India Act, 1919) nor to the vote of the Legislative Council (vide Section 72 D of the Act); (ii) No officer may be dismissed by any authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed and the Secretary of State in Council may (except so far as he may provide by rules to the contrary) reinstate in that service an officer who has been dismissed (vide Section 96 B of the Act); (iii) An officer appointed by the Secretary of State has the right of appeal against wrongs to the Governor, from him to the Governor-General in Council and thereafter to the Secretary of State in Council (vide Section 96 B (1) of the Act and Rule XVII made under Section 96 B(2) of the Act); (iv) Every officer appointed before the commencement of the Act retains all existing and accruing rights or shall receive such compensation for the loss of any of them as the Secretary of State in Council may consider just and equitable (vide Section 96 B (2) of the Act); (v) The right to pensions and the scale and conditions of pensions of all persons in the Civil Service of the Crown in India appointed by the Secretary of State in Council is regulated in accordance with the rules in force at the time of the passing of the Act. Any variation or addition to the rules cannot adversely affect the pension of any member of the service appointed before the date thereof (vide Section 96 B (3) of the Act); (vi) A Public Service Commission has been appointed which the Governor-General in Council must consult in cases of appeals against punishment before passing any orders on an appeal to him or before forwarding an appeal to the Secretary of State. The Commission may be consulted by the Governor-General in Council in cases of memorials and by Governors or Chief Commissioners before orders of punishment are passed. The Commission is further required to advise when requested by the Governor-General in Council or a local Government on questions affecting the conditions of service of All-India, Central or Provincial services, and the Governor-General in Council must take the advice of the Commission on questions as to the extent to which officers of the All-India Services and Central Services, Class I, are affected by the abolition of any post or classes of posts; (vii) The Governor is required by his Instrument of Instructions "to safeguard all members of the services in the legitimate exercise of their functions and in the enjoyment of all recognized rights and privileges and to see that the Government order all things justly and reasonably in their regard;" (viii) Certain officers are permitted to retire prematurely on proportionate pension.

* Note.—Under Rule X of the rules regarding the Civil Services in India made by the Secretary of State in Council under Section 96B(2) of the Government of India Act, 1919, a local Government may, for good and sufficient reasons (1) censure, (2) reduce to a lower post, (3) withhold promotion from or (4) suspend from office any officer of an All-India Service.

7. The measures quoted in the preceding paragraph are in themselves but necessary and inevitable and no change that may be introduced should in any way weaken the protection they afford to European Government servants. The protection afforded by the Act of 1919 to European Government servants should be continued in any amendment or alteration of the Act of 1919; the protection afforded by the Rules made under the Act should be continued in subsequent or amended Rules.

8. The last of the measures of protection quoted in paragraph 6, viz., the right prematurely to retire on proportionate pension will only continue in force until the action proposed to be taken on the report of the Parliamentary Commission is known (vide Government of India, Home Department, Notification No. F-267, dated July 5th, 1922). My Council considers that, without the protection afforded by the right to retire prematurely on proportionate pension, a European Government servant is inadequately protected against adverse political influences. His pay and pension are indeed secure provided he is not reduced, refused promotion, or suspended. He retains all existing and accruing rights. He possesses a right of appeal in the last resort to the Secretary of State and the Governor is required to protect him. But still he is the servant of the Governor acting with his Council or Minister and may be unjustly reduced, refused promotion or suspended owing to political pressure; the exercise of the right of appeal is a long, slow and laborious business; the Governor's protection, as already shown, may be valueless; and his right to retain all existing and accruing rights is a vague and indefinite right, hard to define and to claim. The one protection under which he can take shelter without delay is that afforded by the right to retire on proportionate pension which the Secretary of State has granted in the Premature Retirement Rules made under Section 96 B (2) and (3) of the Act—(iv of the preceding paragraph). This right to retire on proportionate pension is the safeguard most valued by European members of the Services against unjust political influence. If it is taken away, an officer cannot resign from the service without loss of all right to pension and he will be liable to injustice against which the only remedy remaining will be the trying process of appeal.

9. While then none of the existing measures for the protection of the services should in any case be abrogated in consequence of the changes that may ensue on the report of the Statutory Commission, the right to retire on proportionate pension should be continued till the end of their service for all officers now in possession of that right, and should be granted to all officers who may be affected by those changes in a way similar to the officers to whom that right has been granted. In this connexion attention is invited to the orders of the Secretary of State in Council contained in letter No. F-462/27-Ests., dated New Delhi, March 26th, 1928. Under these orders an officer in a reserved service which may become a transferred service is given the option of retiring on proportionate pension, but this option is only open for one year. This suggests that in the opinion of the Secretary of State in Council the keeping of the option open for one year is sufficient. But, as already pointed out, one year is insufficient. An officer may, under existing conditions, go on contentedly for several years without meeting with any injustice or difficulty. He may then find himself under a new Minister with political or racial bias and be subjected to unjust treatment. His position depends on the personal equation of the Minister. Consequently if the right is restricted to one year, an officer will have at once to consider this possibility, and it is probable that many more officers will, as a result, avail themselves of the right, with consequent harm to the services, than if the right were continued indefinitely. Again if the right to retire is required to be exercised within one year, the proportionate pension earned under the existing rules is far from sufficient compensation for the disturbance and loss of career involved. No protection of the Services can be accepted as adequate by European members of the services, whether or not further changes in the conditions of their service are made, without the extension to the end of their service under Government of the right to retire on proportionate pension.

10. The rupee has now been stabilised at 1/6 (one shilling and sixpence). It is possible that this rate may again be altered. In the event of its being lowered, the necessary safeguard should be provided in the form of Exchange Compensation Allowance, which should be given on the whole of the rupee pay, on existing balances in the Provident Fund and on future subscriptions to the Provident Fund. To secure this, my Council urges that Exchange Compensation Allowance should be given on the whole of the rupee pay, less provident fund subscriptions; and that on retirement, or for the purpose of the payment of premia on insurances paid from the Provident Fund subscriptions, Government should convert the officer's holding in his Provident Fund or his remittances for payment of insurance premia into sterling at a rate not less than 1/6 to the rupee. Statutory protection on these lines against a fall of the rupee should be given in changes of the Act or Rules that may result as a consequence of the Report of the Statutory Commission.

CALCUTTA.
18th January, 1929.

PRESENT :

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE AND OF THE BENGAL PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the All-India Association of European Government Servants.

The deputation consisted of :—

Mr. C. J. IRWIN, I.C.S., Commissioner, Jubbulpore Division, Central Provinces, representing the superior civil servants on the reserved side.
Mr. A. T. WESTON, M.Inst.C.E., Officiating Director of Industries, Bengal, representing superior civil servants on the transferred side.
Mr. S. W. REDCLIFT, M.Inst.E.E., Senior Electrical Advisor to the Government of Bengal, representing European officers in posts equivalent to those in the superior civil services, but employed under contract by local Government with salary votable.

210. The Chairman : I understand, gentlemen, you are a deputation from the All-India Association of European Government Servants ?—(Mr. Irwin) Yes.

211. We all have your memorandum. My colleagues will observe that the document begins with a memorandum from the general body, the All-India body, but bound up with it are memoranda from the various branches in Bengal, Madras, Bombay the United Provinces, the Punjab, the Central Provinces, and Assam ?—Yes.

212. Let us be clear who you three gentlemen are. Mr. Irwin, you are Commissioner of the Jubbulpore division, and you will be mainly engaged on the reserved side ?—Yes, entirely.

213. I am a little surprised at your saying entirely. I would have supposed that on occasions, communications passed through you on the subject of local government ?—Yes.

214. And education ?—Yes.

215. And those are on the transferred side ?—Yes.

216. Mr. Weston, as officiating Director of Industries, your main work would be on the transferred side ?—(Mr. Weston) Wholly on the transferred side.

217. Though, of course, you are an All-India civil servant ?—Yes.

218. You, Mr. Redclift, as senior electrical adviser to the Government of Bengal, represent European officers in posts equivalent to those in the superior civil service, but employed under contract by local Government ?—(Mr. Redclift) Not only those, but all specialist officers.

219. To put the thing in another way, your salary is votable ?—Yes.

220. Whereas Mr. Irwin's and Mr. Weston's salaries are not voted ?—(Mr. Irwin) Yes.

221. That is a distinction one can understand. We have looked at your document, Mr. Irwin, but I should like you to pick out for me the main points to which you want to call our attention ?—In the first place, we do not know what is going to happen and we do not wish to offer any political views at all ; we come before the Commission merely in order to protect our own interests. To ensure the protection of our own interests, in paragraph 4 of our memorandum we have asked for the continuance of certain safeguards. Those safegards may be divided into safeguards ensuring security of tenure by the control of the Secretary of State, and financial safeguards. In paragraph 4 we have not only set out those safeguards, but we have indicated that we should expect compensation if those safeguards were removed. I should add that we have two precedents for the type of compensation for which we have asked : one is the Egyptian precedent, and the other (a very similar precedent) will be found in the report of the special Commission on the constitution of Ceylon. In paragraph 5 we have emphasised the financial position. We are instructed by our Association to bring before the Commission that there is a distinct anxiety as regards the security of pensions and similar payments, i.e., provident funds and family pension funds, in addition to pensions. The position at present is that as regards security generally, if we consider, when the change (if there is a change), is brought in that our tenure and our financial position will be insecure, some of us (that is to say, those in the All-India services) are entitled to go on proportionate pension. Quite a number of European officers is not entitled so to go. What we wish to ask for is that we should not be compelled to decide immediately on the report of the Commission.

222. If I remember rightly, the story about that is this, is not it ? When the Montford scheme was adopted, of course it was plainly right to recognise that All-India officers already in the service might consider that the fundamental conditions on which they had joined were being changed, and therefore they must be given an opportunity of withdrawing if they wished, notwithstanding that they had not finished their full length of service. There is a provision in the Act, the proviso to section 96 B, which says : " Provided that every person appointed " before the commencement of the Government of " India Act, 1919, by the Secretary of State in " Council to the civil service of the Crown in India " shall retain all his existing or accruing rights, or " shall receive such compensation for the loss of any " of them as the Secretary of State in Council may " consider just and equitable." Then I think some premature retirement rules were made, which enabled a gentleman in your position, or in that of Mr. Weston.——(Mr. Weston) That right has only recently been extended to me in a conditional form ; that is to say, being a specialist officer I may apply, but I have not been given the right. Neither have officers in the Central services that right.

223. Let us confine it to those to whom it did apply. They were in a schedule. One may say the All-India officer in the normal case had the right of saying, not only at once, but at any time down to the time indicated, whether he preferred to retire. The time indicated is " when the action to be taken " on the report of the Parliamentary Commission is " known." I understand you to say that supposing there are changes made in the constitution of British India now, the officers who have this right of retirement ought not to be required to decide instantly : is that the point ?—(Mr. Irwin) Yes. The present position is that the option shall continue in force and may be exercised until the action proposed to be taken on the report of the Commission is known, when the whole position will necessarily be reviewed. That is how the thing is put. The point that we wish to emphasise is that we have concluded, probably not unnaturally, that some change is inevitable, and we do not want to go at once, or until at all events we have had a considerable chance of assessing the value of that change and seeing how it affects us. In addition, however, to the changes brought about by whatever the Commission may report, there is a good deal of what I may call somewhat intangible change. The position of the services, as I have said, is regarded as insecure, and there is a good deal of anxiety about their future. They do not believe that their position is going to improve. The conditions of service in India are certainly not as attractive as they were, let us say, 24 years ago, when I joined. With the natural development which we must expect of political conditions in India, it is not likely that conditions of service will not fail, from our point of view, to deteriorate. I have dealt with our paragraph 7, which asks that the option to retire on proportionate pension should not lapse, and I should add that it should be extended. In our paragraph 10 we deal with European Government servants who are not protected by the safeguards we have gone into earlier in the memorandum.

224. I take it Mr. Redclift would be an example ?—He is a very good example. We have not dealt anywhere with the Central services, as you have probably observed. The position with regard to the Central services is this. At present those appointed by the Secretary of State have the safeguards which we have set out in paragraph 4. If any of those safeguards is to be removed, they should be allowed the privilege of the option to elect for premature retirement, plus compensation such as we have asked for.

225. That is not in your document, is it ?—No, it is not in our document, but we have been instructed to bring it to your notice by the All-India Association, the reason being that the conditions of service of European Government servants in the Central services are likely to change if there are any drastic changes elsewhere ; there will be a repercussion on the Central services. There are others in the Central services who are not appointed by the Secretary of State. The case is rather complicated ; circumstances vary very considerably, and it is very hard to generalise.

226. Take an instance that is suggested to me by Mr. Stewart, who, of course, has a special knowledge of this, because he was secretary to the Lee Commission. He was suggesting to me the services of the Central audit. The Central audit is not appointed by the Secretary of State ; it is appointed by the Government of India ?—That would be one. The Geological Survey was a department I was thinking of. It has both officers appointed by the Secretary of State and officers appointed by the High Commissioner on behalf of the Government of India. Well, for those officers who are not appointed by the Secretary of State we consider that they should be given the same benefits as those allowed to officers who were appointed by the Secretary of State if there is any change in the conditions of their service. They joined with the expectation that the British Government would see them through, just as the officers appointed by the Secretary of State, and we consider that if the conditions of their service are changed they should get the same benefits as officers appointed by the Secretary of State, and that the Secretary of State should enforce these benefits. At present the Central services have not got the privilege, as I have said, of premature retirement. Well, in their case the circumstance I have mentioned before applies. It is felt by a large number of officers that the general circumstances of service may change owing to changed conditions in other inter-related services. I do not wish to ascribe any bad motives to anybody in making this statement, but one of those circumstances undoubtedly is the progress of Indianisation. Well, that is as far as regards the Central services. You will see that in our paragraph 10 we have mentioned certain officers belonging to the Central services, and the classes we have mentioned there will show the Commission how conditions of service vary. Paragraph 10 is on page 58. With regard to specialists, what we really want is that paragraph 61 of the Lee Commission Report should be enforced in their regard. That paragraph, briefly, proposes to give specialists the same general position as has been given to the superior services. In many cases they have a reasonable claim to expect continuity of employment, or compensation if that employment is terminated. I should like to add there also, in connection with continuity of employment, that even officers with technical qualifications, after they have served under the conditions in India, find it very hard to obtain employment in their professions out of India. The fact of having worked a long time under Indian conditions in a great many ways unfits them to take up similar employment elsewhere.

229. * * * * —(Mr. Irwin) : I should add about that proviso* that the services are not at all satisfied with the interpretation which has been put on it. We have been told that it does not cover, for instance, the abolition of appointments to which we can be promoted. I can refer the Commission, if necessary, to the letter of the Secretary of State about that, but there has been a considerable amount of feeling among the services about the interpretation put on that proviso ; and in any future Act I think it would be desirable, if it could be done by re-drafting, to make that safeguard a good deal stronger.

230. May we just follow that, because I am all for doing something practical, or at least understanding it in a practical sense. The present proviso says that the officers covered by it shall retain all their existing or accruing rights, or shall receive compensation for the loss of them. Now, I gather that the view that has been taken is that existing or accruing rights, and compensation for the loss of them, is one thing ; but that the possibility that an officer might be promoted before the end of his time—that is to say, to a Governorship, or something of that sort—is not within the words existing or accruing rights ?—May I interrupt, sir ?

The Chairman : Yes, certainly.

The Witness (Mr. Irwin) : We were not thinking of Governships at all. We were thinking of ordinary posts on the cadre of the services, at the top.

231. Commissionerships ?—Commissionerships for example. That is the instance that is actually taken by the Secretary of State in his despatch on the subject. May I read you a passage from it showing that ?

232. I am very much interested in what you say. Let us suppose a man comes out ; he has finished his time at Oxford or Cambridge ; he has got through Indian Civil Service. It may be that he has done three or four years' service when the Act of 1919 comes into force. Then he reflects ; he is perfectly well in health, and so on ; and up to the present is doing satisfactorily ; but he comes to the conclusion that the career he had hoped to follow is no longer the career which he thought it was when he entered the service, because he hoped he would have been in due course promoted, and become, it may be, a commissioner under a system which is pre-Montagu. Do you say that in determining the compensation which he is entitled to under this section, if he decides to retire, as he is entitled to retire—— ?—No, I was not referring at that time to determining the compensation on retirement ; I was referring to the claim that we made that we should obtain compensation by the creation of what are known as selected posts in the place of posts which we considered we had a right to expect to be promoted to if those posts were abolished. There have been a large number of proposals to abolish commissionerships, the posts of superintending engineer, and so on ; that is to say, the posts at the top, the plums of the service that people expect to get to, when they can sit down and perhaps save a little money at the end of their service.

233. It is no use my saying " Oh, yes " if I do not follow it. I really do not. I can understand a man saying, " Well, I have thought it over, and I " am going to stick it out." That is the end of that. I can understand a man saying, " I have thought it " over, and I have decided to retire and get compensa- " tion." I can understand that. Are you now contemplating a man saying " I have thought it " over, and I am not going to retire, but though I " am not going to retire, if hereafter commissioner- " ships are to be abolished I ought to remain in the service, but to be compensated " ?—The point is that it is an attraction to remain in the service if you are going to be promoted, let us say to Rs.3,000 a month. If commissionerships are abolished, as has been proposed in more than one province, no officer in my service will ordinarily get more than that, whereas when he joined the service he always expected to get up to that pay.

234. I think we are doing something I had no intention of doing. I am not arguing the merits of it in the least; I only want to know what it is that you mean. Are you referring to the position of a man who decides not to retire, but in whose case the prospect of ultimately becoming a commissioner is rendered impossible because commissionerships are abolished ?—Yes. * * *

235. * * * You said that a particular construction or application of this thing was not satisfactory to some people. I want to know whether the unsatisfactory case is a case where the man has retired ?—No.

236. Or whether it is a case where he stops on ?—Yes, it is the case where he stops on.

237. Then if he stays on, why should he have compensation ?—Not compensation, but another post should be added to the cadre, or that one of the posts, let us say, of deputy commissioner in the case of my service, should be given the pay that he would have expected to get if he had been commissioner.

238. Lord Burnham : As I understand, the witness is speaking of the expectancy of office of a man who made a miscalculation. He may have allowed, I understand, for the fact that Indians were being brought into the service in a larger proportion, and that that would absorb a larger number of the posts of special responsibility, but he did not allow for the vagaries of the legislative council in abolishing some of these, or causing some of these posts to be abolished. He made a miscalculation in his expectancy of promotion : is not that so ?—You can put it that way if you like.

Lord Burnham : I am not putting it at all in a hostile sense.

The Chairman : Nor I.

Lord Burnham : I am thinking of the man who, wishing to do good service to India, decided to remain on, knowing that there would be a decreasing number of posts to which he might aspire, but then, in addition to that, some of these posts, half of them or 25 per cent., are done away with. I have known cases in the civil service at Home in which that was considered in regard to civil service terms.

239. The Chairman : What I find it difficult to follow is the remedy which this deputation propose. I gather it takes the form of awarding the gentlemen in question an increased salary ?—It is not one of the things we are asking for in the memorandum, and perhaps I ought not to have raised it at this juncture; but it has been asked for, and as you mentioned this proviso I thought I had better say there was this feeling in the service about it—that they were being deprived of accruing rights.

240. Lord Burnham : Shortly, what you are asking for is the continuation of the right to retire on proportionate pension; you do not ask for increase of salary for the time being, but that the right to retire given you under the Montagu settlement should be extended for a further period ?—That is the main thing.

Mr. Irwin : I should like to draw the attention of the Conference to paragraph 11. I should like to mention the fact that there are considerably fewer officers now than there were after the original introduction of the Reforms who have any desire to leave India, but we have got to protect our own interests. Numbers of us have families to consider, and that is why we come before the Commission. But we do not want to go. One of our constituent Associations has pointed out that it is quite possible that in consequence of changed conditions a considerable amount of thought will have to be given to the position of the services, and they suggest that that will require a separate inquiry on the lines of that made by the Lee Commission. I have been asked to put that before the Conference.

242. The Chairman : I think those are the main things. We are all very much obliged to you, Mr. Irwin. Looking at page 57 of your document, I see your Association is speaking on behalf of something like 1,320 officers, most of them members of the superior civil services; but you say " Officers " of the Police and the Indian Medical Service and " other officers of the Army in Civil employ are " precluded by the orders of Government from " joining the Association " ?—Yes.

243. But taking the range which your Association might cover, does it in fact include in its membership the great majority of the officers ?—Yes. If you will look at the other memoranda you will see that of the officers eligible by our rules (that is, officers appointed by His Majesty or by the Secretary of State), in the Central Provinces we have 93 per cent. in the Punjab (I do not know how it is worked out; I have endeavoured to ascertain, but it is difficult to know on what they base their figures of eligibility) it is only 65 per cent. in Madras, 95 per cent. of the All-India services. In the other provinces it is probably not so high; I have not been able to get the exact figures, but if the Commission is interested we can procure them. We can assure the Commission, I think, that of the people eligible we contain the majority. I should add that, of course, a number of high officials are excluded by the nature of their office; for instance, the Chief Secretary of a province is usually excluded.

244. Yes. I will just add one thing. I see, looking at the report of the Lee Commission, that paragraph 83, dealing with the safeguarding of pensions contains a passage which I think is of some value to your Association, and therefore I should like to read it. They refer there to the apprehensions of the services, that they express grave concern at the prospect of future constitutional development, and so on, and they say, " We do not share this " apprehension under existing circumstances, and " we assume that if any constitutional change is " made hereafter involving the transfer of the " financial control in this regard now exercised by " the Secretary of State in Council, adequate pro- " vision will at the same time be made for safe- " guarding service pensions." That seems to me a quotation of some usefulness to you ?—Yes; that is exactly what we are asking for.

245. Lord Burnham : I am not quite clear as to the terms of service. Is it the case that no civil servant, whether All-India or Central, can retire without permission from the authority under which he serves—before, I mean, he is fully qualified for his pension ?—Yes, he can apply to retire and go.

246. The Chairman points out to me he has a right if he has been appointed by the Secretary of State under the terms of the Statute, but if that right were extended, would it be subject to the permission of the authority under which he serves ?—Do you mean under the premature retirement rules ?

247. Yes ?—Under the premature retirement rules, so far as I know, he can demand to retire.

248. My point is this. If it is a question of extending the right to retire on proportionate pension on a big scale, it might of course, make things very difficult for a period of time for the Government of India, and I want to know whether you contemplate making all applications for the right to retire on proportionate pension on account of discontent with further changes dependent on the permission of the authority ?—No, we do not.

249. You mean it to be an absolute right, that a man may say " At the end of six months or a year " I am going " ?—" As soon as it is convenient to " you."

250. That is the point ?—I mean, that would merely be a matter of a few months. One would not necessarily throw in one's hand at less than a month or two's notice. I will read you the rule, if you would like to get it absolutely accurate. The rule on that subject (rule 5) is as follows : " Applica- " tions when received by local Governments will be " forwarded with their recommendations to the " Governor-General in Council and will be trans- " mitted by him to the Secretary of State, whose " orders will be required before any officer is finally " adjudged entitled to the new concessions. The " Secretary of State in Council reserves to himself " the right to postpone the acceptance of the " resignation of officers until suitable arrangements " can be made for their replacement. Officers who " are not allowed for this reason to retire immedi- " ately will be permitted to retire as soon as the " exigencies of the service to which they belong " permit."

251. That was exactly my point. I wanted to know whether you intended that condition to apply to the application you are making to extend the right to proportionate pension ?—Yes, provided the last portion is reasonably interpreted. It could not mean that we should be compelled to serve another five years.

252. You can hardly fetter the Secretary of State by the provision that he must interpret his duties in a reasonable spirit ; that you must assume ?—Yes.

253. I asked the question because there was a fear, when the so-called Reforms were carried through, that there would be a wholesale disappearance of the civil service, which, happily, did not eventuate. What increase in the proportion of the services entitled to proportionate pension would your proposals involve ? Have you calculated that ?—We have not worked that out. (Mr. Weston) You cannot know how many will exercise their option.

254. No, but what percentage of public servants here would get the additional right to retire on proportionate pension under your proposals, as compared with those who had it before ?—(Mr. Irwin) It would mean working out figures from the combined civil list, and that would take time. I could not give you even an approximate answer offhand, but I can work it out if necessary.

255. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : At page 58, you say : " It is possible that in the future " these revenues will be controlled by a National " Government," and so on. May I know what are your reasons for suspecting that the administration under a scheme of responsible government will not ensure the sacredness or integrity of your contract ? —Of our pensions ? This refers to pensions.

256. Yes ?—We have had pronouncements (I have not the chapter and verse for them here) by politicians of one sort or another in India to the effect that they did not see why they should go on paying pensions to people in England. That statement has been made. Also, I should like to read to you on that point a sentence from the report of the All Parties Conference, which I think, as the latest pronouncement on the question, is relevant. They say " In respect of the emoluments, allowances and " pensions they "—that is to say, the services— " would be entitled to on the establishment of the " Commonwealth, we have provided a statutory " guarantee. It is, however, our duty to point out " that the Lee Commission was appointed in the " teeth of Indian opposition, that its recommendations " were adopted over the head of the Indian Legisla- " ture, and we feel that the entire question of the " source and method of recruitment of the services, " their salaries, emoluments, allowances and pensions " in the future will require re-examination in the light " of the new political conditions created under the " new constitution."

257. It is in the light of that apprehension that you are asking for this ? On the same page, paragraph 8 says, " The members of my Association have " always regarded medical attendance on themselves " and their families by European doctors as one of " the most essential conditions of service in India." Has your Association considered this proposition from a purely practical point of view ? If so, how might arrangements be made to provide European male and female medical practitioners throughout India ?—We have not asked for female practitioners, so far as I know.

258. Men ?—I can only say that, for instance, at the beginning of my service I should think two out of three districts in my province had European medical officers—probably more. Now the proportion is something like one in five or one in four. It comes to this, that if an officer for the treatment of himself or his family has this prejudice, which exists (I do not say it should or should not exist, but it does exist), and wants to have a European doctor, he has frequently to go or to send a matter of 150 to 200 miles.

259. There may be one or two European officers in a district, and you do not want a special European doctor for them ?—That is another difficulty. Now we have a good many districts where there are one or two European officers. In that case you cannot give a doctor to one man. That is quite obvious.

260. Some Indian doctors have medical practice in England, too ?—I have been attended by Indian doctors frequently. I have no prejudice.

261. If the Indian doctors are quite good in England, they would be equally good for European officers in India, too ?—My instructions are from my Association. There are a very large number of European officers who have a prejudice. I may point out that one of the matters in respect of which the prejudices of people in this country are considered more than anything else is medical attendance on their families. I think that the European officer is entitled to his prejudice.

262. Is not that asking too much ?—I leave that to the Commission to decide.

263. Sir Hari Singh Gour : I draw your attention to page 58, wherein, speaking of special protection to the services, you say, " Further, the right to " retire prematurely upon such terms should be " unqualified, and should be a continuous option " lasting throughout the period of each officer's " service." You want that all servants belonging to the superior service should have the continuous option during their service ?—Yes.

264. If that option to retire during the whole period of service were given to them, do you think that would be reconcilable with the altered constitution that might be given to this country ?—I know nothing about the altered constitution and I have no instructions to argue on that point.

265. With regard to the option to retire for the members of your service you have given your reasons, that is that they might be affected by the future constitution. That is perfectly right. But that is only a justification for giving you a reasonable time within which to make up your mind ?—Do you want me to give you further reasons why it should be continued ?

266. Yes ?—As I have said before, we have the precedent of the Ceylon case. I have drawn attention to the fact that the attractiveness of the service and general conditions cannot be as favourable in the future as they have been in the past, and a large number of officers feel that they would like to be able to go at any time. There are a good many, as you probably know, who would make up their minds to go if a pistol was put to their heads. On the other hand, when the concession is extended a number of those officers will say: "If we get that we will "stay; otherwise, we will go." That position will continue, and as I have indicated, it does not only result because the service suffers a definite change. There are conditions in which people find the general position difficult. They may find that relations with the other services in which the conditions are changed, become—I will not say impossible, but—difficult.

267. I quite see your point, and that is a very good justification for giving you more time to decide. But what I am driving at is this. I have not been able to see any reason why you should have a continuous option for the entire length of your service?—That is the period we ask for.

268. Will you give the employer also a similar option of asking you to retire on proportionate pension?—Certainly, if the employer will give us compensation.

269. He will not give you compensation any more than you give?—That I think is rather a good justification for what we have been asking for in this memorandum.

270. I am not expressing any view at all. I am simply asking you a question whether you give a similar option to your employer also?—I will not.

271. What is the anticipation of the civilian? Is not the appointment to the commissionership by selection? Is every civilian entitled to be appointed as a commissioner on the ground of seniority, or is it a selection post?—It is a selection post.

272. Consequently it cannot be described as an accruing right?—That is a question which a lawyer of your eminence is much more fitted to decide than I. All I can say is that the services think so.

273. You say that if the commissionerships are abolished the members of your service want that special posts should be created?—Yes.

274. But supposing there was no reason for the continuance of the posts of commissioner, there would be equally no reason for the creation of special posts. The creation of a special post with similar emoluments as those of a commissioner would be really changing the phraseology, is it not so? If there is no necessity for the continuance of the post of a commissioner, there would be no necessity for the creation of a special post on public grounds because there will be no work?—What we did ask when there was a question of the abolition of a commissionership was that the senior deputy commissioner should get the pay of a commissioner. That was not creating a new post. It was merely giving the man who has got to the top of the deputy commissioner's grade the same pay as that of a commissioner.

275. That, of course, would not be consistent with the policy of economy upon which the abolition of commissionership might be based?—There would be some saving. One of the methods which was proposed in the Central Provinces for getting rid of the commissioners when Government refused to do so was that the council refused to vote the pay of the establishments of these officers. The pay of these establishments would be saved, plus the difference between the pay of the commissioner and the deputy commissioner.

276. You have referred to the report of the All Parties Conference. Will you kindly read the extract you have read once again and refresh your memory. You will agree with me that it only deals with future recruits; it does not deal with people who have acquired a vested right in the service. You will see if you kindly read it that every right is safeguarded to the existing members of the service?—What they say is that "in respect of emoluments, "allowances and pensions they would be entitled "to on the establishment of the Commonwealth "we have provided a statutory guarantee," and if you look at the statutory guarantee, which is to be found on page 121 of the report, it is extraordinarily vague. Paragraph 81 on that page says, "Parlia-"ment—that is to say the Indian Parliament to "be set under the new Constitution—may make "laws for regulating the classification of the civil "services in India, the sources and methods of their "recruitment, the conditions of service, pay and "allowances, and discipline and conduct."

277. That is for new recruits?—It is not so stated in the statutory guarantee.

278. Your statement that the members of the service are apprehensive of the danger threatening their vested rights is not borne out by the All Parties Conference report?—I think the sentence I read out originally bears it out.

279. That is not about the persons who are already in the service?—It does not say in so many words, "we are going to do away with your pensions and "so on."

The Chairman: What strikes me about it is this. Having regard to the many precedents there is nothing that anybody need resent in the condition that if there is a considerable change the officials who have been recruited by the Government should be given statutory protection. It is not necessarily a reflection on anybody. It is true that some such apprehension exists in almost every case where there is a very substantial change in the constitution, as for instance in the setting up of the Irish Free State Government. I fancy something of that sort—without making any reflection upon anybody—is not unreasonable.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: I quite recognise the reasonableness. But why I join issue with them is when they support their argument with reference to the report of the All Parties Conference and say that that supports their apprehension. There is nothing in the report for such an apprehension.

The Chairman: People are sometimes quite honestly apprehensive even though other people think that the apprehension is ill-founded. It is possible that the interpretation of the words is different in different minds.

280. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Is it not a fact that under the Civil Service Regulations a person who is appointed to a post loses the right to that post or to the post to which he looks forward if either of these posts is abolished altogether?—I have not looked it up. Can you refer me to the regulation?

Sir Hari Singh Gour: I have not got the Civil Service Regulations here.

Lord Burnham: There are many cases of compensation given on the abolition of a post.

281. Khan Bahadur Faroqui: You suggest in paragraph 3 on page 57 of your memorandum that compensation should be granted not only in the case of those persons appointed before 1919, but also in the case of those who accepted service since 1919. May I point out that the declared policy of the Government is the gradual Indianisation of the services? Do you think that there is any justification for claiming compensation for those officers who accepted service with a full knowledge of this fact?—Yes, certainly I do. The services whom I am sent here to represent undoubtedly think so. The position has developed very considerably since those officers took service and they anticipate it will develop still further. That is the ground for apprehension with regard to their service, and that is why we are asking for this.

APPENDIX (vide Q. 181, p. 44 and Q. 219, p. 45).

D.O. LETTER No. 168 A.R., dated the 22nd February, 1929, from Mr. W. S. Hopkyns, C.I.E., I.C.S., Special Reforms Officer, Bengal.

During the examination of the British Indian Association's representatives, at Calcutta, the Chairman asked whether figures could be supplied showing incomes of tenure-holders derived from rent.

The Revenue Department report that such figures are available only for the district of Mymensingh, in which the Settlement Officer prepared figures. I enclose the statements with explanatory notes, which have been prepared by the Revenue Department from the Settlement Report.

It should, however, be remembered that Mymensingh District, a large part of which was uncultivated at the time of the Permanent Settlement, is far from being typical of the whole province. The incomes of tenure-holders are probably larger in Mymensingh than in most other districts. A more correct idea of the average income per head of the rent-receiving classes (both proprietors and tenure-holders) may be obtained from the estimates made by the Settlement Officers, who prepared the records of rights in Dacca and Jessore districts. These estimates were Rs60/- in Dacca and Rs42/- in Jessore, these figures including receipts from salami and similar perquisites, but without the deduction of cess.

Net cess paid	107,112
Balance	2,490,779

The number of 1st grade tenure-holders is not known. The number of entries of 1st grade tenures in the record is 111,106, but many tenures have more than one entry, as they occur in more than one village. There may be many co-sharers in a tenure.

EXPLANATION OF THE CESS CALCULATION IN CASE OF 1ST GRADE TENURE-HOLDERS.

(a) The cess has been calculated at 1 anna per rupee on the estimated valuation of the lands in the immediate possession of the 1st grade tenure-holders.

(b) The 2nd grade tenure-holders pay to the 1st grade tenure-holder the whole of the cess calculated at one anna per rupee on the valuation of their land, less half an anna per rupee on the rent payable by them to the 1st grade tenure-holders. It follows that the 1st grade tenure-holders have to make up this deficiency, less the deduction calculated at half an anna per rupee on the rent they themselves have to pay.

(c) The Bengal Tenancy Act ryots, who pay the rent may be :

(i) cess tenure-holders,
(ii) cultivating ryots,

according to certain definitions peculiar to the Cess Act.

We do not know how much of the rent of Rs2,453,656 is paid by class (i) and how much by class (ii), but the result is the same in either case. In case (i) the same considerations apply in (b) above. In case (ii) the valuation is the ryots' rental, and the cultivating ryot under the Cess Act has to pay cess to the landlord (here the 1st grade tenure-holder) at half an anna per rupee. Hence it follows that the 1st grade tenure-holder will have to pay the other half-anna, less the deduction which he gets on the rent paid by himself.

An illustration will make this clear :

Case (i)		Rent paid
1st grade tenure-holder ..	A	Rs 5
B.T.A. ryot	B	,, 10
Nil

Case (ii)		Rent paid
1st grade tenure-holder ..	A	Rs 5
B.T.A. under-ryot	C	,, 16

In case (i) B is the cultivating ryot under the Cess Act. In case (ii) B is a cess tenure-holder under the Cess Act and C is the cultivating ryot. In case (i) the valuation is Rs10 and the cess -/10/- annas. In case (ii) the valuation is Rs16 and the cess -/16/- annas.

The payments are as follows :—

Case (i)

	Receives		Pays		Difference
C	—	..	—	..	—
B	—	..	-/5/-	..	-/5/-
A	-/5/-	..	-/7/6	..	-/2/6

Case (ii)

	Receives		Pays		Difference
C	—	..	-/8/-	..	-/8/-
B	-/8/-	..	-/11/-	..	-/3/-
A	-/11/-	..	-/13/6	..	-/2/6
					-/13/6

Hence in either case the net amount payable by A from his own pocket is the same and is equal to half an anna per rupee on the rent received from B, less a deduction of half an anna per rupee on the rent payable by A.

(e) This represents the net amount payable by the 1st grade tenure-holders from their own pockets to their landlords, the proprietors of estates, excluding the amount received from their tenants which they merely pass on to the proprietors.

As originally constituted, the Association included in its roll Indian officers of the Indian Medical Service, the Indian Police Service and the Indian Jail Service, but the Government of India and the various Provincial Governments in accordance with the rules laid down by Government governing the recognition of Associations formed by its employees refused to recognise the Association if officers of the so-called Security Services were included in its membership. The Association had, therefore, to reluctantly modify its Articles of Association, and only the Services enumerated above are now represented by it.

It is the most representative Association of its type, and as was admitted by the Royal Commission of 1923 on Superior Civil Services, its opinion on matters referring to the questions of policy, service, etc., in reference to the Indian Officers in the Superior Civil Services of the Crown deserves special consideration. The Association forwarded a detailed Memorandum to the Royal Commission referred to above, and also gave oral evidence before the Commission in Calcutta in 1923, but for reasons unknown many important points urged by the Association were not given a full consideration by the Royal Commission. In forwarding this Memorandum to the Simon Commission, the Executive Committee of my Association feel that it will materially help them in explaining their position in reference to the unfortunate effects of the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1923 on the position and status of the Indian Officers if they were to annex a copy of their detailed Memorandum and their oral evidence before the same body.* This would avoid repetition of the arguments which were advanced by my Association at that time, and would further clearly show how the claims of the Indian Officers have been ignored by the Royal Commission, His Majesty's Secretary of State for India, and the Government of India. As the recommendations made by the Simon Commission will have a very direct bearing on the conditions of service of the officers in different Services represented by my Association, it is of the utmost importance that the Commission should not ignore the representations of the Indian Officers. The Indian Officers in the various Services, together with their European colleagues are, as will be admitted, the mainstay of the Administration in the departments of Justice, Government, etc., in this country, and to ignore their just and reasonable claims altogether when those of their European colleagues are generously considered cannot possibly lead to their remaining contented or being able to render efficient service. With the recognised policy of increased Indianization of the Services adopted by the Government, it is all the more necessary that the conditions of service for the Indian Officers should be carefully gone into, while to attract the best talent it is of the utmost importance that the conditions of service must be made as attractive as possible, and not as has, unfortunately, been the result of the recommendations of the previous Commissions to make them decidedly inferior to those of the European Officers in the same Services.

In considering the question of the relative rate of emoluments of the European and Indian officers in various services serving under the Government of India, it is necessary to go back to 1886–1887 when the Aitchison Commission submitted its recommendations and introduced a differentiation between the emoluments of the European and Indian officers. Several of the decisions arrived at as a result of the recommendations of the Aitchison Commission did not survive the test of time with the changing conditions of India, and the Islington Commission of 1912–1914 therefore laid down that "the rates of emoluments offered should be sufficient to attract recruits of the right stamp, and to maintain them in such degree of comfort and dignity as to shield them from temptation and to keep them efficient for the term of their service."

In the Report on the Indian Constitutional Reforms (para. 322), it was considered "desirable to avoid the differentiation in many cases between the rates of pay drawn by the European and Indian officers in the same service." In spite of this, however, it was recommended that an extra allowance be granted to persons recruited in England "to compensate them for the extra drawbacks and expenses of expatriation." These recommendations were given effect to by the grant of the "Overseas Pay." This pay is defined in the Fundamental Rule 9 (ii) as pay granted to a Government servant in consideration of the fact that he is serving in a country other than that of his own domicile, and the rules regulating its grant were laid down in the Government of India, Finance Department, Resolution No. 1599–Ex., dated the 5th July, 1923. The Indian Officers' Association, as was explained by it in its Memorandum and answers to the questionnaire of the Royal Commission (see pages 12 and 13, para. 3) very strongly deprecated "the innovation introduced by the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, of granting overseas pay to European members of the services. It does not deny for one moment that the increase represented by the overseas pay was very urgently needed, but objects to the form in which it was given. This form of differentiation in the salaries of public servants was absolutely unknown in the past history of this country." My Association further pointed out that " in some of the Services represented by this Association, some Indian Officers have been granted overseas pay, but others recruited under the same conditions have not been granted the concession. There are other anomalies in the grant of overseas allowance. This Association trusts that these anomalies would be removed, and an equitable grant made to all officers in the same Service and recruited under the same conditions, before the overseas pay is merged into salary." This, however, was quite ignored, and it is, therefore, necessary to refer to some of these anomalies here. In the case of the All-India Services and some of the Central Services, an exception was made with reference to the Indian officers who were on the permanent cadres of their respective services prior to the introduction of these regulations, and the concession of drawing overseas pay was as a special case extended to these Indian officers as well.

The institution of this overseas pay is wrong in principle, and my Association feels very strongly about the invidious distinction which has been made regarding this concession in the emoluments between the European and Indian officers in the different Services. As it stands at present, it is not only an increase in the emoluments of some of the officers, but it gives an additional advantage to even fairly junior European officers over their senior Indian colleagues. Apart from the invidious distinction in point of pay while on duty, the grant of the overseas allowance involves a cumulative benefit by its inclusion in the average leave salary even when the officers are spending their leave out of India. Obviously the reasons given for the grant of overseas allowance while on active duty in India cannot hold good when the officers are drawing the leave salary in their own country. Further, under the new rules in reference to travelling allowance, etc., where the rates of allowances are based on the pay of officers, which, of course, includes the overseas pay of the European and of the Indian members of the various Services, whether serving under the Central Government or the different Provincial Governments, the officers enjoying the concession of the overseas pay draw considerably more allowances than their Indian colleagues. This advantage in the opinion of my Association is very inequitable, and cannot be justified on any reasonable grounds.

As a result of the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1923, the Secretary of State has further sanctioned for the administrative posts, when held by officers of non-Asiatic domicile and certain specified appointments outside the Time Scale, a fixed monthly rate of £13 6s. 8d. The overseas allowance of the officers of non-Asiatic domicile is further paid at a sterling rate, which at the time was fixed at 2s. to the rupee; this is totally at variance with the exchange of 1s. 6d., at which rate the rupee has finally been fixed.

As a result of the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1923, two further anomalous distinctions have been made in reference to the allowances and concessions granted to officers of non-Asiatic domicile.

The first of these is the grant of a number of passages to officers and their families in accordance with the rules laid down in the " Statutory Rules and Orders, 1924, No. 1395, India (1927) " (Rule 13 and Schedule IV.). The concession of passages is also extended to a microscopic minority of Indian officials, viz., the Indian civilians in receipt of overseas pay. Though at first sight it might appear that the officers of Asiatic domicile are not entitled to any free passages to a country other than the country of their domicile, it may be mentioned that some Indian officers have European wives, many have been educated in Europe, and have friends and associates there, most of them send their children to Europe for education, and all will improve their knowledge and widen their outlook by travel abroad, and by the opportunities thus afforded for studying in the advanced countries of Europe and America problems similar to those they are entrusted with in India. As a result of agitation and representation, certain meagre concessions in reference to passages were allowed to the Indian officers of the Indian Medical Service when proceeding on study leave under special conditions, but officers of other Scientific and Technical Departments for whom study leave is as important as in the case of the Indian Medical Service, have not been given any concessions in the form of passages.

The second is in connection with the differentiation which has been made between the European and Indian officers as regards medical treatment.

Another concession of the same nature, which has recently been sanctioned by the Secretary of State for India, in consultation with the Government of India, is the admission of the European and Anglo-Indian officers to special Family Pensions (See Government of India, Finance Department, letter No. D/4972-R. II/23, dated the 10th September, 1928). No such provision has been made for the Indian officers, and my Association cannot but feel that even reasonable claims of the Indian officers serving under the Crown in India are being entirely ignored.

All these concessions are of the nature of granting special treatment to certain class of officers, and are directly opposed to the following principle so ably enunciated by Sir Theodore Morison in his minute on the Islington Commission :—

> " If the State once begins to look into the private circumstances of the officers, there is no logical ground for stopping short of the individual. In fact, it is a dangerous doctrine that the State should enquire into the private circumstances of its officers or make these circumstances a ground for differentiation of salaries."

My Association gravely views this differential treatment between the European and Indian officers serving under the Crown in India, and strongly urges that such differentiation in total disregard of the claims of the Indian officers, cannot possibly lead to a harmonious working, or the Indian officers remaining contented with their present condition.

In connection with the leave rules also, the Indian officers' claims, and their " existing or accruing rights " have been totally ignored. While the nomenclature of the higher leave concessions has been changed from the " European Service Leave Rules " to the " Special Leave Rules " to avoid even the suggestion of racial discrimination, this discrimination has, as a matter of fact, been emphasised and exalted into a principle since the sole condition of eligibility to the higher leave concession is a non-Asiatic domicile under the Fundamental Rules. In Article 310 (old 297) Civil Service Regulations, the conditions laid down for their admissibility were either appointment by the Secretary of State or the attainment of a certain rank or a certain rate of pay. Under Fundamental Rules 57, 57A, 75B and 75C, however, all officers of Asiatic domicile appointed subsequent to the 24th July, 1923, are disqualified for the higher leave concessions even if they are appointed by the Secretary of State, or when they attain a certain rank or a certain rate of pay. The principle that the performance of more exacting duties or the discharge of work of a higher quality needs longer periods of rest and recuperation has been definitely abandoned, and the power vested in the Government of India to extend these higher leave concessions to certain Government servants has been abrogated.

Attention may also be drawn to the fact that Indian officers of proved merit are still kept out of most of the administrative and selection posts, not because of their incapacity to hold such posts or to maintain the dignity of office attendant on such high appointments, but only to appease the non-Indian element in the Services or for political reasons. In the policy of the Government, as advocated in the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform Scheme, and later in the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Superior Services, the question of Indianization of the Services commensurate with the increased responsibility transferred to the Indian legislature was definitely recognized, and the only standard laid down for the appointments to such higher posts was that of requisite ability and experience. That such qualifications are not wanting among the Indian officers is apparent from the fact that, wherever Indians have been appointed to even the highest and most responsible posts, they have acquitted themselves with credit and distinction. In spite of this, however, there are only very few exceptions where Indian officials have been selected for these high appointments. None of the prize posts, for example the Memberships of the Railway Board, Agents and Deputy Agents of various State Railways, the heads of various Surveys, the Forest Services, the Educational Services, and the Executive memberships of the Councils of the various Provincial Governments have been thrown open to Indian officials. The Indianization of the Services is not proceeding even at the rate laid down by the Royal Commission of 1923. In this latter connection, my Association very strongly deprecates the policy of bringing in so-called specialists on short-term contracts in the first instance, and later on absorbing them in the cadres of the various Services. These specialists are entertained on first appointment on much higher emoluments than those of the members of the Service, while at the time of their appointment to the permanent cadres they are allowed to begin on the pay they were then drawing. They thereby come to occupy much higher posts and acquire an undue seniority over the heads of the officers who have gone through the mill by starting at the lowest rung of the ladder.

The facts detailed above show without any shadow of doubt that the Central administrative machinery of the Government, viz. His Majesty's Secretary of State for India and the Government of India, as well as the Royal Commissions appointed to report on the conditions of service, etc., of the Services have confined their attention solely to the conditions of Service, etc., of one section of officers, namely, the officers of non-Asiatic domicile, and practically all the concessions granted have been made for improving their emoluments and status in utter disregard of the needs of the Indian officers. My Association views this deplorable neglect of the just claims of the Indian officers with grave concern, and would strongly urge the Statutory Commission to consider the situation referred to above from the point of view of Indian officials. An antipathy of the type shown by the authorities concerned to the claims of the Indian officers, is, to say the least, making the Indian officers very discontented, and unless the situation is seriously considered in all its aspects, and steps are taken to ameliorate the lot of the Indian officers, it is certain that the best talent from amongst the Indians will not hereafter be available for filling up vacancies in the different Services.

In India, as indeed elsewhere, pay means position, and it will be ridiculous to affirm that patriotism and service for the country will outweigh any consideration of emoluments or differential treatment between officers of different nationalities doing the same work under exactly identical conditions. The recognition by the Government of the principle that a certain proportion of British element in the administrative machinery is essential in the present political condition of the country should not involve any discrimination between officials of Indian and non-Asiatic domicile. Their conditions of service, prospects, emoluments, etc., should, for equal merit and identical work, be the same as those of their colleagues of non-Asiatic domicile, as any discrimination involves discontent and the loss of prestige of the Indian officers, and consequently of the administration of which they form an integral part.

My Association has already fully dealt with the position of the officers under the changed conditions of service in the reformed régime in its Memorandum to the Royal Commission attached herewith, and does not consider it necessary to deal with this point again in detail.

282. The Chairman : How many members are there in your Association ?—(Mr. De) 213 to-day.

283. You represent members from a very large range of services serving under both the Central and Provincial Governments ?—Yes.

284. Now, what would you like to say ?—Might I first explain how we come before you ? We have got everything to do with the Government of India Act. The preamble to the Act begins with the declared policy of Parliament of " increasing association of Indians in the administration," and ever since the Act came into force that has been going on, and more and more Indians have been taken into these services that we represent, both in the higher grades as well as in the lower. The position just now is that there has been very keen and widespread discontent among the Indian officers of these services, and unless there is some safeguard in the Act to provide that we shall not be treated as we are being treated, and that we shall have equal treatment with the Europeans, this discontent will increase ; and for the harmonious working of the Reforms it is impossible to contemplate such a state of affairs. Therefore, sir, we have come before your Commission. There is a differential treatment of the officers who are European, or rather of non-Asiatic domicile—not necessarily European, they may be New Zealanders or South Africans—and Indians. This distinct difference of treatment between non-Asiatics and Indians has been introduced since the Reforms, or a little before the Reforms, and this has reacted on our mentality and it causes very keen and widespread discontent. Therefore, sir, when recomending any alteration of the Government of India Act, as it is your province to do, you will remember our case. What we ask is that you should provide in the Act that there should be no difference in treatment of officers of these higher services that we represent, whether they are of Asiatic domicile or of non-Asiatic domicile. The consequence of this treatment that we feel is this. Not only are we looked down upon as officers of inferior capacity by our superior officers and by our Governors, but also by the people at large. I have had, sir, 35 years of service in the Indian Civil Service.

285. I am afraid, at present, I do not understand what is meant. What is the unequal treatment which works upon your mentality and makes you feel that ?—There are many items.

286. Begin with the best example of the lot.—First of all they are getting higher pay. In the same service, in the Civil Services that we represent, non-Asiatics get a higher pay than Indians. There is the overseas pay ; there is a difference due to exchange remittance benefit ; there is the passage grant, and there is the difference between the European and Indian equivalents of maximum average and half average leave salaries.

287. Do you want a provision which would provide that overseas allowance is to be made to domiciled gentlemen as it is made to a man whose domicile is in England ?—Whether you call it increased pay or overseas pay we do not care, but we want the same pay. It has been given to the Accounts and Audit service in the shape of increased pay, not as overseas pay. We go by what Sir Theodore Morison said in his minute on the Islington Commission.

288. It is at the bottom of page 85 of your memorandum ?—Yes, sir. That salutary principle laid down by him was disregarded, and the consequence of that was anticipated by Mr. Edwin Montagu. In a despatch, dated the 3rd of June, 1920, which he addressed to the Government of India he declared that " if a differentiation were for the first time " introduced in the pay of men whose pay has " hitherto always been equal, discontent must in- " evitably arise, and if the overseas allowance is " limited to men recruited in England or to men of " English domicile, invidious comparisons would be " made. If on the other hand, the overseas allow- " ance is paid eo nomine to a large number of Indians " who have never been out of India, it will be reduced " to an absurdity." That is the reason, sir, for the increased pay which was granted to the Accounts and Audit service. That is about emoluments. Then comes the question of leave. Under the old rules we of the superior services obtained the benefits of European service leave rules. Now, the leave rules have been divided into ordinary and special leave rules, the special leave rules applying to non-Asiatics. We have been debarred from all its privileges. An Indian of the Indian Civil Service of the rank of a commissioner himself will get in India only four months' leave on full pay, but his subordinates, even his head clerk, if he happens to be a non-Asiatic, will get eight months leave on full pay. This is not dignified for the Indian officers, and we suffer a good deal in prestige, on account of that. Then again, the question of medical attendance, sir. A European gets all his medical, surgical and nursing charges at a private hospital paid by Government. We do not get a single pice, sir. We have got to pay those ourselves. To consult a dentist or any other kind of specialist a European gets travelling allowance from his own station to Calcutta or any other place where such attendance can be had. We do not get that, sir. Not only that, their family gets the travelling allowance also. We do not get anything of that kind. These things were unknown in my time, when I was in active service. They came in only one and a half years ago.

289. Sir Hari Singh Gour : They were all unknown before the Lee Commission ?—These rules were issued by the Government of Bengal in 1927 only, about one and a half years ago.

290. The Chairman : I want you to think, because you are an experienced officer of the service and therefore I attach great importance to your suggestions, I want you to think what is the sort of provision which you would suggest should be inserted in the Government of India Act ?—We want equalisation of our position. There is another thing—the family pension fund which does not cost Government a single pice. The Lee Commission strongly recommended that it should be extended to Indians as well as Europeans. It has been extended to all Europeans, but Indians have still been debarred in spite of the recommendation of the Lee Commission. Now, sir, the last and biggest point is that we are not given opportunities to show our merit, although nominally all posts are open to Indians and Europeans alike in every service except one, that is to say, the Indian Medical Service, where they have gone further than in the other services and reserved certain posts for Europeans only. For instance, professorships in colleges and principalships of medical schools and colleges have been reserved.

291. The Chairman : I am afraid I have not quite followed you. Do you say that, for instance, professorships in colleges in India are reserved ?

Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi: I discovered that a certain post like that was reserved for Europeans. That is a fact.

292. The Chairman: What about the principalships?

Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi: Yes, the principalships of medical colleges. There is a list which I saw in the department while I was a minister showing that these posts were reserved for Europeans.

The Witness (Mr. De): But I am talking of the other services, because the Indian Medical Service men are not allowed to become members of our Association and I am not in a position to speak about them. I only spoke about that incidentally. But in the other services all posts are normally open to everybody. Yet, we are debarred from the higher administrative posts, the posts in which a man can show his merit. We do not get them. We have mentioned a number of them in our memorandum.

293. The Chairman: Is it you view that there ought to be a clause in the Government of India Act which deals with that point?—Well, sir, we want something like the declaration contained in Queen Victoria's proclamation that really, actually and in practice—not only in writing—there should be no distinction made between Indian officers and European officers in any way.

294. Sir Hari Singh Gour: You have the proclamation now. Why do you want it again?—It is not acted on. You see these differences of pay, leave, medical attendance, family pensions and passages. There is this discriminatory treatment.

295. The Chairman: Mr. De, you have developed your main points?—Yes, sir. May I say, sir, one word in regard to our position. As Indian citizens we anxiously desire further advance in the constitutional reforms, and as a body we will strive our utmost to work them loyally and without any reservation whatever. We place ourselves unreservedly in the hands of the reformed legislatures and of the ministers in whom we place our complete trust. Our point, however, is this. We know that the European Officers' Association want to safeguard their interests by provisions in the Act. We do not want anything of the kind, but we cannot with self-respect and efficiency serve the reformed constitution if our position is put markedly inferior to that of our European colleagues. So, sir, we now demand, and will continue to demand, that our position is made the same as it was in the old days before the Reforms. Then there was no difference between a European and an Indian in the services.

296. Sir Arthur Froom: Mr. De, you suggest that the salary of Rs1,500 a month in the services you represent should be the same for Europeans and Indians?—In the services we represent we live like Europeans and our expenses are the same.

297. Do you recollect a resolution that was tabled in the Council of State once by an Indian—I do not want to mention his name—who holds a very responsible post now, and this gentleman was of opinion that the civil service is too highly paid. So he tabled resolution to this effect that (a) with the exception of Governors or Lieutenant Governors, the pay of the Indian Civil Service should be reduced by 25 per cent., and (b) having arrived at this pay, the pay of the European members of the Indian Civil Service should be increased by 25 per cent; or in other words, the object of the resolution was to keep the pay of the Europeans on the present basis, but to reduce the pay of the Indians. In suggesting this reduced pay for Indians this gentleman made it clear that one had to make allowances in the case of European officers for the extra expenses involved in their having to send up their children to England for study, in meeting the cost of illness, and so on. That was his view. Will you subscribe to his view? No, sir.

298. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: You say that the specialists employed in higher appointments involving special skill may be paid higher emoluments, and so on?—Yes.

299. In all vocations specialists should get special pay?—Quite so, sir.

300. Then, consistent with your self-respect you would not object to accept a lower salary when you are appointed to a lower post?—No, sir. But what I wanted to point out was that if you want to bring a specialist on a special pay, do not surreptitiously introduce him into our cadre afterwards on a much higher pay.

301. But if a specialist is necessary?—He comes under his contract if he is necessary, and he is paid accordingly. But afterwards suddenly he is introduced into our cadre above our heads although he is a much junior man.

302. He may be necessary for Government for a period?—Well, he can be brought under another contract for that period; that is how specialists are entertained.

303. Further on you say on page 86:—"The "recognition by the Government of the principle "that a certain proportion of British element "in the administrative machinery is essential," and so on; in view of that recognition and in view of the standard of living of European officers, is it not just to show some consideration to them and remunerate them on a higher level?—I have no quarrel with the proposition, sir, that they should be given a living wage, but we belong to the same services and have got to live in the same way.

304. They have a higher standard of living?—That, I deny altogether, sir. It is not so.

305. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Mr. De, it is not a fact that the Indian National Congress and other public bodies in this country have been pressing for Indianisation of all the services on the ground, amongst other reasons, that for Indian services the Indians are cheaper than Europeans?—They have.

307. You now wish to equalise your status with regard to pay with Europeans?—Yes, sir, as we had always before.

308. Then the advantage you have of being indigenous products of your country and serving your country from patriotic motives disappears. If you are given the same salary and emoluments as Europeans, you reduce your label to that of a paid mercenary. Are you prepared to accept that position?—We do, whether you call us mercenaries or by any other epithet. We accept that.

309. I should have thought that as public and patriotic men serving our motherland you should have been prepared to work on a smaller salary and would not demand the high salary which is paid to imported labour?—When Swaraj comes, if all salaries are reduced, we will readily accept what is offered.

310. But your complaint at present is that there is no Swaraj. When Swaraj comes you are prepared to serve on a low salary. Do I take it that that will be a happy augury for the advent of Swaraj, and that we shall get Mr. De and the other members of his Association to work for the motherland on a lower salary?—My point is not the amount of salary. I am not complaining of our lower or higher expenses. I am only complaining of the differential treatment.

312. As regards your complaint that you have not got the same opportunities for occupying administrative and higher posts as Europeans, that is due to the fact that all the administrative posts are in the hands of Europeans?—Unfortunately, that is so, sir. The people who select us are Europeans.

313. And they, naturally, wish to select one of their own brethren in India?—Without attributing any motive on their own part, I feel it is only natural. Unconsciously, his feeling must be this, that if a European who is the head of the department says that Indians are fit for his post, it necessarily follows that there would be no room for him.

314. One more question and I have done. The members of the European Association want safeguards against any constitutional change in the country as regards their pay, promotion and pension to certain appointments. Do you put forward a similar claim, or will you be satisfied with the reformed Government and the constitution as will be given to this country ?—Having decided that as sons of India we cannot demand any such thing; as I have said just before, we place ourselves unreservedly in the hands of the ministers.

315. Then you have no apprehension whatever ?—None whatever. But the only thing we want safeguarded by that Act is that our position should in no way be inferior to that of our European colleagues.

322. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Mr. De, you have said that the Indian Civil Service is the highest paid service in the world, and that men who pass the same examination when they go to Ceylon and Malaya get much less salary ?—Yes, and also in the Home Civil Service.

323. Does that not establish the point that I wanted to bring out that Europeans in India should get less, and not that you should get more ?—I do not mind; if you reduce their salary, you reduce ours also, but do not make any difference and point out to us as an inferior class of officers. In 1893, I had the same advantages as my European colleagues in the Indian Civil Service, but now all these innovations have been brought in, and the civilian who is of an Asiatic domicile is now considered to be an inferior being.

324 The Chairman: * * * You may just tell me these two things. In your long experience as a member of the Indian Civil Service, and many of whom might have been Indians, was the right of appeal to the Secretary of State ever in fact exercised by an Indian who is a member of the Indian Civil Service ?—Well, I do not know if there has been any sort of punishments in regard to which any Indian Civil Servant had to appeal.

325. I might tell you that there have been many, many cases ?—Not to my knowledge, sir. On various occasions we have sent up memorials to the Secretary of State for redress of our grievances.

326. You are misunderstanding my question. I am referring to the fact that under the Government of India Act no officer who belongs to the All-India service and who was appointed by the Secretary of State can be dealt with adversely without his having a right of appeal to the Secretary of State in Council, and I wondered whether your own information was such as to enable you to tell me whether or not that right of appeal was ever exercised by an Indian member of the Civil Service ?—No appeal has been made to my knowledge, sir.

327. Then the other thing I want to ask you is this. Is it your view in fact that an Indian who is a member of the Indian Civil Service has the same level of expenses to meet as a European who comes out here and serves for twenty or twenty-five years ?—Yes, certainly, sir, and usually it is more, because an Indian has got to have a house to live with his family, while a European generally lives in the club and spends about Rs300 a month.

328. I was interested to know that. I see your view. You say that in the case of two officers living in the same station, one Indian and the other European, the expenses which the European officer who has come from a distance evidently incurs will not fairly be more than the expenses which the Indian officer incurs ?—Yes, sir.

329. You follow, of course, that in that case, if the services are to be Indianised, there is no economy to be realised from that at all, for the expenses in the two cases will be the same ?—No.

Memorandum submitted by the All-Bengal Namasudra Association.

On behalf of The All-Bengal Namasudra Association, and also the Namasudra Community of Bengal, I beg to submit the subjoined Memorandum for your consideration. I beg also to state that owing to shortness of time we are not in a position to submit a detailed statement of the whole matter under enquiry, specially, with regard to those with which we, as a body, are vitally concerned. I hope, however, to submit in detail the views of the Association with regard to the same by the end of May next.

It is desirable, I hope, to state our position as a community in the province of Bengal. The Association consists of members of the Namasudra Community including those, who by education and culture have understood their position as a community, and have come to think for themselves and also for the community, and have thus claimed to be their natural leaders. The Association is thus a political body taking cognisance of matters relating to State. It also works in reference to social, educational and economical matters as well.

It may not be out of place here to indicate the position that the community occupies in the Presidency of Bengal from the point of view of its numerical strength. The total population in this Presidency is 47,592,462. Of these 25,481,624 are Muhammadans; the rest are non-Muhammadans. These again include Hindus, Christians, Buddhists, Sikhs, Parsees, Jains, etc. There are 190 castes in Bengal under the term Hindu. The Hindu does not indicate any homogeneous race. There is hardly any community of interest between one caste and another because of the special position that one occupies in relation to others in this country. Amongst the Depressed classes themselves there is some community of interests in political, educational and economical matters. As a few castes of the Hindus have received a fair education they have grouped themselves together for all practical purposes. And the rest because of their backwardness of education have lagged themselves behind and are now put under the term "Depressed classes" (backward classes). Under the former group are generally classed, the Nabashakhs and other intermediate classes besides the three prominent castes, the Brahmins, the Vaidyas, the Kayasthas, whose number is about 2·6 millions in this Presidency. The Namasudras alone number about 2·1 millions in this Presidency. The total number of the Depressed classes in Bengal is about 12 millions.

The interests of this community can never be represented by another caste, as the interests are of conflicting nature owing to the construction of the present Hindu society. Past experience has confirmed this view. Various misrepresentations have been made to the Government from time to time in the name of the Hindus, while regard being had to the existing facts, social conditions, and specially to the differences obtaining in educational and political matters, these persons should have spoken for themselves only and should not have assumed the position of the "heaven-born guardians" of the masses.

The literacy of Bengal is one of the wonders of the world. It appears that the literacy of the Brahmins is 48 per cent. and that of the Vaidyas 65 per cent. and that of the Kayasthas 41 per cent. It is a matter of history that for reasons known to them these communities practically shut the doors of schools against the members of the Depressed classes during the pre-British Rule in India, when the Government of the Province was practically in their hands. Even under the British Rule there are many schools and institutions where the boys of the Depressed classes are not admitted. This only explains the poor percentage of literacy of the Namasudra community in the present moment; and it is only 8 per cent. The literacy of other Depressed classes in Bengal is even less than that number. The progress that these communities have been able to make, it must be agreed by one and all, is due to British Rule. The literacy thus indicated only means the capacity of a person to sign his name.

We beg in conclusion, to state that in support of the Memorandum, we will also adduce oral evidence. We shall supply the names and addresses of the gentlemen later on and the same will reach the office of the Commission before the 1st of June next.

I have the honour to be,

Sirs,

RASIK LAL BISWAS,
Hony. Joint Secretary,
On behalf of The All-Bengal Namasudra Association.

MEMORANDUM

1. Representation.

(a) The basis of franchise :—
Franchise should be based on population and not on any property or educational qualification; that is to say that every adult male member should be entitled to vote.
NOTE.—Owing to property qualification, as exists under the present system only 2 per cent. of the people have been given the right to vote.

(b) Methods of election :—
(i) Representation on legislative bodies should be made directly by the people or electorates,—there being no intermediary.
(ii) Election should be made by ballot.
(iii) Polling areas should be made as small as possible—the polling booth should be within two miles from the distant part of the area.

(c) Methods of representation :—
(i) To secure due representation of the existing conflicting interests every community should be given a definite number of representatives in the legislative bodies, including all local self-governing institutions, in proportion to the population of each with respect to the total number of members in these bodies. No member of a non-Depressed community should be allowed to represent the Depressed classes. In view of this there is no necessity to give any special seat for the protection of any particular or economic interest.

(g) Nominations :—
The number of nominated members should be reduced as far as possible. Of the officials only those who are at the head of different departments and officers who are in direct charge of the respective offices should be nominated in the legislative bodies. As regards non-officials only experts to advise the legislatures or the Government or members for the unrepresented interests may be nominated.

3. Local Self-Governing Bodies.
(i) There should be village union consisting of one big village or some small villages. The village Union Boards should be elected by the adult male residents of the villages.
(ii) There should be a District Board at the District headquarters, the members of which also should be directly elected by the same electors as that of the Union Boards.

4. The Provincial Government.
(i) At the head of the provincial Government there should be a Governor appointed from England, and he should be ex-officio president of the executive and legislative councils.

(ii) The number of ministers should be the same as that of the members of the executive council.

(iii) In every province there should be one and only one legislative body. No second chamber is desirable at present.

(iv) The provincial legislative council should consist of the members of the Governor's executive council and of the members elected and nominated.

(v) The number of the members of the provincial councils should be increased. In Bengal it should be made 300, of which not more than 30 be nominated (officials and non-officials). Every two hundred thousand people (not voters) should be represented by one member.

(vi) As the facts stand the members of the executive council should not be responsible to the legislatures.

(vii) There should be six members in the executive council, of these three should be Europeans and three Indians. Of these again one should be chosen from amongst the Depressed classes.

These members should be nominated by the Governor and appointed by His Majesty. In the case of Europeans, the rule of twelve years' residence in India should be kept to, and in the case of the Indians, university qualifications along with public activities should be regarded as necessary qualifications.

(viii) Ministers should be made individually and collectively responsible for the due administration of the departments placed under the charge of each to the legislatures.

(ix) Ministers and the members of the executive council should have joint deliberations with the Governor for the settlement of their policy.

(x) More departments should be placed in the charge of the ministers than have been done at present. Specially the Departments of Land Revenue and Irrigation should be transferred.

(xii) Funds for the administration of the Reserved and Transferred subjects should be earmarked, and shown as such in the annual budget. The needs of the nation-building departments should be kept in view in the distribution of funds.

5. Central Government.

(i) At the head of the constitution there should be a Governor-General appointed from England and he should be ex-officio president of the executive and the central legislative councils.

(ii) There should be eight other members of the executive council, of whom four should be Europeans and four should be Indians; and of these again one at least should be a member of the Depressed classes.

(iii) These members should be nominated by the Governor-General and appointed by His Majesty.

(iv) Members of the executive council should not be made responsible to the legislatures in the present moment.

(v) Council of State should be abolished altogether and there should be one Central Indian Legislative body.

(vi) The Central Legislative body should consist of the members of the Governor-general's executive council and members elected and nominated.

(vii) The number of the members of the Central Legislative body should be increased to 350. Of these not more than 50 should be nominated (officials and non-officials).

(viii) The electors of the provincial legislatures should elect the members of the Central Legislative body.

7. Courts and Judiciary.

The courts and the judiciary should be so constituted by legislation that there may be representatives of different communities on these in order that the people may have confidence in the administration of justice.

10. Services.

(i) Appointments to the Indian Civil Service and other all-India services should be made in India by a central services commission on the nomination of the Provincial Governments in their appointment Departments.

(ii) The Central Services Commission should consist of Indian and European non-officials, presided over by a European member of Governor-General's executive council.

(iii) There should at least be three members of the Depressed classes on the Central Services Commission.

(iv) Appointments should be made from amongst the qualified candidates of the different communities in proportion to their numerical strength.

(v) At the first instance candidates of the Depressed classes and others, including Muhammadans, should only be appointed until and unless an equalisation of these classes is secured to those who have already filled these services.

(vi) As regard the provincial services, appointments should be made by a Provincial Services Commission consisting of Indian and European non-officials, and presided over by the European member of Governor's executive council in charge of the appointment department.

(vii) These appointments should be made on the nominations of the divisional commissioners.

(viii) For the next ten years these appointments should be made from amongst the Depressed classes to obtain an equalisation of their number to those of others who have hitherto filled all these offices.

(ix) The term "efficiency" and "competition" are absolutely misnomers, and have absolutely no scope in public services.

(x) The superior services should not be Indianised any more without securing a proper number of the members of the Depressed classes in proportion to their numerical strength in these services.

11. Growth of Education.

As stated in the introduction the literacy of Bengal, as also in the whole of India is, so to say, one of the wonders of the world. Indian Society is so constructed that by the autocracy of the few not only economic and other movements have been retarded, but educational movements and a general advancement in that direction have been absolutely hampered. The poor percentage of literacy is a miracle, and should be an eye-opener to those who really think of any political progress for India. The few castes that have hitherto been able to secure the State patronage, including even the landed aristocracy (who received a boon in the shape of permanent settlement in Bengal in 1793), have not employed any of their powers either for the Government or for the people. And no more powers should be given to these few without securing a proper safety for the millions and millions of illiterate people in India. We suggest therefore, that :—

(i) Elementary education should be made free and compulsory.

(ii) Expenditure for this purpose should be made by taxation of a fixed sum (certain percentage in the rupee) on the surplus revenue that remains with the landlord on payment of Government dues.

Supplementary Statement submitted on behalf of the All-Bengal Namasudra Association.

You will be pleased to find that in that letter of ours, we have tried to give you an idea of the position of the community in so far as its social, educational and political aspects are concerned. It may not be out of place, we venture to think, that we should try and give a true indication of the caste system that obtains in this country and how the said fact determines not only the social and educational conditions of the people, but their political conditions as well. It is, no doubt, difficult for even one living in this country to realise truly the situation that is created by the " caste." It is, therefore, still more difficult for one who has had no opportunity of living in this country and of coming into direct contact with the facts and circumstances created by it. We desire, therefore, to reaffirm the view which is the result of past experience, that a man is born with his caste and dies with his caste in India. We have known and seen of many instances up to now where the simple fact that a man is born in a particular caste has not only debarred him from having his true and just share in various branches of the State Administration, but has also debarred him from a little self-realisation through education, for which there has not been any obstacle in any part of the civilised world, but for which there are various obstacles created and introduced in this caste-ridden country. It would be a lamentable mistake to suppose that with a little concession in favour of the people who occupy a backward position on account of their being oppressed through caste, the difference that exists between members of one caste and those of another may be wiped out, for the fact is significant that in social and political matters there may be some community of interests between the members of a caste coming under the general term, " Hindu," and those who are outside the said term—say, for example, the Muhammadans—while there is hardly any community of interests between members of one caste and those of another coming under the same term, " Hindu," in their social and political and even in educational matters. It is indeed a fact that in various social observances the social servant who serves a Brahmin also serves a Muhammadan, but that social servant does not serve any member of a Backward or Depressed classes, of whom the Namasudras are by far the largest. although coming under the same generic term, " Hindu." We desire, therefore, to assert once again the simple fact that the term, " Hindu " does not connote any homogeneous race. It is difficult to indicate any reason for this difference in situation, but the fact is that it does exist. We would respectfully suggest, therefore, that in dealing with this aspect of the question and in recommending the changes, if any, the Commission would do well to consider and see that any such thing may not strengthen the hands of the few to the great prejudice and the detriment of the interests of the majority of the illiterate, poor Backward or Depressed classes as has been our past experience in various matters. We may be permitted to submit that want of proper education, resulting in a very poor percentage of literacy amongst the masses, more particularly amongst the members of these Depressed classes, explains to some extent the situation that no proper demand could be made by these millions of dumb people for their true and just share in the Administration of the country ; but we venture to submit that this condition makes the position of an impartial Government very serious in its dispensation of justice and patronage. We make bold to submit with regret that Government of the country, although making impartial and just pronouncements from time to time with regard to its attitude towards these millions of people, have not been able to carry out the said utterances into action.

We may be permitted to record our agreement in accepting generally the pronouncement made by the late Secretary of State for India in Council, on the 20th August, 1917, in connection with the Indian constitutional changes. The same was followed by a personal tour of his, along with H.E. The Viceroy, with an object of seeing and studying for themselves the various aspects of the said constitutional questions, by receiving the views of different bodies of people in India. We do not desire to indicate in detail how, through the intervention and ill-advice of several caste-ridden Indians, the millions of Indians were prevented from not only having had any opportunity to submit their points of view with regard to the said matter before the said enquiring Commission, but that they were also prevented from submitting, even in writing, their views about such a momentous issue affecting their interests to a very considerable degree. We may be permitted to note with regret that we cannot approve of the attitude taken up by some of the then officials of the Government in respect to this matter. We would, therefore, very respectfully ask the Commission that they would be pleased to make it a point to give each and every one of those desirous of presenting their views before it a patient hearing.

If we have been able to follow the said pronouncement of the 20th August, 1917, we find that it was declared by it that the policy of His Majesty's Government was that of the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration and the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible Government in India. So far as the question of appointment is concerned it is a fact that the same has gone to the few of the Indians to the great prejudice of the millions of people even in the Lower Departments of various branches of the Administration for which there were many qualified candidates from amongst the members of the Depressed Classes, and more especially from the Namasudra Community. There was no just and true consideration made of the candidates from these classes for the said appointments. On the contrary, methods have been invented in the name of the rules by which these candidates have been practically debarred from having their just share, not to talk of any true and proportionate share in the Administration. It is also regrettable that the local authorities have signified their assent to the said course, although we venture to submit that there has been no justification for the same.

So far as the question of the proper representation of the masses upon the Legislature is concerned, certain relaxation of the former rules was no doubt suggested in order that a large section of the Indian people might feel that they had their representatives on these Legislative bodies. But the rules framed for holding the elections of these Legislative bodies have been so inadequate and imperfect that the main object which lay behind the said pronouncement for the gradual development of the self-governing institutions, with a view to progressive realisation of responsible government in India, has not been achieved to the extent to which it ought to have been, if not baffled, in more cases than one.

It is high time now that every adult male member should be given the right to franchise without any restriction whatsoever. It has been seen even with the modifications introduced into the rules of election, that about two per cent. of the total population have been given the right to vote. There are various circumstances which may be taken as explaining this unfortunate condition of this country. Of the several qualifications laid down for any one to have a right to vote, those of payment of revenue or income tax, or a special qualification for a special constituency are absolutely outside the scope of an average Indian, much less to talk of a member of the Depressed Classes, of whom the Namasudras are by far the largest. The only qualifications which are possible for them to avail themselves of in the matter of election are those of actual payment of a chowkidari tax of Rs2/– or of payment of a cess of Re 1/– on the annual rent or payment of Re 1/– as municipal tax. The figures quoted above show as a matter of fact that even with these modifications a very insignificant portion of the people have been given the so-called privilege to elect their representatives on the Legislative bodies. We are extremely sorry to indicate, in view of the aforesaid facts, that the policy which lay behind the said pronouncement has not been at all given effect to. The only means that we have been able to find after the experience of these few years since 1921, when the Government of India Act of 1919, was given effect to, is to introduce immediately the franchise on the basis of population without any regard to any property or financial qualifications in order to assure the masses of Indians, of whom the Namasudras are by far the largest in the Presidency of Bengal, that there was a genuine and sincere desire expressed on behalf of the Government while making the said pronouncement, and that it was never the intention of the Government to do otherwise, or to strengthen the hands of the few to the great prejudice of the millions of dumb people in India. We may be permitted to submit that there is yet a very great moral responsibility of the Government, to see that the interests of the millions are properly safeguarded, and that the same may not be prejudiced by the introduction of any change in the Administration.

There had been, of late, a movement amongst a small section of the people in the country for extending the voting power to women, or in other words to do away with the sex disqualifications so far as the franchise is concerned. The Government was prevailed upon, and an amendment of the rule was made permitting the women to vote. It was tried only once as regards the Bengal Legislative Council. The result does not seem to have been very satisfactory, for excepting a few cases, the majority of the women voters, especially in towns, do not generally occupy a respectable position in society. Regard being had also to the custom that obtains as a matter of religion for the observance of strict purdah (privacy) amongst the Hindu and Muhammadan females, this voting power given to the females has been of no practical use. It will take a long time yet to make the females of the Namasudra community, as also of the other Backward Communities, understand their true position in respect to the political administration of the country, and therefore they cannot be expected to be able to take advantage of this change in the rules in their favour. Further, when the qualifications laid down for one to be a voter have debarred over 95 per cent. of the males to exercise this franchise, it will only be strange to suppose that their women may be able to possess a necessary qualification for the purpose. These women have no independent means of income, and have got to depend upon the income of their male members for their maintenance. We would suggest, therefore, that for years to come it will serve no practical purpose by investing women of this country with the right of franchise.

We have indicated in our Memorandum submitted previously that election should be made by ballot. The method that is still in use has not produced the desired or any satisfactory object; for, the last three elections show that due to illiteracy the voters could not decipher the real situation, and hundreds of instances occurred when the ballot papers have been rejected on account of incorrect or imperfect marking. We are sorry, also, to note that there was more than one instance when the presiding officer and those in charge of election at different polling booths were not able to go above dishonesty while marking the ballot paper on behalf of an illiterate voter, only because of the castes to which these officers, the voters, and the candidates, respectively, belong. This difficulty, we suggest, may be avoided if there be each separate ballot box of a particular colour for each candidate, with his name inscribed on the same; and instead of the present form of ballot paper a card, with a number and the official seal on it, be used. To avoid any misunderstanding, which is not very uncommon, and to avoid unnecessary delay, it is advisable that the votes recorded at any particular polling station be counted immediately after the poll is over, by the presiding officer, in the presence of either the candidates or the agents, and the results communicated to the Returning Officer, with the ballot papers and other articles in connection therewith.

The pay of all the officers, including the Governor, Members of the Executive Council, Ministers, Secretaries should be reduced to a considerable extent; for the revenue should be used more for the benefit of the people than for the Heads of the Departments, and especially for the reason that the public duties that any of these officials should be called upon to discharge, and the position that he will occupy should be taken as enough consideration for rendering loyal services to the State and the country. We venture to think that there is no country in the world, excepting India, where public services yield such a highly disproportionate remuneration and make the services absolutely top-heavy.

The Governor of a Province should be at the head of the Executive, and will be responsible to the Parliament, and also to the Viceroy for the good administration of the Province. He will personally supervise works of the Reserved Departments for which he will be personally accountable to the Viceroy, and he will also superintend the works of the Transferred Departments. He may advise the Ministers in all matters, and in case of difference of opinion he may choose another batch of Ministers, or dissolve the Council for fresh election in order to know the decision of the electorate. To keep the gravity of the House, and also to be in touch with the feelings of the people he will, when feasible, preside over the Council. In his absence the President, elected by the House, will preside. All acts with the sanction of the Governor be enacted as laws. In case of veto, he will send the Bill, passed by the Legislature, to the Viceroy, with a note for his sanction of veto and that note will be published on demand.

The Members of the Executive Council should be recruited for five years from the public men, both of Great Britain and India. It has been seen in more than one case that British members of the Indian Civil Service, on account of their living in this country for a long time, and by coming into contact with only a section of the people, are mentally captured by the ideas of those few people who are in the position of social aristocrats. As for the Ministers, our suggestion is, that they should not be taken from the representatives of any special constituency. For maladministration, the Legislature will be empowered to express their disapproval of the same by the token cut in their pay, and the proceedings of the Council in respect to this matter should be submitted to the Secretary of State for India, and the Premier, so that the British Cabinet may be able to know the details of the administration of the provinces by the Members nominated by the Governor. Under-secretaries of the Ministers should be taken from the non-official elected Members of the Council, and should be appointed by the Governor in consultation with the Chief Minister, under whose order they may be removed subject to the approval of the Governor.

The official heads of the different departments should carry out the policy and order of the Members or Ministers in charge of each of the departments, and those officers should be liable for efficient working of their departments, and may be transferred, suspended or degraded by the Ministers or the Members of the Executive Council with the sanction of the Governor.

Of the subjects that are now reserved, the following should be transferred :—

1. Education with all its branches, including the Universities, except the education of the Europeans and Anglo-Indians.
2. Tramways within municipalities.
3. Water supply, irrigation, canals, drainage and embankments, water storage and water power.
4. Famine relief.
5. Land Acquisition.
6. Land Revenue administration, with all its heads.
7. Industrial matters.

In a country and in the provinces, where there are ample powers of control in the hands of the Governor-General, Governors and other authorities, and there are sufficient provisions of checks and holding balances, we do not find any necessity of a Second Chamber. This will not only incur a heavy expenditure, but it will also check the progress of the country. The conservatives, the reactionaries, and the aristocrats, who are always against all sorts of social and educational progress of the country—being in the Upper House will always overthrow the popular demands and popular reforms.

Provincial autonomy. Though we are not for provincial autonomy, we shall urge upon the authorities to see that the provinces be not starved, and their administration suffer from want of funds, only to meet the expenditure of the Central Government. As for Bengal, we suggest that the tax on jute should be in the hands of the Provincial Government, and be spent for the cause of education, sanitation, agriculture and irrigation.

All the sources of income of a province should be in the hands of the Provincial Government, which will, in its turn, contribute a just proportion to the Central Government according to its demand. Looking to the needs and importance of the departments, the purse should be divided among the Members of the Executive Council and Ministers, with an eye to the fact that the nation-building departments do not feel any want of funds.

The Governor-General should have the power of superintendence, direction and control of the Civil and Military Government of India. He will also carry out the policy and order of the British Government expressed through the Secretary of State for India. He will be responsible to the British Parliament for the good administration of the country. He will administer Central subjects through Ministers, who will be responsible to him for the good and efficient administration of the departments under each of them.

All the Ministers of the Governor-General should be recruited from amongst the public men both of India and England. These Ministers will advise the Governor-General in all matters, but their advice may not always be accepted. When the Governor-General fails to accept the advice of his Ministers, he will write a note stating reasons of his not accepting the advice, and that note is publishable on demand. In some matters, social, educational, and legal, the Governor-General should accept the opinion of the Assembly. When the opinion of the Assembly clashes with the policy of Parliament, the Viceroy, in consultation with the Secretary of State for India, may veto the bill passed by the Assembly, and he will publish his reasons for the satisfaction of the people. The Assembly should be taken as the representative body of the people.

As there is sufficient power for checks and balances, we find no necessity of the Council of State, and we humbly urge you to abolish the same immediately.

The Governor-General will personally look into the working of the Provincial Governments as well as the administration of the Central subjects. All the heads of the departments should be personally accountable for the efficient working of their departments to the Ministers in charge of those departments. When the Legislatures will see that the working of a particular department is not going on efficiently, or on a good line, they may express their disapproval of the same by token cuts, and also by refusing the salary of the Minister or Ministers who are in charge of that department. On the recommendation of the Governor-General, the Premier will restore the salary or the required money. By this the Cabinet will have a chance to see the working of the Government in particular matters. But if the Legislatures refuse the grant or the salary successively for three times, that grant or the salary should not be restored in order to respect the opinion of the people's representatives. To this extent the Executive will be responsible to the Legislatures. The Governor-General will appoint from the non-official members of the Assembly the Under-Secretaries of his Ministers.

Relation between Central and Provincial subjects :—

Of the Central subjects, we suggest especially that Ports, Customs Duties, Cotton Excise Duties, Income Tax and Jute Tax should be under the control of the Provinces, and the Provinces will contribute to the Central Government the sum required every year. Meston Settlement should not be revived, and no other settlement is necessary. At the request of the Viceroy, the Provincial Governments will contribute in their respective share the money required by the Viceroy.

Law and order, justice and defence of India should be in the hands of the Governor-General, and the Governors, and they will be responsible to the British Parliament for these matters. As far as possible the Government will try to accept the advice or opinion of the people expressed through Legislatures. The Government will see that all these should be used for the Indians, and not for the Empire.

Up till now, the Government is following the policy of conservatism, and is almost always constantly and systematically opposing almost all sorts of social reforms demanded by the progressive Indians. The Government should change its policy, and always leave the matters in the hands and opinion of the Indians. The Government members will be allowed to vote according to their personal and individual choice. The Government, instead of going back, should always keep pace with the idea of the people, and help the Indian people to come out of all sorts of superstitious old ideas.

Instructions have been given by the Home Government to the Indian Government, and also by the Viceroy and the Governors, to their Ministers, to give special protection to the classes who, from their lack of education and material advantages or from any other causes, especially rely upon the protection of the Government, and cannot rely upon their countrymen, and to take special care for the amelioration of their conditions. But we regret to note that no such protection has been given, or care has been taken for the amelioration of these Depressed, or more correctly the Oppressed, Classes. The Government is busy to see the claims of the agitators fulfilled, and the happiness of the happier more increased.

We venture to state that the British Government, on whom we look not only as our protector, but also as the God-sent deliverers of our misery, thought it insignificant, while enacting the Government of India Act of 1919, to take into consideration the claims and miseries of the Depressed Classes, and made no provision for the safeguard of these unfortunate people. How ludicrous it is that in that Act only one representative was suggested of so many people, numbering about one third of the total population of the province, and that also is by nomination, while other classes who have been occupying all the seats of the council by election, with as many as five more seats by nomination. While the employers have got the right of sending a large number of representatives, the labouring classes have got only two members by nomination. The land-holders, or zamindars, have got a special favour of sending from special constituency five of their men, in addition to about 75 more from the general constituencies. Over and above these, many of their men come in by nomination. As for the Assembly, the Depressed Classes have got no right to send their men. Even the nominations are made from the classes who have already captured the central legislative bodies, and are friends of the high officials or Ministers. Only for an excuse of the Statutory Royal Commission one gentleman from the Depressed Classes has been nominated to the Assembly this time. It is still more ludicrous that the members of the Non-depressed Classes have been eligible to represent the Depressed Classes.

We now humbly beg of the Commission to see that the British Government should issue instructions, in the line of the Instrument of Instructions issued to the Indian Government in the Act of 1919, and also make provision to carry the Instructions into action.

We humbly beg to impress upon the Commission that we have right to live as others do, and let our works be done by ourselves.

In conclusion, we beg to submit that we propose to tender oral evidence in support of the Memorandum on behalf of the All-Bengal Namasudra Association, and the Namasudra Community of Bengal. It was so resolved unanimously at a recent meeting of the members and the thinking leaders of the community. We have unanimously elected for this purpose Mr. Mukunda Behary Mullick, M.A., B.L., of No. 59, Badreedas Temple Street, Calcutta.

Memorandum submitted by the Bengal Depressed Classes Association.

In submitting the enclosed written statement we should like to make it clear that we have not put our suggestion regarding the several matters under enquiry by the Commission. We are of opinion that it is essential for us to submit in as clear terms as possible and it is no less important for the Commission to realise the true position that the Depressed Classes occupy in the country. So far as the details are concerned, we hope to make the same clear by our oral evidence which we tender in support, as also in amplification of the written statement submitted herewith.

At the same time, we should here like to state that we have had an opportunity of discussing the matters under enquiry by the Commission with the members of the Committee appointed by the All-Bengal Namasudra Association to draft their written statement, and we have also had opportunity of looking into their suggestions. We submit that we are in general agreement with the suggestions made by them and we adopt the same generally for the present. We only crave leave to be allowed to furnish details by oral evidence at the time of enquiry later on.

The Depressed Classes form more than 58 per cent. of the Hindu population of Bengal. According to last census their number is 11½ millions. The Namasudras are the most prominent class amongst them, numbering 2,007,259, in 1921. They have made vigorous, steady and successful fight for the self-elevation. Annual conferences are held to right their wrongs and advance their rights. They are the second Hindu caste in Bengal, the Chasi Kaibarta (Kahisya) alone being more numerous. They are in greatest strength in the districts of Faridpur, Backargonj, Dacca, Khulna, Jessore, and parts of Mymensingh, Tippera and Pobna. They have improved their economic position in recent years to some extent and, perhaps, would have shown better prospects but for the oppression by their landowners and money-lenders.

The expression "Depressed Classes" has attained a political significance which has been enhanced by the provision of their special though inadequate and nominal representation in the Legislative Council.

Some have taken objection to the term, Depressed Classes, as the classes included are not really low or in any way inferior to the so-called higher classes. Given equal opportunities they are capable of showing equal progress, as has been proved by the result of examinations.

The caste system stigmatises these classes as untouchables, as water touched by these classes of people is not drunk by the so-called higher classes. Their very presence in a room is said to pollute water and cooked food. They are not allowed to enter public temples. Mr. M. C. Kitter, in "A Study in Ideals," says :—"Caste is another of the institutions which by rigidity and tyranny plays a considerable part in retarding and hindering India's advancements. Castes in some form exist in every country, but elsewhere, as in ancient India, a member of one caste may by qualification, occupation and worthiness be shifted to another by acknowledged authority. The system of caste as instituted and as prevailed until the Aryan began to degenerate, was beneficial, since it regulated division of labour for the community." Sir T. Madhab Rao said :—"The longer one observes and thinks, the more does one feel that there is no community in the face of the earth that suffers less from political evils and more from self-inflicted, self-accepted or self-created and, therefore, avoidable evils than the Hindus."

Though these suppressed classes are classed and reckoned as Hindus they are denied all rights as Hindus and are really treated as people outside the pale of Hinduism.

The Depressed Classes in India form a vast multitude. A question that is agitating Hinduism at the present moment is as to whether these Classes should be counted as Hindus or not. Ten years ago the answer would have been emphatically in the negative; even now this conservative feeling of the country is for their exclusion. But the conscience of the more advanced section of the educated Hindus is a little sensitive on the point. It is awkward to be reminded by rival Muhammadan politicians that more than half of the total Hindu population is not accepted by Hindus as a part of themselves. It is obviously desired by the Hindus in the presence of such an argument to claim the Depressed Classes as within the pale of Hinduism. But if they are to be so reckoned, logic demands that they should be treated with greater consideration than at present. But the stoutest-hearted reformer admits to himself that these difficulties in the way of effective action in this matter are great; as strong as the hold that caste has on the Indian mind.

These suppressed classes prefer British rule to Home rule for India. They remain aloof from the Swadeshi boycott, non-co-operation and recent independence movement started by the handful of agitating Indians.

They are mostly agriculturists, labourers, artisans, and traders. They produce crops and maintain the so-called higher classes. Their improvement in the social and economic scale is due to British rule. But it is also necessary to mention here that the high Government officers, having been recruited from the so-called higher classes, put all possible obstacles in their way and the Government have not fully discharged their duties towards these classes in spreading education and giving suitable appointments to deserving candidates as an impetus to further progress. There are special schools for these classes outside Bengal, but no such school has been started in Bengal.

The Village Education Commission says: "Speaking generally, it is still the case that the casteman not only does nothing for the enlightenment of the outcaste, but puts positive obstacles in his way, knowing that if he is enlightened, he can no longer be exploited."

The Depressed Classes have from time immemorial been specially condemned to illiteracy by the brother Indians. The Education Commission of 1882 recommended that the principle that no boy be refused admission to a Government School or College on the ground of caste be reaffirmed and applied.

At the same time the Commission recommended that the establishment of special schools for children of low castes be liberally encouraged. During the last sixty years certain sections of the Depressed Classes, especially the Namasudras, are making sustained efforts to improve their condition and have organised themselves to some extent to support schools of their own. Towards the total of 96,552, which represents the pupils of the Depressed Classes under instruction in 1921–22, the Namasudra community alone contributed no less than 49,273. Out of 197 students of these classes in the University College, 144 belonged to the Namasudra community, in 1921–22. Owing to lack of incentive, the number of Namasudra students in high English School fell from 1,489, in 1916–17, to 1,025, in 1921–22. In primary education they have made considerable headway. The population and the number of literate males of the Depressed Classes are going below. At the time of making Permanent Settlement with the Zamindars of Bengal, Government assumed the power of enacting laws for the welfare of the tenants. But nothing has been done to protect them against the oppression and unlimited power of enhancement of rent by landlords. His Gracious Majesty the King Emperor in his Royal Proclamation regarding the inauguration of the Reformed Constitution, had the interest of not-fully-developed communities specially in mind and laid a special charge on the people and their representatives to protect them. We recall his gracious words: "In marching towards the goal there will be need of perseverance and of mutual forbearance between all sections and races of my people in India. I am confident that their high qualities will be forthcoming. I rely on the new popular assemblies to interpret wisely the wishes of those whom they represent and not to forget the interest of the masses who cannot yet be admitted to the franchise. I rely on the leaders of the people, the ministers of the future, to face responsibility and endure sacrifice for the common interest of the State."

A review of the work of the Legislature during the last few years will clearly show that the interest of the masses, the Depressed Classes and Raiyats are not safe in the hands of the so-called leaders.

Late Mr. E. S. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford, in their report on Indian Constitutional Reforms, said : "We have shown that the political education of the Raiyats cannot be rapid and may be a very difficult process. Till it is complete he must be exposed to the risk of oppression by people who are stronger and cleverer than he is, and until it is clear that his interest can be safely left to his own leaders or that the Legislative Councils represent and consider his interest we must retain power to protect him. We intend to make the best arrangements for their representation in order that they, too, ultimately learn the lesson of self-protection. But if it is found that their interests suffer and that they do not share in the general progress, we must retain the means in our hands of helping them."

The Bengal Electoral Rules provide that two persons shall be nominated to represent respectively the following classes or interest, namely : (i) the Indian Christian Community, and (ii) classes which in the opinion of the Governor are depressed classes ; and two shall be persons nominated to represent the labouring classes.

We fail to understand how the nomination of one member can be held to be the best arrangement for representation of the Depressed Classes, numbering at least 11½ millions according to the last census report, which has excluded such castes as Dhoba, Sunrri, etc., but who have been included in the list prepared by the Educational Commission with the Government of India, as given in the Calcutta University Commission Report, Vol. I, part 1, page 188, while two members are nominated to represent the labouring classes, numbering about 5 lacs (including females and children) and one member to represent about one lac Indian Christians only.

The so-called leaders, and more especially the self-assumed "heaven-born leaders," have done nothing, nor even made any provision for the protection of the Depressed Classes. Even the so-called All-Party Conference has not thought fit to consult the opinion of the Depressed Classes. On the contrary, attempts have been made to ignore them at all.

It has been proved beyond doubt that the present system of election is quite unfair to the Depressed Classes and the Raiyats. Landlords and money-lenders and men of influence and power, posing as friends of the Depressed Raiyats, manage to be returned as members in the Legislative Council, but that they forget their promises when the time of voting or a motion apparently against the interest of the Raiyats and the Depressed Classes come up before them in the Councils.

So, we earnestly suggest that a number of seats in proportion to population should be reserved for the Depressed Classes, and separate Electorates should be created for them. The franchise should be made as wide as possible. Every adult male member should be given the right to vote. The system of taking votes should be changed, so that there may be no difficulty for illiterate voters in recording their votes. Number of polling stations should be so increased as to be easily accessible to the voters.

The Depressed Classes should have their due share in the administration and public services. Government posts are mostly at the disposal of the Indian officers, who are not sympathetic towards these Classes, and in spite of the repeated assurance of Government that the claims of the deserving candidates of the Depressed Classes will be sympathetically considered we see every day that our deserving candidates are superseded by the influence of Hindu officials. So we press for reservation of at least 40 per cent. of the posts for the Depressed Classes.

We beg, in conclusion, to submit that we adduce oral evidence in support and in amplification of the written statement by furnishing details. It was also unanimously resolved at a Special Conference of the Association ; and Mr. Dhananjoy Roy, M.A.B.L., Pleader, Alipore, 24 Perganas, Secretary, Bengal Depressed Classes Association, and Rai Sahib Rebati Mohan Sarker, N.L.C., Vice-President of the Association, have been selected for the purpose.

CALCUTTA.
21st January, 1929.

PRESENT :

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT DR. SUHRAWARDY), AND OF THE BENGAL PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the Bengal Depressed Classes Association and the All-Bengal Namasudra Association.

The deputation consisted of :—

Mr. MUKUNDA BEHARY MULLICK, M.A., B.L., President, Namasudra Association.
RAI SAHIB REBATI MOHAN SIRCAR, M.L.C.
Mr. DHANANJOY ROY, M.A., B.L.
Mr. MONO MOHAN DAS.
Mr. JAYA GOPAL BISWAS.
Mr. BIRAT CHANDRA MANDAL.
Mr. RADHA NATH DAS.
Mr. BHARAT CHANDRA SIRCAR.
Mr. RASIK LAL BISWAS, B.A.
Dr. BANAMALI DAS.

1. The Chairman : Mr. Mullick, you, I think, are the president of the Namasudra Association ?—(Mr. Mullick) Yes, sir.

2. And we are receiving together the representatives of the Bengal Depressed Classes Association and the All-Bengal Namasudra Association ?—That is so.

3. To a very large extent they have got similar points of view, and we see that there are a number of other gentlemen with you; of whom, I think, some are members of the Bengal Depressed Classes Association ?—Yes, they are.

4. And others are members of the All-Bengal Namasudra Association ?—Yes.

* * * * * * * *

5. Rao Bahadur Rajah : * * * Mr. Mullick, you represent both the Bengal Depressed Classes Association and the All-Bengal Namasudra Association ?—Yes, I do.

6. These are the two pioneer Associations in the Bengal presidency ?—That is so.

7. Apart from these you have got minor Associations also ?—There are.

8. On page 96 of the memorandum from the Bengal Depressed Classes Association you say that the population of the Depressed Classes in Bengal is eleven and a half millions ?—That is so ; it will be more now. We have taken the figure from the Government census report.

9. That forms about 58 per cent. of the Hindu population of Bengal ?—That is so.

10. On the same page you say : " The caste " system stigmatises these classes as untouchables, " as water touched by these classes of people " is not drunk by the so-called higher classes." We understand that. But you further on say : " Their " very presence in a room is said to pollute water " and cooked food." ?—Yes, that is so.

11. " They are not allowed to enter public temples." Will you just make it clear to the Commission what is meant by that ?—If a Depressed Class man enters a room where there is water and food cooked by a high class Hindu, that water and food will at once become polluted. With regard to public temples, the Depressed Class people are not allowed to enter them. A case of this kind has happened recently, and the case also went up to court.

12. How do these Depressed Classes live in the mofussil ?—They live in the villages, but they have got their own localities, what are called pattis, pallis, paras, and so on. They do not live side by side with the caste-Hindus.

13. Am I to understand that the Depressed Classes live in separate localities called pallis, pattis, and so on ?—Yes, that is the situation.

14. And these are known as Muchi pallis, Chandal paras, and so on ?—Yes.

15. Supposing a member of the Depressed Classes wants to go and live in a caste village, will he be allowed there ?—I think not.

16. I suppose you have got wells dug out by district boards ?—Yes.

17. Are there wells dug out by the district boards in these pallis, and so on ?—We have not any.

18. Supposing these people want to take water, will they be allowed to take water from the district board wells ?—Certainly not.

19. Then what do they do ?—In Bengal we have got canals, tanks in the pallis and paras.

20. Are you allowed to take water from the tanks ?—If the tanks are situated in the caste-Hindu quarter we are not allowed to take water, and even if they are allowed, they will be allowed to take water from particular portions of the tank.

21. I am told that a certain dirty corner of the tank is allotted to these Depressed Classes; is it a fact ?—It is a fact.

22. As regard the children of the Depressed Classes, have you separate schools conducted by the district boards or local boards or municipal councils in these village parts ?—No.

23. Then where do these children read ?—It is very difficult to find accommodation for them. That is the difficulty in many cases.

24. I suppose there are district board schools ?—Yes.

25. Where are they located ?—Mostly in the caste-Hindu quarters.

26. If the children of the Depressed Classes want to read they have to go to the caste-Hindu quarter ?—Yes.

27. Do they get admission there ?—It is very difficult and the distance also is very great. Admission is not always given.

28. Are these children provided with separate benches in the schools ?—When they get admission, that is the position.

29. The caste-Hindu boys are allowed to sit with their shoes on, whereas the boys of the Depressed Classes are asked to remove their shoes when they enter the school ?—Yes ; they are not allowed to put their shoes on when they read in these schools.

30. As regards water facilities in the schools, do these Depressed Class children get water to drink when they get thirsty ?—That is another difficulty. There is no arrangement for these children to drink water. I myself had the experience in my boyhood. We have to wait outside the room where water is kept till a caste-Hindu friend comes and puts water in our hands.

31. You are not given even a vessel ?—No.

32. Are the Depressed Class children allowed to touch the caste-Hindu children in the schools ?—No.

33. Supposing by accident he touches ?—Then the consequence is very serious. The Depressed Class boy will be thrashed. Recently there was a case. The parent of the caste-Hindu boy who was touched by the Depressed Class boy thrashed the latter, and the case went up to the court with the result that the parent was fined Rs.10. That happened recently.

34. Are these stray cases ?—No, no. I am only giving the cases which are uppermost in my mind at the present moment. These are common occurrences.

35. Do barbers shave you ?—No : the barbers that shave the high caste Hindus do not shave us.

36. Do the dhobies wash your clothes ?—No, not the ordinary dhobi.

37. You have got your own barbers, your own dhobies, your own priests, and so on from your community itself ?—Yes.

38. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : What do these priests call themselves ?—They call themselves priests. They belong to our class. Even our gods are Depressed.

39. Rao Bahadur Rajah : The ordinary Bengali Hindu barber or dhobi will not do service to you ?—No.

40. You are an educated man ?—Yes I think so.

41. You know some time ago there was an agitation that in the hotels and refreshment rooms in Edinburgh the Indian students were not allowed to enter. Will you kindly tell the Commission whether in the hotels and refreshment rooms run by the Hindus in Bengal, the members of the Depressed Classes are allowed to enter ?—Not at all.

42. Even though you pay double the price ?—If they know the caste, they will never allow you.

43. You have got your own temples and mandirs ?—Yes.

44. You have got your own gods ?—Yes.

45. The caste-Hindus do not worship them ?—There is no question of worship ; they do not even bow down to them.

46. They consider them as untouchable gods ?—Yes.

47. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : What sort of gods have you got ?—We have got the same gods as the caste Hindus have. The gods are the same ; the idols are different.

48. The Chairman : Will you kindly tell me which caste you belong to ?—The Namasudra community.

49. There are nearly two millions of them ?—That is the number in Bengal.

50. Rao Bahadur Rajah : You have post offices in these localities of yours ?—No.

51. Post boxes ?—No.

52. Supposing a member of your community wants to buy a post-card, what does he do ?—He has to go to the post office, which is situated in the caste-Hindu quarter. He has to throw the pice on the counter and the post-card is thrown back by the clerk in charge. The clerk does not take the coin from the hands of the Depressed Class man, nor does he hand over the card to him. He throws it to him.

53. You have got your hereditary titles, like Mandal, Patre, Rai, Mullick and so on ?—Yes.

54. Suppose there is a Depressed Class man, Akshay Kumar Sircar, the letter is not delivered to him as such, unless the term "Muchi" is added ?—Yes, unless his caste is put down.

55. If he wants to buy a post-card, he has to stand in the verandah and pass on the coin to the clerk, who will throw the card to him ?—Yes. He will not take the money from the hands of the Depressed Class man.

The Chairman : The difficulty about all this is this. We have heard it in different forms, I am sure, with a great deal of sympathy and interest. This is a constitutional enquiry, as you know, and what is the direction in which the constitution of India, which is a written constitution, must be changed ? I am not quite clear what all this is going to lead to.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : The reason why I am putting these questions is this. The condition of the Depressed Classes in the Madras Presidency was worse. The Depressed Class man could not even enter the street in which the post office was located. Now, gradually, on account of bringing such questions in the Legislative Councils, such things are being set right. What I wish to point out is that unless we have got proper representation, these social differences cannot be set right.

56. The Chairman : That is perfectly to the point. That is raising a constitutional question. This is all designed to show, is it, that this very large population, 11½ millions, according to one figure, of castes that are called Depressed in the presidency cannot expect to get their condition of things improved until their representation in the council is increased ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : Yes, that is my point.

The Chairman : I should like to know from this deputation what representation they suggest. What do they want ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : I will bring out the point, sir.

57. Even the postmen do not enter these Depressed Class localities ?—No. If by chance they find anyone near about the post office, they send all the letters through him. It does not matter to him whether the letter reaches the proper man or not.

58. Mr. Hartshorn : You mean to say that there is no provision made by the postal authorities to have any letter addressed to your community properly delivered ?—The postal authorities might have. But what we find is that letters are not delivered to us except through this channel that I have mentioned. The letters are sent through anybody whom the postmen meet.

59. Colonel Lane-Fox : Do you ever report ?—We can make reports, but the difficulty is about enquiry.

60. The Chairman : Better make it plain, if you will. The difficulty, you say, is about the enquiry ; what does it mean ?—Unless the letters are registered, there is no record of them. If you go and make a complaint, they may say, "No such letter has been received." We have got a journal of ours, and we find that when it is sent out to the persons by value payable post it is often returned as refused, while we know that it is never taken to the addressee.

61. At present there is a nominated member of the Bengal council, nominated by the Government, to represent those classes which in its opinion are Depressed. You have such a member ?—Yes, he is my friend, Rai Sahib Sircar, who is here.

62. Rai Sahib, has this last matter about the post office come to your notice ?—(Rai Sahib Sircar) Yes.

63. Have you ever raised the question on behalf of your constituents in the Legislative Council ?—I am alone in the Council and it is very difficult to bring it in the Council.

64. Rao Bahadur Rajah : As regards schools and colleges, you have got also hostels in which the Depressed Class students are admitted ?—(Mr. Mullick) They are not admitted into the hostels.

65. I understand there are some hostels here in which they are admitted. In such cases do they dine jointly with the other students ?—Separate arrangements are made for accommodation and for food.

66. They have got to clean their own utensils ?—Yes.

67. But in the case of the caste Hindus ?—They are provided with servants.

68. In some hostels where bathing ghats in tanks are provided, there are separate ghats for the Depressed Class students ?—Yes.

69. They do not have a joint mess with the caste-Hindu students ?—They do not have.

70. There is a Government Sanskrit College in Bengal ?—Yes.

71. Are the Depressed Classes allowed into this college ?—No.

72. You are a member of the Bar ?—I am.

73. Even in the Bar library there are different arrangements for drinking water ?—In the district and sub-divisional courts there are different arrangements.

74. Separate tumblers are kept ?—Yes.

75. The boy in charge of the caste-Hindu room refuses to serve water to you ?—Yes, that is so.

76. I suppose there are a number of graduates in your community ?—There are a fair number.

77. Four hundred to five hundred ?—Yes.

78. There are M.A.'s and B.A.'s ?—Yes.

79. Are there many of them in the public service ?—Only a few.

80. I should like to know whether they find any difficulty in entering the provincial or subordinate services ?—Yes, they do find difficulty.

81. I understand as recently as January, 1921 (1928 ?) they recruited some sub-registrars ?—Yes.

82. And for that the Government asked the various Commissioners to send up nominations ?—Yes.

83. The Commissioners in turn asked the various Collectors ?—Yes.

84. That is, qualified candidates for these posts ?—That is so.

85. In the Dacca division, I understand, the Commissioner sent in four nominations ?—Yes.

86. Two Hindus and two Muhammadans ?—Yes, that is so.

87. Out of these two Hindus only an M.A. belonged to your community ?—To one of the Depressed Classes.

88. And the other was a B.A., a Kayastha ?—Yes.

89. Of the other two Muhammadans, one was an M.A. and the other a B.A. ?—Yes.

90. And out of these, two were appointed ?—Yes.

91. Although in the notification it was said that preference would be given to Backward and Depressed Classes ?—I believe that was the notification.

92. In spite of that they thought it fit to offer the appointment to the B.A. Kayastha, overlooking the Depressed Class M.A.'s claims ?—Yes, it was published in the last Gazette.

93. Again, in June, 1928, in the Dacca Civil Court, there were a number of vacancies for clerks, but they did not even care to advertise ?—That was what we knew.

94. There were a number of graduates belonging to the Depressed Classes who sent in their applications for these clerkships, but the son of an official who was a Matriculate was preferred ?—That we discovered later.

95. And a brother-in-law of the head clerk, an undergraduate, was preferred ?—Yes.

96. And the graduates belonging to the Depressed Classes did not get a chance ?—No.

97. And recently, about five months ago, there were some appointments under the Controller of Currency, in Bengal ?—Yes, and also under the Accountant General, Bengal.

98. There, also, members of the Depressed Classes who were graduates, applied for those posts ?—They did.

99. And they did not get them ?—No, although an advertisement was made and it was said in the advertisement that some appointments would be reserved for them.

100. Also, as regards sub-registrars in Khulna, Faridpur and Jessore districts, several members of the Depressed Classes, graduates, applied for these appointments, but they were not preferred ?—They were nominated by the Collectors, but I do not know what happened after that.

The Chairman : It seems to me, Mr. Rajah, that you have given us, with the help of the witnesses, some illustrations. It may be that they may be challenged ; but let us assume that it does indicate, and it does seem to me it indicates, a very grave social condition in India. Now, I would like to know from this deputation what it is that they suggest should be done ?

101. Rao Bahadur Rajah : Mr. Mullick, till to-day, the 21st January, 1929, you have been exercising your franchise in a joint electorate ?—That is so.

102. Although you do not have joint worship, you do not have joint messing, joint bathing and joint social functions ?—Yes.

103. And you have been rubbing shoulders with high-caste Hindus ?—Yes.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : Why do you want separate electorates now ?

104. The Chairman : I understand, at present, members of the Depressed Classes, if they had the franchise qualification would have voted in the non-Muhammadan constituencies ?—That is so.

105. In substance they have been voting with the other Hindus ?—That is so.

106. Now, you say you would like to have separate electorates for these Depressed Classes ?—Yes, sir.

107. Will you explain to us, why ?—We see the position that we have been driven to after exercising our vote in the joint electorate with the high-caste Hindus, and but for that condition, perhaps, there would have been no necessity for us to come before this Commission and put forward our grievances which we have been feeling from time immemorial. It is for that reason that we ask for a separate electorate, so that we might be entitled to return our own representatives, our true representatives, to the Council, from where we know all this may be remedied.

108. Just let me put this question to you. We want to consider this in a practical way. You may be quite sure that we feel a great deal of sympathy with the kind of difficulties that you describe, but we want to see how far constitutional arrangements are likely to help you. Are you proposing that the franchise under which members of the Depressed Classes can vote is to be the same as the franchise for other people, or different ?—That we have to leave to this Commission, but we have suggested in our Memorandum that the franchise should be given to every adult male member.

109. You want adult franchise ?—Yes.

110. Unfortunately, there is a good deal of illiteracy as yet in India, though generally speaking, Bengal has a very good record so far as literacy is concerned. But considering the disadvantages of the Depressed Classes in regard to schools and so on, I should fear there would be at least as high a percentage of illiteracy amongst the Depressed Classes as in any other section of the population, is not there ?—The percentage of illiteracy is very great, no doubt.

111. Are you proposing adult suffrage for the Depressed Classes in spite of the fact that they have a very large percentage of illiteracy ? They would be able to vote, would not they, only because the returning officer would try to find out what they wanted to do ?—Some method must be found so that they can exercise their vote freely.

112. Are you content to leave to a high-caste Hindu the business of being a returning officer and marking your ballot paper as you want it marked ?—We have suggested in the Memorandum that to obviate that difficulty coloured boxes for the different candidates should be used in the polling booths, so that the voter may know for whom he is voting and where to put his voting paper.

113. The coloured box plan ? I see. There is another thing you have to deal with. In so far as it is a question of ostracism by high-caste Hindus, you people suffer because you are regarded as being inside the Hindu circle ; but there are some people, who are in a very backward or depressed condition who are not Hindus at all ?—I do not know whom you would mean by them. We are speaking of those who are by chance regarded as Hindus, for lack of another name.

114. What I mean is this. Do you think it would be justifiable to give a franchise as wide as adult suffrage to the Depressed members of the large Hindu community, but to leave unenfranchised people who are at the lowest level, let us say, among the Muhammadans or other communities ?—So far as this deputation is concerned, we are here to submit our case. That question has not been considered by our Association, and I am not in a position to give a straight answer to it.

115. There is one other thing I should like you to tell me. One observes, of course, that you, sir, are an advocate, and we have heard that a number of members of the Depressed Classes are M.A.'s and people who have done well in the University. Do you not think there has been some improvement in the last twenty years ?—In what way ?

116. Do not you think the position of the Depressed Classes has improved in the last generation ?—There may be grades. In the matter of education, we have been forced to establish schools for ourselves, and there has been some improvement ; but so far as other aspects of the matter are concerned, and with regard to what we understand to be the object of this Commission, so far as getting proper representation in the administration of the country is concerned we are as backward as before.

117. Let us take it in figures. How many members out of the whole do you think the Depressed Classes should have ? Can you suggest any figure ?—We are not in a position to give the number at once, because the whole thing has to be considered. The figures are with Government, and it may be for this Commission to decide what the number should be.

118. I am putting difficulties, not because I am in the least unsympathetic, but because I want you to deal with them. The difficulty which has been suggested is this. You obviously could not make a franchise for the Depressed Classes unless you had a list giving every man's name, so that every man was on a list of voters. Do you think the list of castes is so clearly established that there is no dispute as to which castes are Depressed and which are not ? —I believe that point is not open to any further debate, because in the council Government were asked several times as to which these castes were, and I remember Sir Hugh Stephenson (the present Governor of Bihar and Orissa) said that it had been settled once for all, and that it was down in the Government records what these castes were.

119. You see, the census gives a list of castes, and the numbers add up to just over eleven millions ?—Yes.

120. But not very long ago there was the Calcutta University Commission, and they looked into this and published a list of castes which was not the same as the census list, and their list adds up, not to eleven, but to seven millions. Everything depends, does not it, on which castes you include ?—Perhaps an objection was raised by some of the castes which were included in the census list, and they asked not to be included in the Calcutta University Commission list.

121. Those were the difficulties which occurred to me, Mr. Mullick. I am not in the least (as I have told you already) lacking in sympathy, nor are any of us, but we are engaged on a practical task, and we want all the help we can get to enable us to discharge it. You think those difficulties could be got over, and you would prefer election to nomination ?—Yes. We prefer election to nomination.

122. Are you quite satisfied that in the present state of affairs if there was an election the Depressed Classes would not be under a good deal of influence to vote for somebody whom other people wanted elected ?—If they had a separate electorate there would not be that trouble.

123. Are you sure of that ?—Yes.

124. Rao Bahadur Rajah : Up to now you have been exercising the franchise in a joint electorate ? —Yes.

125. What happened in the 1921 election ? Am I right when I say that because you were in a joint electorate the caste people, who predominated in great numbers, put up an ordinary illiterate cobbler to spite your community, and he was returned to the council ?—Yes. Although there were many qualified candidates, these people put up an illiterate cobbler to put us to disgrace.

126. But if you had a separate electorate, you would return your true representatives ? You would be able to return the men whom you would like to have as your representatives if you were acting alone and independently ?—That is so.

127. Moreover, am I to understand that a separate electorate will be a sort of political school for educating your community in the effort to exercise the franchise and criticise policy ?—Yes.

128. If you have a separate electorate, you will be articulate, and will be socially respected by other people ?—That is so.

129. Rai Sahib, you are a member of the Legislative Council ?—(Rai Sahib Sirçar) Yes.

130. What do you think of the attitude of that body towards the Depressed Clases ?—It is unsatisfactory.

131. Has any legislation been attempted in your council to ameliorate the lot of the Depressed Classes ? —No.

132. Has any legislation been passed of practical use to these people ?—No.

133. Since the inauguration of the Reforms, has Government secured to members of the Depressed Classes their civic rights, which have been denied them for ages ?—(Mr. Mullick) No.

134. Are you satisfied that the Government have used their right of nominating Depressed Class representatives to local bodies properly ?—No.

135. The Chairman : I do not follow this. What right of nomination to local bodies do you refer to ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : I am speaking of nomination of members to District Boards and Municipal Councils.

136. The Chairman : I realise the Government has the power to nominate people, but is there anything in the law which says that these people are to represent the Depressed Classes ? I do not think so.—(Mr. Mullick) There is nothing in the law, but we feel that in the case of District and Local Boards which deal with district and sub-divisional local affairs, after the elections are over, when the Government and the Government Officer who is there (the Collector or Commissioner) finds there is this body of people who have not been able to return their candidates, it is the duty of that officer to get over the difficulty by nominating some one of them, and that has not been done.

137. It is a general power of nomination ?—Yes.

138. And you think the Government, in filling these nominated posts, has not considered sufficiently the importance of getting, amongst others, Depressed Class men nominated ?—That is so.

139. Sir Hari Singh Gour : I do not think that is what Mr. Mullick means. I think he means Government have nominated members of the Depressed Classes, but not of the right type ?—No, I did not mean that. In most cases they have not nominated any representative of the Depressed Classes. It is not a question of right type or wrong type ; in most cases they have not nominated anybody.

140. When they have been nominated, have not they been your representatives ?—Only on one or two boards.

141. Rao Bahadur Rajah : Out of the 27 Boards in this Presidency. With regard to adult franchise, if it is not possible to have it, if there are difficulties in forming these big electorates, what is your alternative ?—We would not press for that for the present, because there may be difficulties.

142. The Chairman : What is your alternative ? —We want separate electorates, of course.

143. Rao Bahadur Rajah : But as regards the franchise ?—To lower the present one. That we leave to the Commission. The present franchise is Re1 cess or Rs2 chaukidari tax or income tax. We would suggest as an alternative the payment of any cess—not a Re1 qualification—and the minimum cess which can now be paid is 6 annas. Payment of any cess should be a qualification for that purpose. We would not go to the length of adult franchise at present, but would leave it there.

144. The Chairman : Have you any kind of idea how many of the Depressed Classes are enfranchised and vote under the present constitution—how many out of your eleven and a half millions ?—It is difficult to give an exact idea.

145. I am sure it is, but is there any sort of guide you can give us ?—We shall have to find out an approximate figure, but it is very difficult to get at the exact number.

146. Rao Bahadur Rajah : Can you give any percentage, any proportion ?—It is difficult to give a percentage, but no doubt large numbers of our people have the franchise.

147. And you want representation in proportion to your population ?—Yes, that is what we want.

148. Lord Burnham : On page 169 of the Government Book,* there is a paragraph 237 on the attitude of the Council here towards the Depressed Classes, and it ends by a quotation : " There is more than " a little truth in the bitter words of a speaker on the " Budget of 1922 "—and these are the words—" ' So " far as sweet words are concerned, I admit that " from the highest rulers of the province to the so- " called Leagues, every one shows sympathy with " the condition of the Backward Classes. But when " the time for practical action comes, all sympathy " evaporates.' " Do you believe that to be a true statement ?—That is an exact statement of affairs.

149. Then if the main thing is that you should get adequate representation, supposing it is not found possible to give you the adult franchise for which you make a claim, you would rather, I imagine, have a system of representation by nomination than a franchise restricted as the general franchise is now for your own castes ?—We should go in for a separate electorate rather than ask for nomination.

150. Mr. Hartshorn : I would like to pursue the question put by Lord Burnham. I understand that what you desire is that we should adopt adult suffrage ?—Yes, that is our submission.

151. And running with that, you would like to have separate electorates in which the Depressed Classes would elect their own representatives ?—Yes.

152. You say, if you cannot have adult suffrage you would like to have such a lowering of the qualification as would bring in a much larger number of your community as voters than at present ?—Yes.

153. Suppose the Commission are unable to recommend adult suffrage or separate electorates for the Depressed Classes, but would be prepared to recommend adequate representation for the Depressed Classes by nomination, what would you regard as adequate representation for your community if nomination were decided upon ?—We would not go in for nomination at all, and that is the view that we come to as an Association, and, having seen the unsatisfactory results of the nomination in the last three elections, we would not go in for nomination at all.

154. How many seats do you think should be reserved for you if you were to have your own electorates ?—That, of course, ought to be left to this Commission, because it is so difficult to give a straight answer at once.

155. You are 25 per cent., 11½ millions out of 46 millions ; that is your population ratio ?—Yes.

156. Assuming that figure to be correct, are you expecting to get seats in proportion to your population, or something less than that, or something more ?—We expect to have seats according to the proportion of our population.

157. Then you expect to get 25 per cent. of the seats in the Council ?—That is our expectation.

Sir Sankaran Nair : They have said that in their Memorandum.

Mr. Hartshorn : I see in their Memorandum they are asking for 40 per cent. of the posts.

Sir Sankaran Nair : Yes, and 25 per cent. of the seats. Would you allow me, sir, to put in one word of explanation ?

The Chairman : Certainly.

158. Sir Sankaran Nair : You claim adult suffrage, but in all the Memoranda you say you want adult male suffrage, and you object to women's suffrage. Do you depart from that position ?—We have asked for adult male suffrage and not female suffrage.

159. And you oppose the female suffrage ?—Yes.

160. Your position is the same now, also ; you do not want women's suffrage ?—No. Our position is the same.

161. Mr. Hartshorn : Why ?—We have made that clear in the written statement, because of the illiteracy and the religious superstition, and all that. We would suffer most. Our womenfolk would not be prepared to go to the polling-booth. We are talking of the present ; having seen the past. We do not know what will happen in future.

162. Lord Strathcona : When you ask for 40 per cent. of the posts in the Services, do you mean the higher posts, or 40 per cent. of all the posts in the Services ?—Here we have put down all the posts that are given by the provincial Government, and we have given the reason that up till now our representation in the public administration has been absolutely inadequate ; and for some time to come, to ameliorate the conditions and to give us better encouragement, we want our proper share of the administration.

163. Do you think enough members of your community are qualified educationally for those posts ?—Yes.

164. You can produce your 40 per cent. if you can get the jobs ?—Yes.

165 Major Attlee : You say you are opposed to women's suffrage, but you want to get rid of your disabilities. Are not you going to leave one great class, the women, labouring under the disability of no representation ?—The women to-day have to depend on the incomes of their husbands and fathers and brothers. That will have to come at some later time.

166. They are economically Depressed as well ?—They are Depressed in their family relations as well.

The Chairman : They are the Depressed sex !

167. Maharaja Shashi Kanta : Are not your Depressed Classes untouchable amongst yourselves ? —We have not known of any.

168. Would a benefit to one class be considered a benefit to all the classes ?—That is what we feel ; and that is the decision we have come to.

169. Mr. Cadogan : Would you mind repeating that answer ? I did not catch it ?—I believe the Maharaja's question is whether a benefit to one of the communities would benefit the rest. I said that is so, so far as the Depressed Classes are concerned.

170. The Chairman : I have not followed the point before, which was an interesting question. The Maharaja, I think, was asking whether, if you take this long list of castes, if you add up the eleven-and-a-half millions, there are some of them who in the social scale would regard themselves as superior, and others in a lower scale—as Depressed as compared with them ?—So far as this list of the people whom we have the honour to represent is concerned, they have not got any idea like that. I do not know if it has been brought to the notice of this Commission that after these three high castes there are these nine classes. They might think in any way they like; and they are not put down in the Depressed Classes.

171. I do not know about Bengal, but I have some information about Madras, that in Madras there are Depressed castes that will not take water from another and inferior Depressed caste ?—I have no idea of Madras.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : That is not the case now.

172. The Chairman : Then there is an improvement ?—Yes.

173. Lord Burnham ; Since when ? When did the improvement come about ?—Since the last ten years or so. It is because our Associations are working for these things.

174. The Chairman : You think there is a solidarity, is there, growing up amongst the different Depressed Classes ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : Yes.

175. Maulvi Abul Kasem : You say that you feel various difficulties in your daily life, and that your representation in the public services, by which I understand in the actual administration of the country, is very small.?—Yes.

176. May I ask you if it is a fact or otherwise that for want of proper representation in the administration of the country you have suffered not only socially, but politically and economically ?—That is so.

177. And you are not allowed to advance because your representation in the machinery of administration is very meagre ?—That is a fact.

178. From the replies you gave to the Maharaja, I understand that you are an entirely separate and definite community from the caste Hindus ?—Certainly.

179. And you want, therefore, to protect your rights by a separate electorate and a separate quota of representation in the legislature ?—That is so.

180. And also in the machinery of administration of the Government ?—Yes.

181. The education of your community, education in Bengal, is controlled by three different agencies—by the Government, by municipalities and by district boards ?—Yes.

182. Can you tell us how far you have benefited from all of these bodies in the question of your education ?—Well, so far as the last two are concerned, Municipalities and District Boards, we have received very little benefit from there, but from the Government recently we have got some little help in the shape of the grant of hostels, and so on, and I believe it was in Lord Ronaldshay's time.

183. In the City of Calcutta, in the Medical College Hospital, at a special part of the hospital which was built by a member of the Depressed Classes, your members of that community were not admitted ?—That is what we learnt some time ago.

184. But one of the hospitals built by a member of the Depressed Classes at his cost—the members of that community were not admitted to it ?—That is exactly what we heard.

185. Mr. Hartshorn : They are admitted now ?

Maulvi Abul Kasem : Admitted because the donor of the building was a member of the Depressed Classes himself ?—That is what happened in the case of the Hindu School as well.

* * * * * * * *

190. Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi : What is your idea about the transfer of Law and Order to a popular Minister ?—We have said in our Memorandum, as a result of our deliberations, that that should at present rest with the Governor and be a reserved and not a transferred subject.

191. You want a separate electorate and separate representation, but I do not think you have told us how many seats you ask for ?—In proportion to our population.

192. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You say you would like the transfer of every subject except Law and Order ?—Yes.

193. But in the penultimate paragraph on page 96 of your Memorandum you say you "prefer "British Rule to Home Rule for India" ?—Yes, that is what we have stated.

194. Is that your considered point of view ?—Yes, that was put down as a result of the deliberations of our Association.

195. Rao Bahadur Rajah : Please read the next sentence also : it explains the whole thing.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : No, it does not. I want to ask you, Mr. Mullick, what is your view as to the political advancement of India ? To what extent is your community prepared to advocate a political advance in the constitutional development of this country ?—I am afraid I am not in a position to give a straight answer to that question, as that matter has not been considered by our Association.

196. So far as the political advancement of this country is concerned, I take it your Association makes no statement ?—That is so.

197. And this remark to which you have committed yourselves, that you prefer British rule to Home Rule for India, is only a reference to the Swadeshi movement, the Swarajist movement and the recent "independence" stunt ?—It also refers to the sufferings we have experienced as a result of all this.

198. It is an expression of the great disappointment you have felt at the sufferings your community has undergone ?—Yes.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : And beyond that it has no significance ?

The Chairman : I read it like this, and I think you will probably agree with me, Sir Hari Singh. I think these gentlemen have come here to call the attention of the Conference to the seriousness of their social disabilities, and their deputation serves a very useful purpose in calling attention to that. I think they have said very frankly that as for the rest of it they are thinking of the representation of their own classes. I do not think they are offering any sort of view as to the future of India ; I doubt if they have thought that out.

* * * * * * * *

201. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : Is not it a fact there are half a dozen Depressed Class men who are members of the Provincial Council here in Bengal ? —No, we have one nominated and two elected only, and those two came in with the other people.

202. Rao Bahadur Rajah : Are not these two helping you ?—No, not in the least.

203. Why ?—Because they came in with the caste Hindus.

204. You mean because they came into the Council with the support of the caste Hindus ?—Yes.

* * * * * * * *

222. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : I should like to know whether there are some signs of improvement in the relations between your classes and the Hindu classes in the last ten years, since the removal of untouchability has been one of the foremost items of the leaders ?—We have painful evidence to the contrary.

223. So you think there has been no improvement ? —No, except in the passing of resolutions.

224. Sir Zulfiquar Ali Khan : Do the Christians and the Moslems treat you as untouchables ?—We have no instance of that.

225. Do you really consider yourselves, therefore, outside the pale of society ?—For all practical purposes.

226. Do not you follow the Hindu rite ?—We have to. We are called Hindus for want of a better name.

Memorandum, submitted by the General Committee of the Darjeeling Planters' Association in connection with the case of the Tea Industry in Darjeeling.

Introduction. The Tea Industry in Darjeeling may be regarded as having been established as a commercial enterprise in the year 1856. In that year the Alubari Tea Garden was opened by the Kurseong and Darjeeling Tea Co., and another was started on the Lebong spur by the Darjeeling Land Mortgage Bank, these gardens being followed, in 1859, by the Dhutaria Garden. Between 1860 and 1864, four gardens situated at Ging, Ambutia, Takdah and Phubsering were established by the Darjeeling Tea Co., in addition to the gardens at Tukvar and Badamtam opened by the Lebong Tea Co. By the end of 1866, that is to say, ten years after the establishment of the Industry on a commercial basis, there were no less than 39 gardens with 10,000 acres under tea cultivation and an outturn of approximately 433,000 lbs. of tea.

The latest available official statistics, being those for the calendar year 1927, show the number of tea plantations in the Darjeeling District at the end of that year as 168 with 60,110 acres under tea out of a total area of 157,016 acres in the occupation of tea concerns. The official returns give the daily average number of employees as 60,504 souls. The capital employed in the Darjeeling Tea Industry is estimated at approximately Rs. 15 crores, and the production of tea in 1927 was 20,789,169 lbs.

The Darjeeling Planters' Association. The objects of this Association are :—To watch and protect the general interests of the Tea Industry in the Darjeeling District. To focus the considered opinions of its members on matters affecting the welfare of the Industry and the interests of the Planting Community. To represent effectively such opinions and interests to Government and to other authorities and public bodies and especially to the Indian Tea Association (Calcutta). To foster unanimity and co-operation among the Planting Community. To take such legal action as may be called for in the interests of the Association, and to raise the funds necessary to carry out these objects.

For administrative purposes the Darjeeling District is divided by the Association into 8 sub-districts, namely :—

(1) Darjeeling West,
(2) Darjeeling East,
(3) Teesta Valley,
(4) Rungbong Valley,
(5) Sonada,
(6) Tingling,
(7) Kurseong, and
(8) Mahanadi.

Each centre elects a local Committee annually from its number, and each of these local Committees is entitled to one representative on the Governing body of the Association. This Governing body consists of the following twelve members, i.e., a President and a Vice-President to be elected at each annual general meeting; the eight local Committee representatives, excluding the Chairman and Vice-Chairman; and two additional members, other than the Chairman and Vice-Chairman and the eight elected members, to be elected at the annual general meeting. This Governing body conducts the affairs and controls the funds of the Association, and their duties are performed in an honorary capacity. The membership of the Association comprises 86 tea estates representing an area of 105,000 acres, with a labour force with dependants of approximately 104,000 souls, who are entirely of the Nepalese race and form a well-settled population residing on the gardens. About 9 per cent. of the area under tea cultivation is owned and controlled by Indians, the balance, namely 91 per cent., being controlled by Companies managed from Calcutta and London and proprietory concerns.

Purport of this Memorandum. The purport of this Memorandum is to place before the Statutory Commission certain facts, particularly concerning the Darjeeling District, which it is hoped the Statutory Commission will take into consideration in the course of the inquiry they are now undertaking into the working of the system of Government, the growth of education and the development of representative institutions in British India and matters connected therewith.

The first matter of paramount importance to this Association is the question as to whether or not the Darjeeling District should or should not remain, as at present, a declared "backward tract," which is excluded from the jurisdiction of the Reformed Provincial Council and administered by the Head of the Province. This matter has been fully considered by the Governing body of this Association in close consultation with the local Committees and the members they represent, and it is the unanimous opinion that the Darjeeling District should remain, as it is now, under the direct administration of the Governor of Bengal.

The factors which influenced Government, in 1919, to exclude the Darjeeling District from the operation of the Reforms Scheme are as strong to-day as they were then. Geographically, racially, and historically the Darjeeling District is distinct from the remainder of Bengal, being mainly a hill district in which the conditions of climate, agriculture, communications, and other considerations differ widely from those obtaining in the plains of Bengal. The district is populated almost entirely by Nepalese immigrants or the descendants of immigrants from the State of Nepal within the last sixty years, and these people are primitive and have little in common with the residents of Bengal. The Gurkhas of Nepal won the Darjeeling District from the Sikkim State by conquest between 1780 and 1814, but the district was restored to the Sikkim Raja in 1817, after the British war against the Gurkhas, and it has all along been separately administered. The district was acquired by the British Government in 1835 direct from the Raja of Sikkim, mainly with the object of making the district a sanatorium for British troops and residents. The district has developed during the past eighty years from an almost uninhabited frontier tract to its present prosperity entirely by British enterprise and administration.

The Darjeeling District has not, up to now, had any direct experience of the representative system in connection with the elected Provincial Council of Bengal. Its Local and District Boards were only established in 1920 and are entirely nominated, not elected. There is no evidence of any popular demand for representative Government, probably by reason of the fact that such Government would not be in keeping with the traditions and customs of the Nepalese. The mixed population of the towns may be induced to express a desire for more representative institutions, but such a desire could only reflect the view of a very small number of potential political representatives.

If, however, it is considered that the elective system should be introduced into the Darjeeling District, this Association would submit that a commencement should be made in the first instance with the Local and District Boards, on which the tea planting community with its large interests should be adequately represented. Such boards may be regarded as the training grounds for responsible government, and the true test of the advance made towards responsible government would be reflected in their successful working or otherwise.

Any representation which the Darjeeling District could reasonably expect on the Bengal Legislative Council would be so small in comparison with the masses of Bengal as to be quite ineffective in safeguarding the peculiar interests of the Darjeeling District. Moreover, social conditions and the requirements of the district as regards education, sanitation, health, water supply and other amenities of civilised life are widely different to those obtaining in the plains of Bengal. The administration of such subjects by the Bengal Legislative Council will, it is feared, owing to the peculiarities of the district, be less effective than it is at present, and it is for this and the other reasons set out in this Memorandum that the Darjeeling Planters' Association considers it essential that the existing form of administration should be continued for the Darjeeling District.

However, in the event of it being decided that the Darjeeling District must be included with the remainder of Bengal under the Reformed Administration, then this Association would most strongly press for adequate representation to be accorded to the tea planting and other interests in the district, regard being had to its dissimilarity from the other districts of Bengal.

Finally, this Association would urge that the members of the Statutory Commission should, before arriving at any decision, make a point of visiting the Darjeeling District in order to familiarise themselves with local conditions obtaining there. The Association will be pleased to afford every facility for such a visit and will submit oral evidence before the Commission in substantiation of their contention that the administration of the Darjeeling District should remain, as it is at present, under the direct control of the Governor of Bengal.

Deputation from the Darjeeling Planters' Association.

The deputation consisted of :—

Lieut.-Colonel J. O. LITTLE (President).
Mr. F. PAGE WERNICKE (Vice-President).
Mr. G. WRANGHAM-HARDY (Secretary).

229. Mr. Cadogan : I want to put one or two questions about that part of the document you have submitted to the Commission, which is headed "Purport of this Memorandum," on page 104. The Conference has already had some evidence on this question a day or two ago, and it was evidence which would seem, as far as I can see, to conflict with what you submit in your Memorandum, so I wanted to ask one or two questions so as to get clear exactly what your proposal is. It is briefly this, I think. You contend that the backward tracts of the Darjeeling district should continue to be kept away from the operation of the Reforms scheme. That is briefly what you suggest ?—(Colonel Little) Yes.

230. The evidence which we had a day or two ago was to the effect that the backward tracts of Darjeeling district were not on all fours with the Chittagong district, or with the backward tracts in other provinces, Bihar and Orissa and Assam. I think they are chiefly Nepalese immigrants in Darjeeling, and of the Hindu religion, and of cultural affinity with the plainsmen ?—Yes, they profess a form of Hinduism. It is rather mixed with Buddhism in most cases.

231. In any case, the point was that they were considerably more developed and in a condition in which they might now be included within the scope of the Reforms. That was the evidence submitted to us. I notice that you say on page 104 : "There is "no evidence of any popular demand for representative "government." I am sure you will agree with me that it is not always easy to estimate what is a popular demand for anything, but a Memorandum has been submitted to us by the Hillmen's Association in Darjeeling, in which they do voice this demand, or they place this demand before us. I do not know if you have seen it ?—No, I have not seen the Hillmen's Association's document.

232. Mr. Cadogan : What is the Hillmen's Association ? Is it an Association of any substance ?

The Chairman : It consists of 500 members.

233. Mr. Cadogan : I think it is recognised by the Government ?

Sir Hari Singh Gour : Yes.

234. Mr. Cadogan : It puts forward a demand to be brought within the Reforms.—Yes.

235. That conflicts with your statement, does it not ? You continue to say : "If, however, it is "considered that the elective system should be "introduced into the Darjeeling district, this "Association would submit that a commencement "should be made in the first instance with the Local "and District Boards." But in the Hillmen's Association's Memorandum, one of their complaints is this. The Association submits that the hill people represent 80 per cent. of the population, and are sufficiently advanced, and are taking part in Municipal and District Board administration ?—They are taking part, but they are entirely nominated to those Boards. There is no such thing as an elective system at present in the district, except in the Municipality of Darjeeling and that of Kurseong.

236. But your contention really is that they should remain as they are, at any rate at present, as backward tracts ?—I do not quite agree with the term "backward tracts." They are probably, as you said, not on a footing with other tracts which are rightly called backward tracts, because they are inhabited by people who are much more primitive ; but our point is that the inhabitants of the Darjeeling hill district are of an entirely separate race and customs and climate and country from the rest of Bengal, and that it will be no advantage to the people of those tracts to be included in the Province of Bengal, of which they have never formed a part.

Mr. Cadogan : I have no other question to ask.

237. The Chairman : I should like to follow it a little. I gather that this Darjeeling Planters' Association are here urging what they conceive to be the interests of these hillmen ?—Yes. We consider it more in the interests of the hillmen to remain excluded than to be included in the Reforms.

238. But the change, if it were made, would have the effect, would it not, of including some tea gardens which are now excluded ?—Yes.

239. And your Association is quite properly formed to promote the interests of the tea gardens ?—Yes.

240. I am not quite clear whether I am to understand that what you put before us is put before us solely from considering the ethnological peculiarities of the hill tracts, or whether it has anything to do with what you conceive to be the interests of the tea gardens ?—I do not know that it would make very much difference to the tea industry in the Darjeeling district, whether it is included or excluded.

241. Do not think for a moment that I am hostile to the proposal ; I have not considered it ; but one naturally supposes that the Darjeeling Planters' Association, though I am sure they take a proper interest in these racial questions, are primarily concerned as a community of business men in considering what is in the interests of the business they represent ?—Yes, that is so.

242. But you have not said anything about that. Why is it in the interests of the tea gardens of the Darjeeling district to be excluded from the Reforms ? —Because we think that the inclusion of the district in the Reforms would bring with it elections, and an upset of the labour.

Mr. Travers : The point, if I may intervene, is that the tea planters, who live for many years amongst their labourers, are anxious to do the best for those labourers. They naturally get fond of them after living among them for years and years, and the Darjeeling Planters' Association wishes to do its best for the people among whom they live.

The Chairman : I am sure it is so. At the same time, I rather wanted to know whether the apprehended change was really limited to the hillmen. Surely it has its effect on the tea gardens.

Mr. Travers : May I ask a question or two about the hillmen ?

The Chairman : Yes.

243. Mr. Travers : The fact is that your Association itself has no axe to grind in this matter at all. It does not matter to the tea gardens whether you are within the province or outside ?—No, not particularly, I think.

244. All you want to do is to do the best for the people of the district ?—Yes.

245. The Chairman : I am quite willing to believe that ; but why does it not make any difference ? Does it make no difference whether the Bengal legislature makes the laws which affect the tea gardens ?

Mr. Travers : I directly represent them outside, and I can put up anything for them, whether they are within or not, but at the same time, if the district should be included, the Darjeeling planters want to have a representative of their own. The reasons for that, Colonel Little, I take it, are that your labourers in Darjeeling are of a different race from those in the plains, and you have different labour methods ?—Yes.

246. And, therefore, if the district is included, you think you should have your own representative ? —Yes.

247. Mr. Cadogan said a word or two about the Hillmen's Association. I do not wish to crab any organisation, but do you consider that the Hillmen's Association really represents the people of the Darjeeling district ?—I should say not.

248. Has it any branches outside Darjeeling ?— I believe that they propose to form branches at Kurseong and Kalimpong.

249. But they have not done so at present ?— I do not think so, at present.

250. Do they have frequent meetings, or anything of that sort ?—Well, we never hear of any meetings, and in a newspaper report of May last it is stated that after a lapse of many years the local Hillmen's Association held their annual general meeting.

251. When this came up before the Conference, the other day, this question of inclusion or exclusion, the Chief Secretary said that Government officers now considered it as advisable. Have you heard of Government officers having made any inquiries outside Darjeeling amongst the people who live in the tea gardens in reference to that subject?—Not to my knowledge. An inquiry was addressed to the Local Planters' Association, which I represent, and also to the branch of the European Association, and, I believe, to the Hillmen's Association, but I have heard of no other inquiries.

252. Mr. Hartshorn: Are there any other Associations of whom inquiries should be made? They are the three Associations you mentioned yourself?—There is a Moslem Association in Darjeeling. There is a very small Moslem community there. They, possibly, may have had an inquiry; I do not know.

253. Mr. Travers: Is it not also a fact that more than one Deputy Commissioner of considerable experience in Darjeeling—recent experience—has said to you that he thinks it would be advisable to exclude the district from the province?—That is so.

254. The Chairman: It certainly would be a very curious result. When we were in Assam, we were on the whole urged to exclude some areas that are at present included; while it appears to be the other way round here. What do your colleagues of the Provincial Committee feel about it, Sir Abdelkerim?

Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi: We feel that they are the best people to judge. I do not think that we have any particular views. If they claim to speak on behalf of the hillmen there, I think they ought to know more about it than anyone else. There is a small section which has been influenced, I suppose, by things that happen down below in the plains, and they may have put forward a claim of that kind; but as regards the people there, I live in Darjeeling pretty often, but I have not heard of any very great demand to be included within the Reforms.

255. Lord Burnham: I find that the Hillmen's Association consists of members of various sections of the population inhabiting the area who have come from different places. They do not even meet each other often, and I wonder how they transact business of this Association?—I do not know, sir. I have never been present at their meetings. The Darjeeling Planters' Association, however, cultivates good relations with the Hillmen's Association as far as possible. We have invariably invited representatives of their Association to attend our annual general meetings, which are held in March every year, and they have on one or two occasions attended, but not of late years.

256. What I am wondering at is how these hillmen, whom Bengal claim from these various places, come together in order to formulate their views in the matter of claiming further reforms and an increased status for them?—That demand, sir, comes from a section of hillmen drawn largely from the towns of Darjeeling, Kurseong and Kalimpong.

257. The Chairman: I suppose that the labour of the tea gardens in your district consists of immigrant labour; or is it all local labour?—It is entirely Nepalese labour sir, but most of it is well-settled on the estates; that is to say, a large portion of it was born on the estates, but they are all originally immigrants from Nepal.

258. I see; then you establish colonies for them, and they stay on in the estates; and now even their second generation works in the gardens. But is the labour free to go out whenever they want?—Yes; the labour is entirely free; they can come and go as they like.

259. It is really a very healthy organisation. I wonder how far the people of this Hillmen's Association would like to associate with them the employees in your tea gardens?—I have made enquiries recently, and I can hear of no employees on tea gardens who are members of the Hillmen's Association.

Mr. Travers: We consider as part of our job, sir, not only to represent our own interest, but also represent the interest of these people.

260. The Chairman: Would you mind telling me this? In your view are there signs of an increase in political interests or self-consciousness among the hillmen?—I should say that there are no signs among the general body; but there may be signs of it in the towns.

* * * * * * * *

267. Sir Arthur Froom: On page 104 of your Memorandum you say: "Social conditions and the "requirements of the district as regards education, "sanitation, health, water supply and other amenities "of civilised life are widely different to those ob- "taining in the plains of Bengal. The administration "of such subjects by the Bengal Legislative Council "will, it is feared, owing to the peculiarities of the "district be less effective than it is at present." Where does the money come from for education, sanitation, water supply and so on? Is it not from the Government of Bengal?—I suppose from the general revenues of the province of Bengal.

268. Is that voted by the Council?

Mr. Travers: No; it is reserved; it is not voted; that is one of our points, sir, that the people have peculiar wants and those wants will be more thoroughly attended to by Government than by the Legislative Council; and in a province like this a lot of things have to be done for the people of the country.

269. Then your fear is that Darjeeling would be left out in the matter of progress of education, sanitation and so on?—We think that the measures suitable to the remainder of Bengal would be unsuitable to the Darjeeling District, and the administration would be less sympathetic towards the people if it were administered by a minister.

270. You contend that in the Darjeeling District matters in regard to education, sanitation, water supply, and so on are in advance of many other parts of Bengal?—Certainly they are in advance on all tea estates, and possibly they are not behind the rest of the country, in any case.

271. In fact, you feel satisfied with the progress made in the matter of sanitation of the estates?—On the estates, yes.

272. And you do not want any action to be taken which would endanger the present satisfactory state of affairs there. Is that so?—Yes.

273. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Assuming that the measures suitable to the plains of Bengal are unsuitable to Darjeeling, why should you think that the minister in charge of education, sanitation, and so on would not adapt himself to the special requirements of the hill tribes?—Compared with the remainder of Bengal, Darjeeling is a very small district, and I fear that any Bengal minister will have his hands so full with Bengal affairs that he will have little time to spare to the special needs of Darjeeling.

274. But supposing steps were taken to ensure that he pays special attention to the backward hill tribes of Darjeeling, that objection will disappear?—Yes.

275. The Chairman: Thank you very much. It is an interesting and curious point, and one attaches more importance to the views of the Darjeeling Planters' Association, because, as I understand it, it does not really make any difference between its own interests and the special interests of these hillmen, and that you are saying this because you think that it is in the best interests of the tribesmen themselves?—That is so, sir.

Memorandum submitted by the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon.

Introduction. The body known as the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon is a company incorporated in 1920 for the following purposes among others :—

1. To promote and protect the trade, commerce, industries and manufactures of India and Ceylon.
2. To take up, consider and discuss questions connected with or affecting such trade, commerce, industries and manufactures ;
3. To promote or oppose legislative or other measures affecting such trade, commerce and manufactures.
4. To collect and circulate statistics and other information relating to such trade, commerce and manufactures.

The Association is composed of seventeen member Chambers, most of them predominately European, but including Indian members as well. These representations to the Statutory Commission are, however, made by a smaller number of Chambers, for the Ceylon Chamber of Commerce is not concerned, and the Burma and Punjab Chambers are making separate representations.

The Chambers which associate themselves with this Memorandum are, in alphabetical order, the Bengal, Bombay, Calicut, Chittagong, Cocanada, Cochin, Coimbatore, Karachi, Madras, Narayanganj, Northern India, Tellicherry, Tuticorin and Upper India Chambers.

A study of the membership of the various Chambers which constitute the Associated Chambers of Commerce, will show that they are able to speak on behalf of almost the whole of British commercial and industrial interests established in India, and also on behalf of large Indian interests. It is, indeed, almost impossible to draw any line of demarcation between British and Indian interests in regard to invested capital, for companies floated and managed by British managing agents are frequently owned to a very large extent by Indians. Similarly, in many companies generally regarded as Indian, a considerable number of the shareholders may be British. While, therefore, it is not possible to produce any exact figures to show the magnitude of the interests represented by the Associated Chambers, it may be said that if the estimate that £1,000,000,000 of British capital has been invested in India is correct, the Associated Chambers represent by far the greater part of that, as well as a very large amount of capital raised in India and entrusted to the care of British managing agents. The interests of the members of the individual Chambers include tea, jute, cotton, mining, timber, leather, shipping, railways, agriculture, engineering, insurance, banking and in general all forms of export and import trade.

The Associated Chambers of Commerce accept the Declaration of August the 20th, 1917, as being a pledge binding on the British Government, the Government of India, and the British people as a whole, and they are themselves sympathetic to Indian aspirations. They realise that in some provinces poor response has been made to the opportunities for self-government given by the Government of India Act, 1919, but the Chambers are prepared to take the initiative in recommending a policy which will, they hope, go far to meet Indian aspirations. They think it important that lack of co-operation on the one hand should not result in a narrowness of outlook on the other. They believe that irresponsibility can largely be overcome by giving responsibility, and they are prepared to agree to Indians being afforded an opportunity of exercising genuine control in the government of the provinces if adequate safeguards are provided. The Chambers therefore recommend the grant to provinces of constitutions varying up to full responsible autonomy provided :—

(a) That the position of the Government of India vis-à-vis the Assembly is strengthened.
(b) That the Central Government is given powers of intervention in the event of a breakdown of Government in any Province.
(c) That Provincial Second Chambers are set up.
(d) That adequate safeguards are provided for the administration of the Police.
(e) That a clause is inserted in the new Government of India Act, forbidding discrimination against industrial and commercial interests in Central and Provincial legislation and taxation, and in Municipal bye-laws and taxes.

Provincial Governments. While recognising that dyarchy is an ingenious temporary expedient for training Indians in the task of self-government, the Chambers of Commerce believe that it has now exhausted its possibilities and, whether rightly or not, is so universally unpopular in India that it is desirable to abolish it as far as may be possible when introducing a new constitution.

Owing to the consistent efforts of a large party in India to make dyarchy unworkable, the Governor in Council in nearly every province has been to some extent compelled to adopt a policy of assisting the Ministers for the moment in office against all efforts of the other elected members of the Legislative Council to eject them. This is most clearly shown by the fact that, contrary to the intention of the framers of dyarchy, the official bloc has been consistently used to support ministers. It has, therefore, resulted that ministers in no province have been wholly responsible to the elected members of the legislature and consequently they have been regarded by many Indians as to some extent a subsidiary branch of the bureaucratic Government. This has involved both halves of the diarchic Government in opprobrium which each half individually might not have incurred.

The Chambers of Commerce, while fully alive to the risk involved, are prepared to recommend the abolition of the Provincial Executive Council, and the transfer to a Ministry responsible to the provincial legislature of all subjects (or in the view of some Chambers, all subjects except Law and Order) now administered by either half of the Government. Official nominated members should be withdrawn and should return to their intended rôle of administrative officers. The Ministry will be wholly responsible for carrying on the Government, and will neither incur the control nor receive the support of an Executive Council nominated from outside.

It will be necessary that the Secretaries of the Departments who will constitute the permanent staff, and on whom Ministers will have to rely to a very great extent, should be senior men in their respective services and be adequately paid.

The word "adequately" may be emphasised, because the abolition of the higher paid posts of Executive Councillors will seriously diminish the prospects of members of the Civil Service, while the responsibility on the senior men, as the permanent staff in each department, will be a heavy one. It is common knowledge that in England Ministers of all parties place very full reliance on the permanent staff and never fail to obtain their fullest assistance, even guidance, no matter what political party is in power.

The Governor should continue to preside over the Ministry and, after such consultation as he considers expedient, would appoint his ministers from amongst those members of the Council who might be expected to control a majority. If and when the Ministry loses the confidence of the legislature and is defeated, the Ministry will resign and the Governor will form a new Ministry, presumably resting on the support of a somewhat different coalition of groups. It is obviously desirable that some convention as to joint responsibility should grow up, but the Chambers do not believe that this can be laid down as a rule, nor do they think that, in a country where political divisions are likely to take the form of a large number of small groups rather than of two or three large political parties, it is ever likely to be so strict as it is in Great Britain.

Law and Order.—Judicial Administration. The Associated Chambers attach the utmost importance to the independence and impartiality of all courts exercising civil jurisdiction. Owing to its work of hearing appeals from subordinate courts throughout a Province, the Judges of a High Court are able to form a fairly reliable judgment of the qualities and capabilities of junior judicial officers, and the Local Government in the past has consulted the High Court before making appointments of District and Subordinate judges. The High Court is expected to supervise and inspect subordinate courts, but this is an onerous task which, with other judicial administrative work, has engaged much of the time of the Chief Justice and other judges, and without sacrificing the work of the High Court itself it is usually impossible to carry out as much inspection as is desirable. Some means should be provided to enable that inspection to be carried out at regular intervals.

It would appear that the posting and transfers of District and Subordinate judges should be supervised by the High Court if political and communal influence is to be excluded.

The present arrangement by which the Calcutta High Court is under the administrative authority of the Government of India, but the local Government provides the finance, is clearly unsatisfactory and a scheme should be devised for making the Central Government responsible for supplying the finance required. The Chambers consider that all the High Courts should be under the Government of India, both for administration and finance. They also regard it as essential that the Secretary of State should continue to be responsible for new permanent appointments of Judges to the High Courts under Letters Patent of the King.

Police Administration. The Chambers have given the most anxious consideration to the question of the control of the Police and the maintenance of Law and Order. Upon the good administration of this department depend the stability of the country and the security of life and property. Some Chambers, therefore, are averse from any transfer of this subject, but a majority believe that the risk must be taken if any real self-government is to be given to the provinces. The different views are dealt with in the following paragraphs.

The majority of Chambers hold the opinion that the expedient of centralising the Police would prove administratively most difficult, if not impossible, as the Central Government could not exercise any useful control over Police scattered throughout the length and breadth of India. Even if it were possible, the withdrawal of control from the provincial authorities would result in increased suspicion and dislike of the Police, who would appear as the myrmidons of a remote and uncontrolled alien bureaucracy, and there could be no chance of this popular resentment being modified so long as responsibility for maintaining law and order did not lie on the provincial ministers and council. The surest way to make those responsible for governing realise the need for an effective and active police force is to make them responsible for the maintenance of order, so that their countrymen will hold them to blame if they fail to secure that safety of person and property to which the citizen is entitled. So long as the maintenance of Law and Order is in any form reserved, criticism will be more directed against the methods adopted by the bureaucracy and police to preserve the peace than against those sections of the populace which are disturbing it.

These Chambers have also considered as an alternative that the Police should be under the Governor, with a senior official, such as a controller of services or chief secretary, to advise him and to issue all executive orders; but the objections given above apply equally to a proposal to reserve the maintenance of order to an extra-parliamentary authority within the province, and the position of the Governor in being made to assume duties of so controversial a nature would quickly become impossible.

They take the view that the problem is largely one of principle, that the elementary and primary duty of any Government is the maintenance of law and order, and that if Provincial Governments are not to be trusted with that responsibility, the only logical attitude is to say that the time has not yet come for any further advance towards provincial autonomy.

But they do recognise that special safeguards will be required to prevent wrongful and unfair treatment of Magistrates and Police Officers, even down to the subordinate ranks, for having discharged their duty in circumstances of difficulty. They find it difficult to make adequate proposals on this point, but they do not consider it incompatible with the idea of giving full provincial control over the administration of the Police force to provide some special safeguards resting with the Governor and Governor-General in Council to protect officers from persecution or unfair punishment, particularly when they are subject to heated and vexatious attacks at times when feeling runs high and becomes irresponsible and unreasonable owing to communal or civil outbreaks of disorder.

Subject to such safeguards this majority, therefore, would favour the administration of the Police force of a province by the province, but would leave the Criminal Investigation Department, as at present, with the Central Government.

Some Chambers consider that Law and Order should remain a provincial subject, but that the portfolio for this Department should be with the Governor, who, in administering it, should himself function as a Minister. For obvious reasons it is impossible that the Governor himself should appear in person to answer to the legislature on questions affecting Law and Order, and it is, therefore, further recommended by these Chambers that, in his capacity of Minister, the Governor should be represented in the Legislature by a senior official, acting as a Parliamentary Secretary. The Governor's powers of veto should extend to Law and Order as to other matters, but his powers of certification, which it is recommended should be severely circumscribed, should certainly apply to Law and Order. (See Upper India Chamber's separate Memorandum).*

Yet other Chambers, which are opposed to transferring to the Provincial Councils the responsibility for the maintenance of Law and Order, recognise the logical argument in favour of so doing, but contend that the risk is too great and that there is no justification for exposing life and property to the danger that this would entail. These Chambers do not approve of even the modified proposal of placing the Police under the direct control of the Governor. As they wish to abolish dyarchy to the fullest extent possible whilst ensuring the efficiency and impartial administration of the Police, they recommend that the administration of the Police throughout India should be in the hands of the Central Government working through Commissioners in the provinces who would maintain a close liaison with the local Government.

It is a matter for consideration whether the special Armed Police Forces maintained in some Provinces such as the Malabar Special Police in Southern India, and the Frontier Rifles of Bengal, should be placed under the control of the Central Government or of the Army Department, but a decision on this point would necessarily depend on the decision on the main problem and on the specific representation of the local Governments concerned.

Provincial Legislatures. The Chambers do not recommend any alteration in the legal powers or composition of the provincial legislatures except the withdrawal of all the nominated official members, subject to the possible retention of a Parliamentary Secretary representing the Governor. They are not prepared to express any opinion upon the franchise, but they would point out that the electorate is steadily growing in every province owing to the increase in the number of persons who satisfy the conditions required of voters. They would be opposed to any lowering of the qualifications, save perhaps to secure better representation of the rural electorate, as they believe that it will be a slow and laborious task to educate even the present electorate, which should not be swamped by an addition of large numbers of less educated and experienced persons.

Although the legal powers of the Councils would not be altered, their political powers would be immensely increased if the whole Government were made responsible to them, and the Ministers did not by merely accepting office obtain the consistent and almost unquestioning support of the officially nominated bloc. When the bureaucracy is no longer involved in trying to work the political machine, political feeling will, perhaps, not be roused against it to the same extent, and Indian politics may be expected to take on the character of natural rivalry between party groups. For the first time members of the Provincial Councils will realise that the responsibility for maintaining a Government in office to carry on the administration of the province will rest upon them, and the Chambers think an unreasonable attitude will quickly have its consequence on the prosperity and welfare of the people of the provinces, instead of merely resulting in the exercise by the Governor of his special powers. The grant of full responsibility to the legislature will enable the powers of certification of the Governor to be abolished. These have been inevitable so long as he had a special responsibility to discharge to the Secretary of State, and ultimately to Parliament. But when once the responsibility rests upon the Council, they will no longer be required. If, however, the proposal to retain control of Law and Order by the Governor is adopted, the power of certification of supply for this department will be necessary.

Second Chambers. It appears, however, necessary that if this very sweeping reform is to be carried out, a Second Chamber should be created. The Chambers do not feel called upon to make any detailed recommendation as to the exact powers or composition of this Second Chamber. They would, however, point out that many Indians whose judgment, experience and social position would make them valuable members of the legislature, will never solicit votes on the hustings for election to a popular House.

Such men would, however, be willing to serve in an Upper House if it were composed largely of nominated members holding office for five years or more, and eligible for re-nomination. Of these, about two-thirds might be elected by the Council of State electorate, and one-third nominated by the Governor. European representation should be provided for in both cases. This cannot be regarded in any sense as a reactionary proposal, for the members of the Senate in Canada and of some of the Provincial Upper Houses in Australia are nominated.

Public Service Commission. The Associated Chambers recommend that Ministers should be relieved of the invidious duty of resisting importunity by the provision of special machinery for the recruiting of provincial services.

They suggest that this end might perhaps be best attained by the creation of Provincial Public Service Commissions, or of Provincial Selection Boards on the lines suggested by para. 26 of the Lee Committee's Report. It might be found convenient to have a full-time paid Chairman, with whom would be associated two members appointed ad hoc for making particular appointments. In any case the all-India Public Service Commission should have some power of supervision regarding methods of appointment, i.e. recruitment and the conduct of examinations.

The Chambers would be failing in their duty if they did not urge the need for safeguarding the prospects of Europeans at present in the Services.

The position of members of the covenanted services is, of course, different from that of members of the uncovenanted services, and their contractual rights in relation to the Secretary of State may be regarded as a sufficient safeguard. The Chambers are confident that no proposal to abrogate or circumscribe these rights would be even considered by Parliament; but they wish to draw attention to the vital importance to members of the Imperial Services that the security of their pensions should be guaranteed, and that they should be granted over a long period the option of retiring on proportionate pension, an option granted at the time of the introduction of the present reforms, and now shortly due to expire.

The maintenance, however, of ultimate rights of this kind, is no guarantee that the British member of the services will find the conditions of work such as to induce him to stay in India, and give his willing service; and it is generally recognised that the withdrawal of the bulk of the British element would jeopardise the success of any Indian constitution, and, in fact, the stability of the country.

The danger of discrimination against Europeans by Indian Ministers is very real, and, indeed, a case is mentioned in the report of the Reforms Enquiry Committee, 1924 (See para. 34 and Appendix 5).

Though the Chambers are most deeply impressed with the necessity of guarding against a quick withdrawal of the British element, they can find no concrete suggestion to make, but they feel they should emphasise the vital importance of retaining the Governor as the final authority in regard to all appointments and postings in the covenanted services.

The position of a member of the provincial or subordinate services would appear to be adequately safeguarded under the Rules regarding the Civil Services in India made by the Secretary of State in Council under section 96 B (2) of the Government of India Act on 21st June, 1924, in cases where action is definitely taken against him by the local Government, if Rule XIX be amended to give officers of a subordinate service a right of appeal to the Provincial Public Service Commission or Selection Board; but it is not clear that he can obtain redress where he is merely passed over. The Chambers are apprehensive that among these lower posts Indian Ministers may be disposed to press on Indianisation by passing over European and Anglo-Indian officials without formulating any charges against them.

The Associated Chambers desire to point out that they are not opposed to Indianisation provided that it does not involve a decline in efficiency or an injustice to Europeans and Anglo-Indians, who have entered a service with certain expectations which ought not to be defeated on grounds of race or colour.

Intervention by the Governor-General. While desirous of making recommendations of so liberal a character as to meet all legitimate Indian aspirations, the Chambers of Commerce do not conceal from themselves the possibility that the new constitution like the old one may be faced by deliberate opposition or obstruction on the part of some Indian group or party. They therefore consider that provision must be made to meet the danger of a breakdown of Government in any province. They consider that the Governor-General in Council should be given powers in case of necessity to intervene, and in fact to suspend the constitution, so that the Governor may carry on the administration in such way and under such conditions, and for such time as may be laid down by the Governor-General in Council with the assent of the British Government. Further, it should be laid down that a declaration by the Governor-General in Council of a breakdown of Government in any province should be conclusive, and not open to reference to any court.

Relations between Central and Provincial Governments. The Chambers desire to direct the attention of the Commission to the opinion expressed by the majority of the Reforms Enquiry Committee in para. 48, that " in the event of the transfer of all subjects, the existing Rule 49 of the Devolution Rules would leave an insufficient control in the Central Government " ; and to another passage " Much clearer definition and a much closer examination of the relations between the Central and Local Governments would be an essential preliminary to any scheme of provincial autonomy in India."

The Federation of British India, if it comes into being, will start upon its career with an inestimable initial advantage in having developed from a powerful Central Government. This should enable it to avoid the dangers and troubles of excessive decentralisation which are almost universal in federations in their early stages owing to the weakness of the Central Government and the particularist feeling of the provinces. It would be disastrous if this advantage were sacrificed, and owing to excessive decentralisation, the Government of India, like the Commonwealth Government in Australia, were hampered in every way by the vested rights of the Provinces.

In particular, a very careful definition of the respective rights of the Central and Provincial Governments in matters of labour legislation or disputes will be necessary if conflict is to be avoided. The Chambers agree with the minority of the Reforms Enquiry Committee that, following the precedent of Canada, all authority not specifically conferred on the Provinces should remain vested in the Government of India.

The Chambers are of opinion that the present system, by which the Loan requirements of the Local Governments are made known in advance to the Government of India, which includes them in its own Loan programme and enables the Provinces to obtain money more cheaply than would be the case if they had to borrow on the security of their own revenues, has proved satisfactory. They believe that the present borrowing rules give all such powers as are necessary to the Local Governments, and these should, therefore, be in no way relaxed. They approve of the intention ultimately to entrust to a Central Board of Non-official Commissioners the raising of loans required for the Provinces.

Terminal Taxes. The Associated Chambers consider that, whatever constitution may be framed for India, and whatever degree of autonomy may be given to the Provinces, it is essential that British India should not cease to be a single economic unit enjoying internal free trade. Owing to what was probably an error of drafting, the Scheduled Taxes Rules made under the Government of India Act, 1919, gave to Provincial Governments an unrestricted right to levy and increase a terminal tax in any town where an octroi had been in force on the 6th July, 1917. The effect of these so-called terminal taxes in ports and other centres of transit trade has been to impose a burden on commerce which has made it difficult for the Central Government to foster the economic development of the country by a judicious adjustment of railway rates and customs duties. Municipalities favourably placed have been enabled virtually to increase the Imperial Customs Tariff or the railway freight, and to appropriate the proceeds for the benefit of the local inhabitants. The Taxation Enquiry Committee condemned this form of taxation, and Chambers will be able to deal with the question in detail if and when they appear before the Finance Committee.

The Associated Chambers venture, however, to recommend to the Statutory Commission that the difficulty in its widest aspect should be met by a provision in the constitution similar to sections 9 and 10 of the Constitution of the United States of America which provide inter alia that " No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State " and " No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws ; and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States ; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress."

Any abolition of terminal taxes would, of necessity, have to be gradual to enable municipalities to substitute other sources of revenue.

Major Ports. By Rule 9 of Schedule I (Part I) of the Devolution Rules, " Ports declared to be major ports by rule made by the Governor-General in Council, or by or under legislation by the Indian Legislature " are a central subject. The Government of India at the present time exercises its control over all the major ports except Chittagong through the agency of the reserved side of the Local Governments. It is, indeed, the intention of the Government of India to undertake the direct administration of all the major ports, but it is understood that this may not be effected in all cases for a considerable time. The Associated Chambers desire that all the major ports shall be directly administered by the Central Government before all subjects in the provinces are transferred.

The Central Government. The Chambers of Commerce are only prepared to favour the grant of responsible Government in Provinces on condition that the position of the Government of India vis-à-vis the Legislative Assembly is strengthened. The Government of India is required to carry on the administration under difficulties which no other Government in the world (except on rare occasions that of the United States) is called upon to face. It has to work through an Assembly in which it is in a permanent minority. President Lowell observes " that an irremovable Governor and a popularly elected Assembly are a contrivance for causing friction and perpetuating it." For eight years the Government of India has been required to obtain the consent of the Assembly to measures it deemed desirable, and yet has had no opportunity of bringing home to the Assembly the consequences of the policies advocated by an irresponsible opposition.

The Montagu-Chelmsford Report emphasises repeatedly the ill-effects of giving powers of criticism without responsibility, and regards the spirit of carping criticism which marked the Minto-Morley Councils as due to this irresponsibility. It is, therefore, surprising that the authors of the Report, having so clearly perceived the defect in the work of their predecessors, should have repeated that very mistake in the Central Legislature they themselves set up. " Responsibility for the administration remains undivided, with the result that while the Governments found themselves far more exposed to questions and criticisms than hitherto, questions and criticisms were uninformed by a real sense of responsibility such as comes from the prospect of having to assume office in turn . . . the power remained with the Government and the Councils were left with no functions but criticism. . . . Parliamentary usages have been initiated and adopted . . . up to the point where they cause the maximum of friction. . . ."

This criticism of the Minto-Morley Councils, written in 1918, might as well have been written of the Montagu-Chelmsford Assembly in 1928. The alternatives, therefore, are either to go forward and make the Government of India responsible to the Assembly or to strengthen the Government's position sufficiently to enable it to carry all such measures as it considers to be highly desirable, but which could not rightly be certified as essential to the interests of India. The proceedings of the Legislative Assembly show that it would be in the highest degree unwise to confer any greater powers upon that body at present. Agreeing with Lord Selborne in his speech in the House of Lords on the second reading of the Government of India Bill, on December 11th, 1919, the Associated Chambers of Commerce think that the moment when a great experiment is made in the Provinces is not the one to make any changes in the Government of India.

The first Assembly, which sat from 1920 to 1923, was composed of comparatively moderate politicians, for, at that time the Congress Party were boycotting the legislatures. There is, therefore, the greater cause for concern that even that Assembly should, on two occasions, in 1922 and 1923, have failed to realise the vital need to balance India's budget, and to accept the enhancement of the Salt Tax recommended by the Government of India. The Chambers do not think it necessary to repeat the arguments of Sir Basil Blackett, Sir Malcolm Hailey, and Mr. Innes to show how little the enhancement of the tax would have injured the poorer classes and how much it would have assisted the Government of India. The communique issued on the 29th March, 1923, by the Viceroy Lord Reading is an unanswerable justification for his action in certifying the Finance Bill and by implication an unanswerable criticism of the Legislative Assembly's decision.

In 1927, an amendment to the Finance Bill to reduce the Salt Tax from Rs. 1-4-0 to As. 10 was carried by a majority of 50 to 48, despite the fact that Sir Basil Blackett made it quite clear that if revenue from the Salt Tax were sacrificed it would be impossible to effect the remission of Provincial Contributions intended. The Council of State restored the Salt Tax to Rs. 1-4-0. On March 28th, the Assembly concurred in the reversal of its own decision of six days earlier.

It might be deduced from this that the Assembly did not know its own mind. As a matter of fact, some members had voted for the reduction with no desire that the Salt Tax should actually be reduced at the cost of postponing the remission of provincial contributions. They thought themselves safe in casting a vote on the popular side, because they believed Government had a majority or, in the alternative, relied upon the Council of State to give them a locus penitentiæ. That many members of the Assembly availed themselves of this by abstaining from voting on the second occasion, or by leaving Delhi before the division, will be apparent from the division lists, for, while the Government vote increased by four, the Opposition vote fell by nine.

The attitude of a large section of the Assembly was clearly expressed in this debate by Lala Lajpat Rai, a Responsivist, when speaking in favour of reducing the salt duty, he said : " It is no concern of mine to solve the difficulties which the Government may experience in making two ends meet in case this amendment be accepted by the House."

On the 11th March, 1927, Mr. T. Prakasam (member for E. and W. Godavari cum Kistna) moved a cut in the Budget Demand for the Postal and Telegraphic Department in order to demand higher pay for subordinate employees of that Department. In the Committee stage of the Finance Bill pressure was brought to bear on Government to reduce postal rates. Of the fourteen Indian elected members who spoke in favour of raising postal servants' wages, three spoke and ten voted in favour of reducing postal rates, regardless of the fact that both Government speakers and Sir Darcy Lindsay and Mr. H. G. Cocke (non-official European members) pointed out that the Department was hardly doing more than paying its way, and that, therefore, either an increase in expenses or reduction in receipts would result in the department being run at a loss. To suggest a simultaneous increase of expenditure and decrease of receipts showed a complete failure to grasp the responsibility of a legislature entrusted even partially with the government of the country.

In all the discussions of the ill-fated Reserve Bank Bill it was apparent that many members of the Assembly realised that a Reserve Bank would in effect take over the control of India's monetary and exchange policy and thus would end the control of the India Office in this department. Such economic Swaraj was obviously greatly desired by all parties, but owing to an ill-advised attempt to subordinate the Bank to politics by providing that the Legislative Assembly should elect a proportion of the directors, the Bill was dropped by the Government of India. It is a matter for concern that politically-minded Indians should desire to carry politics and racialism into the board-room of the Bank which was to be entrusted with the control of India's currency, credit and exchange.

Again, on the Demands for Railway Grants, in 1927, the Assembly reduced the vote for the Railway Board by Rs. 942,000 to Rs. 100. On the Budget Demands the Assembly reduced the travelling allowance of the Executive Council by Rs. 59,999 to Re. 1 and the vote for the Army Department by Rs. 578,000 to Rs. 2,000. In the debates on the last Demand in particular, such wild statements and allegations were made that it is difficult to credit the sincerity of some of the speakers. The votes were naturally certified by the Viceroy on 29th March, 1927.

Even if not very many perverse decisions have been taken by the Assembly and persisted in, that is no evidence that the Indian elected members have taken a reasonable view of their responsibilities. It is a favourite argument with Indian politicians that in seeking to ascertain the opinion of the people of India, it is necessary to ignore the votes of the nominated officials and of many of the nominated non-officials. If this method be applied, it will be apparent that few Bills or votes for supplies would have been passed by the Assembly. As Lord Meston has observed, the fact that there have been so few actual conflicts between the Assembly and the Government of India has been due to tact and the exercise of much skill in management on the part of the Government.

The Chambers of Commerce recommend that the strength of the Government parties should be made approximately equal to what may be anticipated will be the strength of the anti-Government party. This will not enable Government to carry all measures regardless of public opinion and without a fair opportunity for dissentient opinions to be expressed, but it will give to the Government of India that minimum of legislative power which cannot be denied to any Government without grave consequences upon the administration of the country.

Representation and the Franchise. The declaration of August 20th, 1917, has wisely or unwisely committed Parliament to a policy of developing self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of responsible Government in India, but it is by no means clear that the typically Western machinery introduced in 1919 will ultimately prove the most satisfactory for India.

It is in the first place apparent that elsewhere the success of a representative system has depended upon the degree of intelligent interest that the voter has displayed in watching legislative bodies and his own representative in particular. No attempt has ever before been made to introduce representative Government into an Oriental country with a vast and illiterate population, and it is clearly a matter for greater surprise that it has worked at all than that it has not been a conspicuous success.

So far as the Legislative Assembly is concerned, the Chambers are of opinion that the present system of direct election should be abandoned because Indian elected members are not in any sense representatives of the people ; they are plenipotentiaries, except in so far as they choose to become delegates of some political, communal or commercial body.

The Montagu-Chelmsford Report defines responsibility as, "consisting primarily in amenability to constituents and, in the second place, in amenability to an Assembly." On the important and difficult matters which arise in the Assembly, the bulk of the electors have no knowledge nor views and no opportunity of controlling their nominal representative. A concrete instance of this may be cited.

In September, 1927, the constitution of the Reserve Bank, as proposed by the Government of India, underwent rapid and somewhat bewildering changes. When one morning the European Group found that the proposal had assumed the form of a Stockholders' Bank, they did not feel justified in coming to a final conclusion on its merits without first obtaining the views of their constituents. Two members of the Group accordingly waited on the Finance Member to ask whether he would delay the Bill until they had had time to ascertain whether their constituents (who had only had an opportunity of expressing their views on the original proposal of a Shareholders' Bank) approved or disapproved of the new scheme. The Finance Member very properly replied that as the Indian members had no wish to consult their constituents he was afraid he could not hold up the measure for the sake of the European Group alone. No blame attached to the Indian members who did not consult their constituents, for it would, indeed, have been disingenuous to ask for an opinion on the relative merits of a Shareholders', Stockholders', and State Bank from people who did not know what a Reserve Bank was. That the Chambers are not exaggerating the ignorance of the Indian electorates will be admitted by most Returning Officers. This ignorance was emphasised by local Governments in their evidence laid before the Muddiman Committee, and it may be illustrated by the fact that even a Bar Association forwarded to the Government of India through the local Government their considered opinion that an appreciation of the rupee would encourage exports and check imports.

It is unreasonable to expect the elector in the mofussil to understand discriminating protection, which is the fiscal policy to which he is assumed to have given his considered assent, nor is it possible for the elector in Assam or Madras to understand the North West Frontier problem. Primarily for this reason, but also in order to establish the principle of representation of the Provinces as units in the Central legislature, the Associated Chambers recommend that the majority of the elected members of the Assembly should be elected by colleagues composed of both Houses of the Provincial legislatures. The Upper India Chamber, while in agreement with the principle of indirect election, suggests that the electoral colleges should be on a wider basis, and their views on the matter are explained in the separate Memorandum which they have submitted.*

The same considerations apply to a much less degree to the Provincial Councils, and the Chambers have given anxious consideration to the question whether to recommend that a return should be made to the Minto-Morley system under which Provincial Councils were elected by local bodies. A majority of the Chambers, however, are opposed to making any such recommendation, for the problems dealt with in the Council are more nearly within the grasp of electors and, allowing for the spread of general and political education, it may be expected that the electors will in the future be able to form more intelligent opinions on the questions raised at provincial elections. They also doubt the political expediency of depriving these electors of powers and rights they already possess.

The Chambers do not feel competent to express an opinion on the franchise at present in force, but they would point out that the number of electors is increasing automatically as more and more persons satisfy the franchise requirements, and they would be opposed to any lowering of the present qualifications. The task of educating even the present electorate will be a slow and painful process, and it should not be hindered by the addition of a large mass of still more ignorant and inexperienced voters.

Communal Representation. The Associated Chambers interpret the speech of the late Lord Minto, on the 1st October, 1906, in reply to the Moslem delegation headed by H.H. the Aga Khan as a pledge which binds the British Government both in letter and in spirit. This and subsequent statements by Viceroys and Secretaries of State, therefore, involve the retention of communal representation for the Muhammadan community until such time as they choose voluntarily to surrender it.

Even if they did not hold this view, the Chambers would still consider it highly injudicious to make any change. Territorial representation is only one method of organising representative government, and the fact that it has been generally adopted in the West is no reason for its unqualified adoption in India, where ties of neighbourhood are far less strong than ties of religion and caste. Men are less concerned about rights they enjoy in security than those that are threatened, and the failure of Mr. Jinnah to persuade the Muhammadans of the Punjab, the United Provinces and Bengal to surrender their rights for the sake of an agreement with the Hindus makes it clear that for an external body to seek to deprive them of these rights would provoke widespread opposition and would exacerbate communal hatred.

Similar considerations apply to the Madras Presidency, where the tension between Brahmins and non-Brahmins requires provisions of a like nature, and again to the Punjab where the Sikhs scattered over wide areas can be adequately represented only by means of a communal electorate.

Nomination. It appears to the Chambers that for an indefinite time to come, it will be necessary to employ the expedient of nomination to secure the representation on all legislative and municipal bodies of minority communities or special interests. In a country like India it is, moreover, the only way to secure the very valuable services of men whose social position makes them unwilling to face the bustle and strain of a public election. It is for this reason that it has been recommended that a substantial proportion of the members of the Second Chambers in the provinces should be nominated. Equally, however, it appears that labour and the Depressed Classes can only be adequately and fairly represented if Government nominates some able, honest and educated men to represent their interests.

Further, though the qualification for the franchise is already very low, a large majority of the people still remain without the power to vote. In the past the interests of these depressed and backward classes may be said to have been represented, and ably represented, by the official members of the Council. The proposed exclusion of all official nominees clearly necessitates the extension of the system of nomination in order that the depressed and backward millions may not lose the representation they have now, even thought it be indirect. For this purpose the Chambers recommend that nominations be made to represent these people by members of their own class; for men of good education and ability can be found in every community, and they believe that a man, who has won a position in life in spite of the disabilities of birth, is likely to prove of value and a steadying influence in any legislature.

There has perhaps, in the past, been a tendency for Government to select for nomination men who were generally agreeable to the Government policy rather than those who held strong and independent views. This, however, may be explained, if not excused, by the obligation reposing on Governments, both Central and Provincial, to work through legislatures in which they had only a precarious, or sometimes no, majority. The proposals of the Chambers will alter this state of affairs if accepted, and the pressure of necessity having been removed it may reasonably be anticipated that there will be no inducement for nominations to be made on any other consideration than the representative value of the nominee. This will be better ensured if the power of nomination to both houses of the provincial legislatures resides in the Governor acting on his own initiative.

Commercial Representation. Representation should be accorded to Commerce by means of election by Chamber of Commerce constituencies; but in order to ensure that commercial interests are truly represented, the Chambers consider that it is necessary for the purposes of the Governing Act so to define Chambers of Commerce as to ensure that the membership of the Chambers shall be confined to genuine representatives of trade and commerce.

Considerable dissatisfaction has been expressed during the past few years by the Chambers of Commerce with the methods of election which have been laid down under the election rules of the various Provinces for Chamber of Commerce constituencies, and the Associated Chambers strongly urge that the difficulties which have been experienced and complained of should be removed. They urge that the necessity for nominating an individual to represent a member of a Chamber of Commerce, and whose name must appear on the electoral roll, should be done away with, and that the member, when a firm or corporate body, should be given power to vote in its own name. Alternatively, the electoral rolls of Chamber of Commerce constituencies should be revised semi-annually, if not quarterly. Under the present rules many members are deprived of their votes, and are also prevented from nominating persons connected with their business as candidates for election by the fact that the person whose name appears on the electoral roll, prepared perhaps two or three years previously, has severed his connection with the member's business or has died, or is absent on leave. Members of Chambers of Commerce should be permitted to nominate any duly accredited person connected with their business as a candidate and also to nominate any similarly accredited person to exercise the vote on behalf of the member. In short, the membership roll of the Chamber should be the electoral roll.

The details of the position as it stands to-day, with an historical description are contained in the special note drawn up by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, and printed in the Appendix.

The Executive Council. The Chambers of Commerce are opposed to any alteration in the general nature and constitution of the Viceroy's Council. They do, however, feel that there are strong reasons for diminishing the numerous and heavy duties which devolve upon the Commander-in-Chief. His Excellency is required to discharge the functions of Commander-in-Chief, Secretary for War, and Member of the Civil Government. They do not consider it fitting that His Excellency should be called upon to take part in political controversy, and as Army Member defend his department in the Assembly. They recommend, therefore, that he should be withdrawn from the Legislature.

The appointment of a new civilian member of the Executive Council responsible for the provision of munitions and supplies would enable the parliamentary representation of the Army Department to be undertaken by him, and would also provide an additional check on military expenditure. It does not seem on principle desirable that the difficult task of holding the balance between the requirements of efficiency and the claims of economy should rest on one individual. A colleague in the Executive Council would surely be of assistance to the Commander-in-Chief in exercising a control over military expenditure and the Chambers agree with the majority of the Esher Committee that "the creation of a separate department of government responsible for production and provision would undoubtedly result in increased efficiency and consequent economy . . . and that the Indian taxpayer would welcome this scheme, as affording the best guarantee that his interests are safeguarded."

It is not proposed that the Commander-in-Chief should cease to have the rights attaching to full membership of the Executive Council, but he should be excused attendance at meetings which do not affect his department.

On the whole of this subject, the Associated Chambers would invite the attention of the Statutory Commission to the weighty reasoning of the majority of the Army in India Committee's Report, especially Part II Section I, paras. 8 to 16, and Part I, Section III. para. 19.

Secretary of State. The Chambers of Commerce do not think it necessary to refer at length to the question of the powers of supervision and control exercised by the Secretary of State over the Government of India and the Local Governments. The principle is clear, and so far as they know has never been departed from, that relaxation of control by the Home Government has only taken place in proportion as a Colonial Executive has become responsible to the Colonial Legislature. Until the Government of India is responsible to the Indian Legislature, it will have to remain responsible to the Imperial Parliament. As Parliament exercises this control by holding the Secretary of State responsible for the good government of India, it follows that he must continue to control the Government of India. This constitutional doctrine does not, however, in any way conflict with the gradual growth of conventions that the Secretary of State's overriding power will not be normally exercised in particular departments. Such a convention indeed already exists that in cases where the Government of India and the Legislature are in agreement on a fiscal question, the Secretary of State will not override the agreed policy.

It follows equally from the principle above laid down that a consequence of giving responsible Government in the provinces will be to enable, and indeed to require, the Secretary of State to cease to exercise any control over the Provincial Governments as regards provincial and domestic matters. They do not think any change in the legal powers of the Secretary of State are needed, for, in the event of a breakdown of Government and a consequent suspension of the constitution of a province, the Secretary of State's responsibilities will at once return.

Statutory Safeguard against Legislation Discriminating against British Commerce. The Chambers of Commerce are greatly concerned at the tendency shown by Indian politicians to introduce legislation discriminating against British commercial interests established in British India. It may reasonably be claimed that the remarkable increase in the wealth of India during the last century has been due more to the initiative of British firms than to any other cause except the establishment of Peace by British political rule.

British commercial houses have been established in India for over a century, and they may claim to have shown the way for the economic developments which have enabled Indians subsequently to embark upon similar ventures. It was principally with British capital that jute mills, coal mines, engineering works, coastal shipping, and ship repairing yards were started in days when India possessed no such enterprises. It was principally with British capital that the railways were built which facilitated communication between the different parts of India, thereby first establishing the idea of a common Indian nationality, and by facilitating the transport of grain mitigated the horrors of famine. It was principally with British capital that vast irrigation works were built which have made productive large tracts of country previously desert. It was principally British capital which turned vast areas of jungle into wealth-producing tea gardens. The European firms in India, so far from desiring to hamper indigenous enterprise, welcome it as likely to increase the wealth of the country to the advantage of Indians and British alike. They do, however, claim on grounds of justice and expediency that the Indian legislatures shall not be in a position to imperil the existence or development of any commercial or industrial interests established in India by legislation or taxation indicating discrimination of a racial or communal character. The Chambers confine themselves to asking for " national treatment " only for industries and commerce established in India, whether registered there or not; and nothing in this demand is to be construed to prevent the imposition of tariffs for revenue or protective purposes. Fiscal autonomy has already been granted to India by the Imperial Parliament, and India has adopted as a policy some measure of protection.

The Chambers feel, however, that this restraint should only apply in the case of countries which do hot discriminate against India. British commerce in India asks for no privilege, but merely for the same impartial treatment as is accorded to Indian commerce in Britain. Such a provision is a familiar clause in commercial treaties between two fully sovereign countries.

Such a prohibition would admittedly be a novel constitutional provision, but there is no lack of precedent for the principles it rests upon. Capitulations are authority for the proposition that European countries have found it necessary to insist on certain safeguards for their nationals resident in Oriental countries; commercial treaties show that to accord " national treatment " to foreigners established in the country is not considered derogatory or inexpedient by fully sovereign states; the constitutions of the United States and other confederations are evidence that a fundamental law can be effective in protecting personal and commercial rights against the caprice of popular legislatures.

The Chambers suggest that this should take the form of a clause inserted in the next Government of India Act, which will be an integral part of the statute creating the Indian Constitution. This would enable any person aggrieved to move the courts to treat as ultra vires any measure of an Indian legislature purporting to enact discriminatory legislation or taxation. This clause should extend to Acts passed by the Central or Provincial legislatures, and to bye-laws or regulations passed by Local Government bodies.

The Chambers conceive that the next step towards making India a federation of autonomous provinces will necessarily include a Supreme Court to interpret that constitution, and to adjudicate upon the reciprocal rights and obligations of the Central and Provincial Governments and of the Provincial Governments inter se. In this case the ultimate tribunal in India for interpreting this clause would obviously be the Supreme Court, subject to an appeal lying as of right to the King in Council.

Federation of India. The Chambers of Commerce are of opinion that economic and political developments in India are tending more and more to compel a federation of the whole of India, including the Indian States. They therefore consider that any constitution for British India which does not take into consideration and in some way include the Indian States must be regarded as provisional only. They are strongly of opinion that it would be immensely to the advantage of both the Indian States and British India if some constitution could be agreed upon which would make the whole of geographical India into a single economic unit.

One of the gravest obstacles to increased trade between British India and the States is the immunity of the Governments of the latter from the jurisdiction of any courts even in purely commercial matters. It is clear that it can only be by a voluntary limitation of their sovereign rights by the princes themselves that this obstruction to trade can be done away, but the Chambers believe that acceptance by the State Governments of a liability to be sued on commercial contracts and of machinery for executing decrees obtained against them would result in a great increase in trade between the States and British India to the benefit of both parties.

Meston Settlement. The Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon as a body are not able to put forward any proposals for a redistribution of provincial and central revenues, owing to the fact that their members necessarily regard the question from the point of view of their respective provinces whose interests are to a large extent conflicting.

They consider, however, that a satisfactory solution of this problem is an essential condition of the successful working of any new constitution proposed for India, and they consider it to be a problem of such complexity as to require the careful and prolonged investigations of an expert Committee specially appointed for the purpose.

They have, therefore, already recommended to the Statutory Commission the appointment of some such expert Finance Committee to examine this problem and to report thereon to the Commission. Individual Chambers of Commerce will make separate representations to this Committee if appointed.

Conclusion.—In conclusion the Chambers desire to state quite explicitly the reasons which have led them to advocate a general advance to responsible Government in all the Provinces. They do not delude themselves with the belief that according to the strict interpretation of the Preamble to the Government of India Act, (Parliament " must be guided by the co-operation received from those on whom new opportunities of service will be conferred, and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility ") the evidence will establish a case for any development of self-governing institutions in the Provinces of India. They believe that there is a lack of evidence to show that Indians are capable of governing themselves; there is, however, equally a lack of conclusive evidence to show that Indians are incapable of governing themselves. The Chambers are anxious that there shall be no ground for any suggestion that Britain has not honoured the pledge given in the House of Commons on the 20th August, 1917, and for this reason they recommend that self-government in India should be given a fair, and more than a fair, trial.

They do, at the same time, recognise that Britain is under an obligation of honour not to hand over the destinies of minorities, the Depressed Classes and those who are economically most helpless, to the control of an indigenous oligarchy unless that oligarchy gives proof of being as willing to constitute itself a trustee for the whole body of the Indian peoples, regardless of race, creed and caste, as the British Government has been. The Madras Adi Dravida Jana Sabha said in their address to Lord Chelmsford and Mr. Montagu, that, " they would fight to the last drop of their blood any attempt to transfer the seat of authority in this country from British hands to the so-called high caste Hindus who had been oppressing them in the past and would do so again but for the British Government "; and the Chambers of Commerce believe that this address expressed the inarticulate sentiment of many millions of Indians.

The terms of reference of the Statutory Commission require it to report, " to what extent it is desirable to establish the principle of responsible government, or to extend, modify or restrict the degree of responsible government then (i.e., now) existing." The evidence at the present juncture is inconclusive, owing largely to the financial and constitutional difficulties which have affected the working of dyarchy; but the Associated Chambers of Commerce consider that if further instalments of responsible government are to be given automatically from time to time without safeguarding the interests of the mute masses of India, Britain will have been guilty of betraying a trust not incompatible with, and equally as sacred as, the Declaration of 20th August, 1917.

Therefore, they conclude this Note with a strong expression of opinion that if the full measure of responsibility for Provincial Government which they have recommended, is granted, and if it fails to attain to that standard of efficiency and impartiality which would justify its continuation after fair trial the British Government will be forced on grounds of its responsibility to India and to humanity to resume again the control voluntarily delegated.

APPENDIX.

Memorandum by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce regarding the election of representatives of the Chamber on legislative bodies.

For many years the Chamber has returned representatives to the legislatures. The principle of the election of these representatives was conceded when the Morley-Minto Scheme of Reforms was introduced in 1910; prior to that time the Chamber had recommended members for nomination by the Government. In regard to certain bodies other than the Legislative Councils the principle of election was in operation, but, unfortunately, the simple methods of election followed in respect of these bodies were not adopted for the Councils. A more complicated procedure was introduced, and this became still more complicated with the establishment of the Montagu-Chelmsford Councils ten years later. For an attempt was then made to bring the procedure for commerce and industry constituencies into line, more or less, with the procedure prescribed for general constituencies. This necessitated an Electoral Roll, and the question at once arose as to what names were to be entered on the Roll.

2. With one exception the members of the Chamber are firms, companies, or corporations, and it was agreed, in 1920, by Government and the Chamber, that the provisions of the rules would be complied with if the names of the members, exclusive of aliens, were entered on the Roll. This arrangement lasted until 1924, but in the petition presented against the return of Mr. Byomkesh Chakrabarti to the Bengal Legislative Council as a representative of the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, the Commissioners took the view that only the names of individual persons, and not the names of firms, companies, or corporations as such, could be entered as electors on the Electoral Rolls of commerce and industry constituencies. The Chamber did not contest the decision of the Commissioners as to the legal interpretation of the rules as framed, and in July, 1924, the Government of Bengal informed the Chamber that, in order to give effect to the decision, it was proposed to submit for the consideration of the Government of India certain modifications in the Electoral Rules, of which particulars were given. Meantime, however, recognising that the position must be accepted for the time being, the Committee of the Chamber had already taken steps to prepare a revised Electoral Roll for the Chamber constituency of the Bengal Legislative Council; and this Roll was in due course completed by getting the various firms, companies, and corporations each to nominate an individual connected with such firm, etc., for inclusion in the Electoral Roll. The Chamber's reason for taking the initiative in regard to the Bengal Council Roll was the doubt whether, in the forthcoming session of the Council, the presence of the Chamber representatives in the Council might not be challenged on the ground that their election was invalid.

3. But the modifications suggested by the Government of Bengal, and referred to above, did not meet with the approval of the Chamber Committee, and they informed Government that they were not prepared to accept a system of election which necessitated an Electoral Roll giving the names of persons, that is to say, the names of partners in firms and directors of companies. They pointed out that such a Roll may be considered to be for all practical purposes impossible in the case of the Chamber, because of the frequent changes among the personnel of partners in firms and directors of companies. The Committee accordingly proposed that the alterations in the electoral rules should be such as to enable members of associations such as the Chamber to elect their representatives in their own way subject to the approval, by the Governor in Council, of their regulations.

4. The Chamber maintains that it was never the intention of the framers of the Reforms Scheme to prescribe, for constituencies such as the Chamber, such complicated regulations as were in fact introduced. Lord Southborough's Franchise Committee of 1918–19 was required to advise inter alia as to how representation could be adequately and effectively secured in the new Councils for special interests. In dealing with this part of their reference the Franchise Committee said in paragraph 23 of their report:—"We are satisfied that the method of representation through associations has worked well in the past and should be continued in the future. Where, therefore, we have found associations which have been proved to our satisfaction to be fully representative of the various interests concerned we recommend that election to the special seats provided by us for commerce and industry should be made by their members. . . . We have recommended safeguards against the abuse of the method of election through associations by proposing that the regulations for elections should in each case be approved by the Governor in Council, who will further have authority to modify the system of representation in order to meet any alteration in the position or constitution of the different associations. The regulations should contain provisions for ensuring that all electors have a place of business within the province." It is clear from this extract that the Franchise Committee intended that the members of associations such as the Chamber should elect their representatives in their own way subject to the approval, by the Governor in Council, of their regulations.

> 1. When the term of office of any Municipal Commissioner appointed under section 8(2), (a), (b) or (c) is about to expire or when a vacancy has occurred, or is about to occur, by reason of the death, resignation, removal or disqualification of any such Commissioner, the Chairman shall cause a notice to be addressed to the President of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the Master of the Calcutta Trades Association, or the Chairman of the Port Commissioners, as the case may be, stating the number of vacancies in which Commissioners are to be appointed, and fixing a date for submitting the return prescribed by section 58(2) of the Calcutta Municipal Act.
> 2. On receipt of the said notice, the President of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the Master of the Calcutta Trades Association, or the Chairman of the Port Commissioners shall respectively proceed to take steps in such manner as may from time to time be decided upon by the Chamber, the Trades Association or the Port Commissioners for the purpose of appointing Commissioners to fill the said vacancies.

6. In pursuance of these rules the members of the Chamber adopted the following resolution in special general meeting on the 7th August, 1900 :—

That until otherwise determined at any future meeting of the Chamber, the appointment of a Commissioner or Commissioners under sections 8(2) of the Calcutta Municipal Act III (B.C.) of 1899 shall be made by a majority of votes of members of the Chamber. Such votes shall be given by voting cards to be issued by the Secretary on the direction of the President and to be numbered and signed by the Secretary. No voting cards shall be received or used unless so numbered and signed. The voting cards shall be signed by the members voting, and shall be returned to the Secretary within three days from the date on which the same shall be issued and no voting cards shall be used unless returned within that time. On the return of the voting cards to the Secretary, such cards shall be examined by two members of the Chamber, who shall be appointed by the Committee as scrutineers. The scrutineers shall report the result of their examination of the voting cards to the Secretary and such report shall, as to appointment of any Commissioner or Commissioners, be final and conclusive.

7. Section 4(a) of the Calcutta Improvement Act, 1911, provides that the Board of Trustees shall consist of eleven persons, one of whom is to be a member of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce ; and section 7(2) of the Act provides that this trustee shall be elected by the Chamber. In exercise of the powers conferred by section 137(1) of the Act the Government issued, on the 20th December, 1911, the following rules governing the election :—

1. In these rules, " member of the Chamber " means a person who—
   (a) is a permanent member of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, or
   (b) is entitled to exercise the rights and privileges of permanent membership of the said Chamber on behalf, and in the name, of any firm or joint stock company, or other corporation, and who has a place of residence in India.
2. (1) On or before such date as may be appointed by the local Government in this behalf, the Secretary to the Chamber (hereinafter referred to as the " Secretary ") shall, under the direction of the President, send to each member of the Chamber a voting card, which shall be numbered and signed by the Secretary.
   (2) Any voting card which is not duly numbered and signed by the Secretary shall be invalid.
3. (1) Each member of the Chamber shall have one vote only.
   (2) Every member desirous of voting at the election shall record his vote on his voting card and sign it, and shall return the card to the Secretary within seven days from the date on which it was issued.
   (3) Any voting card which is not returned to the Secretary within the said period of seven days shall be rejected.
4. On the return of the voting cards to the Secretary they shall be examined by two members of the Chamber, who shall be appointed by the Committee of the Chamber to act as scrutineers.
5. (1) The Scrutineers shall report the result of their examination of the voting cards to the Secretary.
   (2) The candidate who has obtained a majority of votes shall be deemed to be elected, and the report of the scrutineers shall be conclusive evidence of his election.
   (3) If the voting has resulted in a tie between two or more candidates lots shall be drawn, in the presence of the scrutineers and in such manner as the President of the Chamber may prescribe, to determine which candidate shall be deemed to be elected.

8. In the case of the Corporation of Calcutta, the method of election as defined above was in operation from 1900 until the Municipal Act of 1923 came into force. It was a simple, direct and practical method, and it was never known to create even the smallest difficulty. The similar system which was made applicable to the Calcutta Improvement Trust has also worked most satisfactorily since 1911. It may be explained that the procedure which is now in force with regard to the election of representatives to the Corporation of Calcutta requires an Electoral Roll, but the Roll consists of the names of members of the Chamber, that is to say, of firms, companies, etc., and not of the names of individuals. This arrangement is, of course, very much more satisfactory than is an Electoral Roll of individuals, because it has not the result, as the " individual " Roll has in the case of an electorate like the Chamber, that in a short time after the Roll has been completed a considerable number of those whose names appear on it will be found to be absent from India on leave. A point of importance is not only the possible loss of a vote in the election of a representative but—as has been found again and again in practice—the omission of the name of a person willing to come forward as a candidate for election but unable to do so because his name does not appear on the Electoral Roll.

9. The Chamber has been in correspondence with the Government of Bengal on the subject for some time past. They have suggested that the rules should be so amended as to enable the Chamber to elect its representatives on a simpler system. And they are glad to say that the Government of Bengal have expressed their willingness to recommend the amendment of the rules in this sense. The Chamber put forward certain definite amendments as framed by Counsel, and these were largely adopted by the local Government and, the Chamber understands, submitted to the Government of India. It is unnecessary to refer in detail to the changes proposed, but it is sufficient to say that a modification of the rules on the basis of the suggestions would eliminate the Electoral Roll altogether and introduce a simpler system of election similar to that prescribed by the Calcutta Municipal Act of 1899 and the Calcutta Improvement Act of 1911, which is referred to above in paragraph 5.

The Hon. SIR GEORGE GODFREY, Member of the Council of State, President of the Associated Chambers in 1928, and President of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce.
Mr. H. G. COCKE, M.L.A., Deputy President of the Associated Chambers in 1928, and Chairman of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce.
SIR JAMES SIMPSON, M.L.A., representative of the Associated Chambers of the Legislative Assembly, and Past Chairman of the Madras Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. J. H. FYFE, M.L.C., Vice-President, Bengal Chamber of Commerce.
Mr. D. K. CUNNISON, Secretary of the Associated Chambers in 1928, and Secretary, Bengal Chamber of Commerce ; and Mr. A. H. E. MOLSON, Political Secretary of the Associated Chambers.

1. The Chairman : * * * It seemed to me, on looking through your document, that if one were to pick out a single sentence, you might, perhaps, think it right if I picked out the sentence on page 111, which starts with the heading " The Central Government." There, I see you say : " The Chambers of " Commerce are only prepared to favour the grant " of responsible government in provinces on condition " that the position of the Government of India " vis-à-vis the Legislative Assembly, is strengthened." If I understand this document as a whole rightly, that is really the principle which underlies the whole scheme ?—(Sir G. Godfrey) That is so.

2. That means, of course, that we have got to consider two separate things, and also to consider the two in relation to one another. One is, your proposal for a change in the Provincial Government, and the other is your proposals in relation to the Central Government ; and the third is your proposals for the relations between the two. It seems to me that on points of constitutional structure, that is the way it breaks up. Now, let me first of all take in outline your proposals for the reform of provincial Government. Of course, every member of the Conference will have noticed the very striking passage on page 108. * * * " The Chambers there " fore recommend the grant to provinces of constitu- " tions varying up to full responsible autonomy "—I will come back to that word, " varying " in a moment—" provided "—then you mention five conditions : " (a) That the position of the Government " of India vis-á-vis the Assembly is strengthened." Well, I will take that later on ; that is the assumption. " (b) That the Central Government is given powers of " intervention in the event of a breakdown of " government in any province." That is rather my third head, the relation of the two. " (c) That " Provincial Second Chambers are set up." I want you to develop that in a moment. " (d) That adequate " safeguards are provided for the administration of " the Police ; (e) That a clause is inserted in the " new Government of India Act forbidding discrimina- " tion against industrial and commercial interests in " Central and provincial legislation and taxation and " in municipal bye-laws and taxes." One or two of those things, I think, need to be looked into a little more in detail. What does the Chamber mean when it says in the passage I have just read, that they recommend the grant to the provinces of constitutions varying up to full responsible autonomy ? Does that imply variation as between one province and another ?—In the first case, it would be so, and the word " varying " is also used with regard to the expressions, " full responsible government." " Varying " refers to the initial stages, when we do not contemplate that all provinces will necessarily receive the same amount of autonomy, and also in regard to the fact that we did not consider that it was possible to introduce full provincial autonomy straight away. The Central Government must retain certain powers over the provinces.

3. Then at page 108 we get proposals, and I will first of all take the proposals which have to do with executive government as opposed to the constitution of the legislatures in the provinces. You propose to transfer to provincial ministers all subjects, or, in the view of some Chambers, all subjects except Law and Order. Then, subject to the possible qualification about Law and Order, you intend under this scheme, if the other conditions are satisfied, to get rid of diarchy altogether ?—That is the intention as far as the executive is concerned.

4. Then you say you recommend the abolition of the Provincial Executive Council. That is because you propose to have a ministry, I suppose, with joint ministerial responsibility. Do you propose a Prime Minister ?—No, we do not propose a Prime Minister.

5. I am not quite clear how it is intended that the ministry is to be constructed ?—The idea is that the Governor shall consult with leaders of various parties in the Provincial Council, and shall select his ministers from those leaders, giving due regard to the prospects of obtaining a working majority for what you might call the Cabinet ; but we do not propose that he should nominate a Prime Minister or Premier, the idea being that the Governor would preside at the meetings of the ministry.

6. I realise that you propose he should preside, but I want to see how you suggest that the ministry is to be brought together. Is your idea that it is to consist of leaders of different parties, or that it is to consist of members of one party ?—I think it would be impossible, under present conditions, to obtain a ministry from one party. They would never be able to secure a working majority in the House.

7. Is it the idea that the Governor is to choose each of them and then say that they constitute the ministry, or is the idea that the Governor is to choose his principal adviser, who will then advise the Governor about his colleagues ?—No, our idea is that he should nominate all the members, because if he is to preside over them at meetings he must be presiding over a Cabinet of men with whom he can work, and on whom he feels he can rely to carry measures through his House, and he will choose them accordingly.

8. Do you conceive that under that system there is likely to arise an organised opposition ?—Oh, certainly.

9. If you compose your ministry of the chiefs of a series of groups, it is not very easy to see how there will evolve, or might be expected to evolve, an Opposition ?—Well, I think in a provincial council, for many years to come, whatever the grouping might be, there would always be an opposition to it. There would also be break-aways from groups.

10. I meant an organised Opposition, an opposition based on some principle or other ?—We cannot visualise any suitable division of parties as things are in India at the present time, so that we cannot expect to have two parties, or even three parties ; there are almost certain to be more than that.

11. Now taking the legislative side, I see at the bottom of page 110 you propose the abolition of all official nominated members, the ordinary official bloc, so that your provincial legislature would consist entirely of members who are elected and members who are nominated, but not officials, with the possible exception, you say, of a secretary speaking for, perhaps, the Law and Order department, if it was dealt with specially : is that it ?—Yes.

12. I understand that you are not proposing, in the case of the provincial legislature, indirect election : you propose, in substance, to leave the franchise much as it is ?—Yes.

13. I will come back to what you call Law and Order in a moment ; but turning to page 110, you repeat there in more detail what you said on page 108, and what you regard, apparently, as a condition, that there should be a Second Chamber in the province ?—Yes.

14. And I gather that you think it should be partly nominated and partly elected ; perhaps two-thirds elected and one-third nominated ?—That is our suggestion, yes.

15. And do you regard that as an essential feature of your scheme ?—That proportion ?

16. No, the creation of a Second Chamber in the province ?—Yes, we consider that essential.

17. There is one other feature of the provincial scheme, apart from Law and Order, which is of great importance, and very striking. It is at page 110. You say, "The grant of full "responsibility to the legislature"—that means the provincial legislature—" will enable the powers of " certification of the Governor to be abolished." Then I gather that the view of the Chambers is that if their other conditions were fulfilled, they would be prepared to contemplate provincial legislature with a ministry responsible to the legislatures, the legislatures for the most part elected, with a nominated unofficial element added, the Governor presiding at the Council of Ministers, but the Governor being in a position where he had to accept whatever the legislature decided. Do you propose that he should be left with any power of veto over legislation ?—Yes, we would retain that.

18. But no power of certification ; that is to say, the initiation or the effecting of legislation or of finance which is refused ?—Well, in regard to certification we wished to abolish it as far as possible. In regard to this reference to Law and Order, we recognise at once that if Law and Order is what is generally called a reserved subject, the Governor must have powers of certification. We also recognise that even if it was a transferred subject it might, under certain conditions, be necessary for the Governor to have powers of certification, and, in the event of any emergency, we would recommend that temporary powers of certification might be reserved. It might be only temporary.

19. I have not quite followed all this. What you have last said is not in the document, is it ?—It is not expressed in the document, no ; I am developing what the idea was in our minds.

20. I am reading the sentence on page 110 "The grant of full responsibility to the " legislature will enable the powers of certification " of the Governor to be abolished." I appreciate, of course, that if you make special arrangements for the police you may have to make a special exception, but I have not discovered anywhere in your document provisions for the temporary exercise of powers of certification in what is called a time of emergency ? —We had that in our minds when we wrote on page 110, under the heading of " Intervention by the Governor-General," that there might be a breakdown of the Government in a province.

21. But I am speaking of the Governor of the province ?—Yes.

22. I understand your answer to be with reference to that ?—I said we should like to see reserved for the Governor in the province, under temporary conditions, powers of certification which would, as I say, only be temporary, because if it was a serious breakdown the Governor-General would step in under our recommendation and declare that the administration of the province had broken down, and that it must be resumed under executive control. We have not expressed that anywhere, but it is a development of our idea.

23. If you will excuse me for saying so, I hardly think it is a development. I understand the plan as it is given in the document. I read what you say on pages 110–111, and I understand what is meant. It appears to be this : that there shall be no power of certification in the provincial Governor, that it would be quite illogical to suggest such a thing, that responsibility in the provincial legislature is conceded and things must take their course, but that if the situation were such as to require the intervention of the Governor-General in Council, provision might be made for it. That does not seem to me to be quite the same thing as saying that as a temporary matter a Governor might intervene, and I wanted to know what your views were ?—In further discussion we thought a situation might possibly arise where, for some reason or other, the supply of funds was deliberately and obstructively refused, and it would then be necessary, pending a reference to the Governor-General in Council, for the Government to be able to meet payments due, and the Governor would have to have powers to certify such expenditure. We wish to curtail the powers of certification as far as we possibly can, because we feel that they have always been a great grievance on the part of the legislatures and have given rise to a good deal of friction.

24. Let me ask you one question on a subject which is not unfamiliar to us in its various aspects It is apparently by convention always called Law and Order. You know, of course, there is no such head in the Devolution Rules at all. What were you intending to include in " Law and Order ? " Is it police and jails, or what is it ?—We have headed the chapter " Law and Order," and in the first paragraph we deal with judicial administration and in the second with police administration.

25. It is a highly technical matter, but is it your view that if your scheme was adopted the High Court should be a provincial subject, or should it be a Central subject ?—Central.

26. You say : " The Chambers consider that all " the High Courts should be under the Government " of India, both for administration and finance " ?—Yes.

27. We are going to hear the Chief Justice in the course of our sittings, and we shall hear his view about that. With regard to the Police, I gather (and it is certainly not a matter of reproach) that the different Chambers throughout British India are not quite agreed about this subject. It is very natural they should not be?—There is very wide divergence of opinion.

28. And, therefore, you have had to write a paragraph (which is very helpful to us) which makes allowance for those wide divergencies of view?—Yes.

29. I quite see that. I do not think I will ask you specially about that. That is the outline so far as the province is concerned. It is convenient to take the thing I mentioned third next, before we come to the Central Government simpliciter, namely, the suggested means of intervention in case of need in the affairs of the province by the Central authorities. You deal with that on page 110, where you say: "While desirous of making recommendations of so "liberal a character as to meet all legitimate Indian "aspirations, the Chambers of Commerce do not "conceal from themselves the possibility that the "new constitution like the old one may be faced by "deliberate opposition or obstruction on the part of "some Indian group or party. They, therefore, "consider that provision must be made to meet the "danger of a breakdown of Government in any "province. They consider that the Governor-"General in Council should be given powers in case "of necessity to intervene, and, in fact, to suspend "the constitution." I may as well confess to you that my own training and study as a constitutional lawyer, such as it is, makes this phrase, "suspend "the constitution," a little difficult for me. What is it that would happen if the Governor-General in Council in fact suspended the constitution? How do you conceive the course of events then?— * * * Our idea was that in the event of a serious breakdown the Governor would be in touch with the Governor-General in Council and would report all the conditions, and the Governor-General in Council would by executive order be able to declare that the constitution (as we look on it) had broken down, and the Governor, with his permanent officials, would have to take over the administration of the province. Section 59 of the Government of India Act says: "The Governor-General in Council, may, with the "approval of the Secretary of State, and by notifica-"tion, take any part of British India under the "immediate authority and management of the "Governor-General in Council, and thereupon give "all necessary orders and directions respecting the "administration of that part, by placing it under "a chief commissioner or by otherwise providing for "its administration." That was the idea that was in our minds.

31. I daresay I am wrong, and I am quite willing to be corrected, but I had thought that followed on Section 58, and was not intended to be an emergency power "suspending the constitution." Do you think it was?—We refer in our Memorandum to an emergency power, but I think that illustrates the method. You asked how we visualised what would happen if the constitution were suspended. That illustrates the method by which it would have to be done.

32. Do not think I am in the least criticising; it is with the object of being a little clearer, because, of course, although the expression, "suspending the "constitution," is constantly used, for instance, on the continent of Europe, it is not a very easy thing to visualise from the British administrator's point of view. Would it mean that the Governor-General in Council would disband the legislative Council?—Yes.

33. Would he dismiss the ministers?—The ministers would go with it unless the Governor recommended their retention to assist as administrators, not as ministers. The Governor would still have his permanent staff of officials.

34. The officials would be, would not they, the officials of the provincial Government? They would not be the Governor's in any personal sense, would they?—That is another question, as to whether they are members of the provincial services or of the All-India Services. That is a complication which arises.

35. Anyhow, I wanted to be clear what was in your minds. Let us now turn for a moment to the Central Government, which you deal with particularly on page 111. Here, again, we want to distinguish, do not we, between the executive and the legislative arrangements. As regards the executive, as I follow your document, you are not proposing any substantial change; that is to say, the Viceroy would have his council and would choose his councillors?—Yes.

36. Or, rather, they would be appointed by the Secretary of State?—Yes.

37. On the other hand, in the legislature you do propose a change?—Yes.

38. That is argued out on page 111, and also referred to at page 112. Will you please help us a little more about this? Take what you say at the bottom of page 112: "The Chambers of "Commerce recommend that the strength of the "Government parties should be made approximately "equal to what may anticipated will be the "strength of the anti-Government party." I perfectly understand the object aimed at in that sentence, but I should be grateful if you would develop a little how you think it might be written down on paper. Your point is a very powerful one. Your point is that as things are in the Central Legislature, experience goes to show that the opposition, the legislative Opposition, is more numerous than the body that supports the Government, and you make the point (which I think I may say, so far as it goes, is a perfectly good point) that it is not a very happy arrangement or one that is likely to work very smoothly, if a Government in a legislature finds itself the smaller rather than the larger party. Some of us who are accustomed to arrangements of a different sort in Britain do not understand how the Government can get the time of the House, how it can decide when the House shall adjourn, and many other things, when it has not got a majority. I quite understand your point, but how do you propose to remedy it?—We recognise that it is a very difficult matter, and we had a considerable amount of discussion over it. If I may put it in this way, it will give you what our idea was. We quite recognise that it is a very difficult subject, and that the present position is very unsatisfactory indeed; but, unsatisfactory as it is now, it is likely to become more so, probably when provincial autonomy has been given and when some of the provincial Governments may be obstructive to the Central Government. We hope, and with some degree of confidence, that members of the Legislative Assembly being elected by the provincial legislatures, instead of direct by the country, will be men of better balanced ideas than some of those who now attend in the Assembly, but we do not anticipate that they will show less bias against Government. The necessity, therefore, is either to increase the number of nominated officials to half the total strength of the House, or to reduce the number of elected members, or to combine both these procedures. On practical grounds, we feel it is embarrassing to administrations for a considerable number of officials to be sent up to Delhi or Simla to act merely as voting machines, and it is somewhat humiliating for very senior officials who are sent up there to be treated in that way as mere pawns. If they were allowed to speak freely and take part in the debates in the Assembly, the debates would probably be much more interesting and more informed than they are at present; and we recommend that such officials as are sent up by local Governments should be entitled to do this. But on account of the difficulty of sparing officials from their ordinary administrative work and of securing sufficient non-officials of a suitable nature for nomination, we consider the third alternative will be necessary, combining the two: there would be a slight decrease in the number of elected members and a slight increase in the nominated members.

39. In your last sentence you have moved from the phrase, "nominated officials," to the phrase, "nominated members"?—Yes. "Nominated members" includes both.

40. I know it does, but that is what I am not clear about. At present the Legislative Assembly consists of a very substantial majority of elected members (104 out of 140); it consists in the second place of a number of nominated private persons, nominated non-officials. In the third place, it consists of a certain number of nominated officials. I can imagine a proposal that you should drop one of those elements altogether, or a proposal to change the proportions between them. I am not quite clear whether you are proposing to drop any one of these three elements?—No.

41 It will continue, as before, to consist of elected members (though by the method of indirect election), nominated non-officials, representing, I suppose, interests which could not expect adequate representation by election, and nominated officials?—Yes.

42. When you say, "nominated officials," I want to know how you propose to secure what you refer to at page 112, and what, again, you refer to on page 111, near the bottom of the page, where you point out, I think, with great force, how the criticism of the Morley-Minto councils might be applied to the later scheme, and then you say: "The alternatives, therefore, are either to go forward "and make the Government of India responsible to "the Assembly or to strengthen the Government's "position sufficiently to enable it to carry all such "measures as it considers to be highly desirable, "but which could not rightly be certified as essential "to the interests of India." That is not quite the phrase of the Act, but I know what you mean. Does that mean you propose to make half the Central Legislature official?—Official and nominated, because although a nominated non-official is not necessarily bound by any means to vote with Government, on the Government side, a great many of them, naturally, would do so; so that our proposal is to reduce the number of elected members and increase the number of nominated officials and nominated non-officials.

43. In other words, it becomes a sort of half-and-half arrangement; half elected and half not?—Yes.

44. I follow what you mean. * * * On page 114, you say you want, and, indeed, you make it a condition, that there should be some statutory safeguard, something which forbids discrimination, and so on. Now, perhaps you will allow me for the moment, instead of asking a question, to make an observation about it, because naturally, one has been thinking about this, as my colleagues have, a great deal, and I want help. I have tried myself to analyse the different possible ways in which such things might, perhaps, be done. No doubt, it is possible to conceive this, that you might have a section which describes the sort of legislation which it would be beyond the powers of the legislature to carry; and if you could devise such a clause, and then it was suggested that a particular piece of legislation went beyond the powers, broke the rule, you could challenge the legislation in the law courts, and contend that the legislation was waste paper. That is a possible way. I will mention one or two other possibilities in a moment, but it seems to me that there are considerable difficulties in the first method, which would have to be very carefully weighed. The first difficulty, and one which, perhaps, presses on my mind more than on you, is this. It is all very well to talk in general terms, but in the long run somebody would have to draw the clause. It turns on words, you see?—Certainly.

45. And nothing is easier than to demand reasonable safeguards, and nothing is more difficult than to write them down; and that is particularly true in the conditions here, because a great many interests and communities are concerned—the Muhammadans and lots of people. I am not saying for a moment whether their claim is right or wrong, but if you are trying to think how to do it, it seems very difficult to write it down; not, perhaps, impossible, but very difficult. A second difficulty which oppresses my mind very much is this. I think it is a very serious step to open the flood-gates of litigation even wider than they are opened at present. I gather that one-fifth of the revenue of Bengal Presidency is derived from the litigating habit of the people. It is a very serious thing to make it a possible contention in any law court that a particular Bill or Act is ultra vires. All sorts of people might raise the question, and though lawyers are very useful members of society, even lawyers sometimes take a thoroughly bad point and argue it for a very long time, and it is possible that judges may differ in opinion. So it seems to me that the method of saying that protection against discrimination and unfair treatment is to be by appeal to the law courts, is not necessarily very satisfactory to the commercial community. Do you see what I mean?—I follow you, yes.

46. I am not saying it may not be the only way; but have you got any other suggestion to make? There are one or two variants that occur to me, but none of them is very satisfactory?—I think we are strongly in favour of an appeal to the court. We consider that any such statutory safeguard can only be of use to us if it is in the Act, and that we cannot rely with confidence on a mere Instrument of Instructions to either Governors or to the Viceroy.

47. I am not surprised to hear you say that; that is the second possible method which occurs to one. Many people have referred to it. We have had dozens of Memoranda which say: "You ought "to put into your Report the recommendation that "the Instructions to the Governor shall include an "instruction that he is to take care that people are "not treated unfairly," or that he is to veto legislation to do so-and-so. Well, if I may say so, I quite agree with you. I do not myself think, for what it may be worth, that Instructions to Governors, in the nature of things, would be an entirely effective safeguard. It would not give the person who felt himself aggrieved any effective power to challenge. Now, is there any other method? Is it possible, for example, to visualise this: that there should not be an indiscriminate right of appeal to the courts challenging any Bill which anybody thought he might be able to upset, but it should only be if certain leave is given on the ground that the case does appear to be a case of substantial importance raising a real point, that the courts should be appealed to. Would that method give any help?—We have not considered that alternative, but I do not think we should like it. We are much more inclined to pin our faith to the interpretation of the Act and the conditions of ultra vires by a court, because, after all, if it was a question only of obtaining permission from some authority, it might be the Governor, the Governor would be presumably advised by his law officers, and would probably have to accept their recommendations; and law officers have been known to err in giving advice. They might give him wrong advice.

48. I feel that it is in the interests of everybody, if possible, to prevent this sort of challenge being raised, if it has to be raised, except in serious cases.—Yes, we agree with that.

49. And I do not think the method which you sketch out secures that?—Well, if one may be allowed for a moment to refer to what you said about opening the doors to a flood of litigation, I assume that on any one particular Bill or Act, if it became an Act, there could only be one application or one of these proceedings. It could not be continued by innumerable persons.

50. You appreciate, do you not, that if you worked out the scheme on the lines at present suggested, it would not mean merely that the High Court could take the objection, but it could be taken in any subordinate court in the land?—Oh, that certainly was not in our minds.

51. It is so. If you take the Canadian constitution, where there is a strict distribution of powers, and where, therefore, the question does sometimes arise whether the right legislature has passed the Act, the objection could be taken in a police court, and it has been taken in a police court. One of the best-known cases in Australia was taken, in fact, in a police court; so that it does not mean merely that the High Court would decide. Do you see what I mean?—Yes, I see what you mean.

52. I will tell you what I would like you gentlemen to do, and I am going to invite the next deputation to do the same. After all, you are an important body, and you will not be ruined if you have to take a little good professional advice. I would ask you to let us have, on whatever professional advice you choose to employ, the draft of the sort of clause that you have in mind. Do not leave it by saying that you will leave it to the lawyers; just employ the best men you feel inclined to employ, if you do not feel inclined to do it yourselves, and have a committee meeting and put it down. We would really like to have a clause about this. And I think while you are about it you might do this, if you kindly would. Of course, you should remember that if anything of the kind is proposed, it is not likely to be limited to the European or to the commercial case, so that one wants to see what the scheme is?—We can do that, certainly, if you wish.* Our idea, condensed, is here—this is not a legal document.

53. Never mind about that.—I will just read it to show you what we had in our minds as a possible clause. It would have to be developed, no doubt: "No tax nor any law or bye-law shall be valid passed "by the Central or provincial legislatures or by any "local Government body calculated or designed to "discriminate against any commercial, industrial "or agricultural interest established or to be estab-"lished in India by subjects of the British Crown "on the ground of the religion, place of birth, descent, "or colour of the owners, directors, managing agents, "or shareholders of and in the said interests: "Provided that this shall not prevent the Indian "Legislature from requiring the fulfilment of any "conditions in the case of any newly-formed under-"taking in receipt of special assistance at the expense "of the taxpayer or consumer; and provided "further that this shall not prevent the imposition "of such protective duties as may be proposed by "the Government of India and approved by the "Central Legislature: Provided further that the "aforesaid restriction shall not apply in the case "of subjects of such countries as have adopted "discrimination measures on similar grounds against "Indians ordinarily resident in those countries."

The Chairman: I see. Well, I should think it most unfair to worry you about the small technical drafting points, and I am not doing that at all. I am simply saying on behalf of all of us that we should greatly value the suggestion which you might find it possible to communicate to us as to the form of a clause, and I dare say, if you think well, you would take advice about it, would you? I shall not ask more about it now.

54 Lord Burnham: By my own fault, I am certain, I am quite unable to realise in working the scheme of government which is contained in this Memorandum, and, therefore, I dare say Sir George Godfrey, who has had great experience, would, in popular language, give us a picture of the Government he proposes working in the province of Bengal, grouping it under the Governor, the Government, and the Legislative Council. I want to know what the Governor, first of all, would be, and I say that advisedly, because, of course, when he uses the words, for example, "provincial autonomy," and then proposes the intervention of the Governor-General and the Viceroy, perhaps at every turn and certainly frequently, it seems to me very difficult to interpret; but would he deal with the Government of Bengal and tell us how, under his scheme, it will be fashioned? First of all, what will be the position of the Governor?—Of the Governor of a province?

55. Of the Governor of Bengal under your scheme, or of any province?—The Chambers recommend first of all that the Governor should preside at the Cabinet meetings of his ministers.

56. Without power of overruling them?—Without power of overruling, yes; but he would have the power of vetoing legislation.

57. Would he have the power of voting?—No, not at the Cabinet meetings. He will take part in the discussions and preside, and we anticipate that a man of his experience (whether he is specially selected from Great Britain or whether he is a senior man from one of the All-India Services) will have considerable influence on discussions.

58. He will be rather like an American at the League of Nations; he will be an official observer: Will you develop that? What would his powers be, as compared with his present powers, under your constitution? The power of veto would remain as at present?—Yes, the power of vetoing legislation.

59. It would be as contained in the Government of India Act, the same as now?—The same as now. The Government of India Act, of course, will have to be revised; it will require considerable alteration if our suggested form of government is adopted.

60. What changes would be made with regard to the power and position of the Governor?—The Governor will take no executive action; Law and Order apart, there will be no reserved subjects as at present; they will all be transferred, and, therefore, the Governor will not have the same amount of executive responsibility as he has at the present time.

61. You say with the exception of Law and Order?—I say, putting that on one side, because there is a difference of opinion as to whether that should be reserved or transferred.

62. Of course, if it is reserved, then dyarchy continues as at present, with a few small exceptions?—Yes.

63. Do you recommend that it should be transferred or not?—Police administration?

64. Yes. I am not clear about it. You say there is a division of opinion, but does that mean you do not recommend the transfer?—There is too much difference of opinion in the Association for us to make any recommendation with regard to the transfer of the police, but if that remained a reserved subject, then the Governor would still have some executive responsibility for that department.

65. If it continues to be reserved, the powers of the Governor in respect of Law and Order will remain as at present, is that so?—Practically, yes.

66. On the other hand, if it be transferred, will it be in the hands of a responsible Minister whose powers will be the same as those of other Ministers?—Yes.

67. The Governor would have no greater powers with regard to Law and Order as a transferred subject than in regard to any other?—No.

68. A number of your branches (I do not know whether the majority or not) are content that that should be so?—Yes, that is right, I think. (A member of the deputation) Under normal circumstances.

69. What are abnormal circumstances?—(Sir G. Godfrey) The breakdown of the Government, when the Governor-General would intervene.

70. I was asking about the Governor, not the Governor-General. The Governor would have no power because the Governor-General intervened unless the Governor-General made him his agent for that purpose?—You asked us what would be abnormal circumstances, and my reply is "abnormal" would be when there was a break-down.

* See Appendix, page 133.

71. For that purpose you rely entirely on the Governor-General?—On the Governor-General in Council, but naturally he would work through the Governor.

72. He would only work through the Governor if he made the Governor his agent?—The Governor would report the conditions; we are assuming that the Governor is the man who would report that his administration had broken down. The Governor-General would not ascertain that without receiving reports from somebody or other of some sort.

73. Do you contemplate that Ministers should be appointed for a fixed period of years, as is suggested by many bodies, or that they should be at the will of the majority of the Council?—That is a very difficult subject, but the recommendation in our Memorandum is that they would go out on failure to carry anything. They would be responsible to the Council. We say (page 108) "If and when the Ministry loses the con-"fidence of the legislature, and is defeated, the "Ministry will resign."

74. Do you consider, having regard to the political history of Bengal, and the changes in other provinces, you could secure a stable Government in this way? —We recognise there will probably be considerable instability, but we have failed to find any safeguard against that.

75. Have you ever considered what the possible duration of Ministries might be? In France, since the Third Republic was set up, it works out at six months—Yes. France is a very remarkable instance, but France still continues to govern itself.

76. Do you give it more than six months here?—No, not at first. (A member of the deputation) Two!

77. Then, coming to the Legislative Council, can you tell me how you think that is going to work? Will there be any official bloc in the Legislative Council?—(Sir G. Godfrey) No, that will be abolished.

78. How will Government's policy be defended? By the Ministers in the Council?—Yes.

79. You are in favour of a Second Chamber?—Yes.

80. We have not heard much about that. How would you constitute your Second Chamber? I see it in the document, but I thought you might like to describe it in popular language?—We suggested that two-thirds of the Upper Chamber should be elected by the same electorate that elects Members for the Council of State of the Central Government—not by the electorate which is used for the Provincial Councils. The latter is entirely different from the electorate for the Council of State. We suggest the remaining one-third should be persons nominated by the Governor, and our idea there was that they would be drawn from the ranks of notable persons in the province: big landowners, commercial men, chancellors and vice-chancellors of universities, important office-holders, and so on.

81. All the elect. Do you think there would be any difficulty in getting together sufficient men of the required quality and character of a Second Chamber in such a province as this?—No, no difficulty.

82. Would you give the Second Chambers equal powers with the First?—Yes.

83. In matters of finance?—Except in regard to financial subjects.

84. What powers would you give them in regard to finance?—Our idea was that they should have the same powers, except with regard to the initiation of legislation for taxation.

85. But they should have the same powers of amendment and rejection as the Lower House?—Yes. We had not worked it out in detail, but there would be some procedure whereby if there was disagreement between the two Houses, a matter would be referred back, and eventually, if they did not come to terms on referring back, we should recommend a joint conference of the two Houses.

86. How would the Government be represented in the Upper House? Would Ministers sit in the Upper House, or would they have a right to address it?—That is a point we did not discuss, I think, at the time we drew up the Memorandum, but we think Government would have to be represented by what we might describe as Parliamentary Secretaries appointed for the time being—prominent men who would be asked to represent Government in the House, or even by a Minister if there was one in that House.

87. Am I right in assuming that all your proposals are dependent on the conditions you set out for strengthening the Central Government, and so on?—There are certain main principles set out, but we have not attempted to give details.

88. I am afraid I did not make myself clear. What I mean is this: unless you obtain these guarantees, you are not in favour of the proposals you set out; they are all conditioned by and dependent on these guarantees?—They are all dependent on those broad principles.

89. Mainly the strengthening of the Central Government?—Yes, and Second Chambers in the provinces.

90. Therefore, unless you obtain these new, extended powers you are not in favour of the rest of the changes that are set out?—That is right.

91. Mr. Hartshorn: I do not quite understand what the position of the Chambers is on the question of transferring Law and Order. I understood you to say, in reply to Lord Burnham, that there is such division among your members that you cannot make a recommendation on the subject. I do not understand that in the light of your document, because I should have thought if there was a subject on which you made a recommendation it was on the subject of the transfer of Law and Order. You say (page 109): "Some Chambers are averse from "any transfer of this subject, but a majority believe "that the risk must be taken if any real self-"government is to be given to the provinces." Further down, on the same page you say that the majority of Chambers hold the opinion that "The "surest way to make those responsible for governing "realise the need for an effective and active police "force is to make them responsible for the main-"tenance of order so, that their countrymen will "hold them to blame if they fail to secure that "safety of person and property to which the citizen "is entitled." Still further down, you say: ". . . "if provincial Governments are not to be trusted "with that responsibility, the only logical attitude "is to say that the time has not yet come for any "further advance towards provincial autonomy." On page 108, you say: "The Chambers, therefore, "recommend the grant to provinces of constitutions "varying up to full responsible autonomy." I do not quite understand how you think that the provinces could be granted any advance unless they are given powers over Law and Order. If you say it is not essential to responsible government that the people should have Law and Order transferred to them, I do not see how it harmonises with your recommendations for the grant of provincial autonomy. Is it a fact that you have changed your views since the document was prepared?—There is no recommendation from the Associated Chambers as a body on the question of the transfer of Law and Order. When it was ascertained, at the table when we discussed this subject, that there was a wide difference of opinion and there were three alternatives, we agreed at that time that we should make no recommendation. On page 109 we have merely set out the different views held by the Chambers. You will see the last sentence of paragraph 1 "Police Administration" reads: "The different views are "dealt with in the following paragraphs." With regard to the expression, "logical attitude," that has been used on page 109, it was merely an argument put forward by one side, or one party; it is not an argument put forward by the Associated Chambers as a body.

92. But you have given in your document the view of the majority. I should have thought that if you were giving us the majority view of your

Chambers we could take it to be a recommendation of the Chambers as a body ?—We admit that the word, "majority" could be interpreted in the way you have done. But we have used the word in its narrower sense and not in its broader sense. After all, it is a common practice in many bodies not to make a recommendation on a bare majority. In some cases recommendations may be made, though it is a bare majority, but we decided not to make any recommendation.

93. Would I be asking a fair question as to whether this is still the view of the majority of your Chambers ?—I am afraid I cannot possibly tell you. (Mr. T. Gavin Jones) There was a very strong minority for not transferring Law and Order.

94. Sir Arthur Froom : May I know how many Chambers voted for the transfer and how many against ? Was there a poll ?—(Sir George Godfrey) There was no record kept. I should be very sorry if I were to attempt to tell you what, probably, was the number on one side or the other. You must remember that there were three propositions before them, so that the number of members were divided into three groups.

95. I am not criticising anyone, but is it not a fact that the Chambers have varying number of votes according to their importance ?—Yes, when a matter to be voted upon by the Chambers is put up to an actual poll, then the different Chambers will have different votes.

96. The Chairman : I am not asking you to reveal anything, but am asking you just to explain the matter of fact. When you speak of a majority of Chambers (you say that you have 14 in all), do you simply mean that of the 14 the majority took the view, or do you mean that each Chamber counted for something other than one ?—The voting was done by show of hands ; one Chamber had one vote.

97. Sir Arthur Froom : What I want to make clear is whether the Conference has the same feeling or not. I have a strong feeling that this majority was not a majority at all.

The Chairman : I certainly understand the document to say that there was a majority.

The Witness (Mr. H. G. Cocke) : There was clearly a majority of Chambers, but it may be that four or six of the more important Chambers were not with the majority. And if it were a question of taking votes as prescribed by the rules there might have been a majority. I do not say one way or the other. Possibly, some of the larger and more important Chambers were not with the majority and had voting been on the number of votes allotted to each Chamber, which is on the basis of the number of members, the result might have been different.

98. The Chairman : Let us look at page 108 of the document, wherein you give a list of the Chambers, in alphabetical order, which associate themselves with this Memorandum. I am not asking you to say who voted and how, but do I understand correctly that the majority of the Chambers in that list voted in favour of what you have said ?—(Sir George Godfrey) Yes.

99 Mr. Hartshorn : You say, on page 108 : "The "Chambers, therefore, recommend the grant to "provinces of constitutions varying up to full "responsible autonomy." Do you contemplate, under that suggestion, that different stages of advance should be made in the different provinces ?—Yes.

100. Some of them should be granted full autonomy ?—Yes ; some provinces should be granted a fuller measure than others.

101. Have you come to any conclusion as to which of the provinces you think are most ready for the largest measure of advance ?—No, because we think that is a matter for the Governments of each province to decide and put their case before the Commission.

102. You think that different measures of Reforms should be granted to different provinces ?—Yes.

103. Have you considered the possible effects which your proposal, if adopted, would have on the provinces ? Do you not think it is possible that if we grant a larger measure of Reforms to some provinces than others, there would be a strong feeling on the part of the provinces that were left behind ?—I suppose that happens in every case of differentiation.

104. With reference to your proposals on nomination, you suggest that nomination should still be adopted for the purpose of giving to the Depressed Classes adequate representation, and I think you suggest that persons nominated to represent these classes should be taken from their own classes ?—As far as possible.

105. Do you think that there ought to be some provision in the Government of India Act imposing that obligation upon the Government in making nominations ?—I certainly would not recommend that to start with. We recognise that there are difficulties. I think it should be left to the Governor's discretion.

106. Do you think that there are sufficiently qualified men in these different communities to represent them if they were nominated ?—Every possible endeavour should be made to find persons from among their own people rather than having outside people, but, as I said, we recognise that there are difficulties in the way.

107. Major Attlee : I should like you to look on page 108. You say : "It is indeed almost impossible "to draw any line of demarcation between British "and Indian interests in regard to invested "capital. . . ." What is the position to-day in India ? Is the British and Indian capital co-operating in a majority of industries ?—Oh, yes, very much.

108. Has it been comparatively of recent movement ?—Oh, no.

109. Has there been acceleration in the movement of Indian capital into British capital in regard to industries ?—I should say that there has been a great increase since the war.

110. Are there not some industries that are still almost without Indian capitalist interests ?—Do you mean companies with rupee capital ?

111. I refer to the companies operating in India ? —Those companies that have sterling capital with their headquarters in London have not many Indian investors as shareholders, but other British companies which have rupee capital have a very large number of Indian shareholders.

112. Have Indians invested large capital in British companies ?—Some have.

113. Would you say that there is a growing community of interests between the British and Indian capitalists' interests ?—Yes.

114. Do you think that this will tend to militate against any dangers of what I think you call unfair discrimination ?—It certainly ought to, but we cannot rely on it.

115. What would you say about the effects of the Reforms on trade and industry generally ? It is rather a difficult question, because you had the aftermath of the war ; you had troubles of various sorts which might have affected the industry. But would you say that the Reforms have or have not adversely affected the trade and industry in this country ?—Nothing very appreciable.

116. Turning to a different point, I notice on page 112, you set out a number of instances to illustrate the lack of responsibility on the part of the members of the Assembly. When one looks at these instances the point that strikes one, coming from the British Parliament is that the things you criticise are Parliamentary procedure, rather than a sense of irresponsibility. For instance, take No. 5. The member moved a cut in the Budget Demand. Moving reductions in the grant is a common form in the British Parliament. If I want more money to be given for postal employees, I should move a reduction of £100 ?—The point there is not that he moved the reduction, but the point is that it is a demand to give higher pay to the subordinate employees of the department at a time when the department was not paying its way and had not the means to do so.

117. Now, about the second instance. "It is no "concern of mine to solve the difficulties which the "Government may experience in making two ends "meet in case this amendment be accepted by the "House." I think that is a very sound constitutional attitude which is always taken by every opposition. Do you like to supplement?—There is a great deal of difference between a Government that has a working majority and can actually pass such measures as are necessary for the good government of the country and a Government which has not got a majority in the council and cannot get measures which are necessary to the country passed. No doubt, there are powers of certification, but our desire is that they should not be used, if possible. Excessive cuts made certification inevitable.

118. That leads up to another point—the difficulty that you have to face at the present moment—that the Reforms have in effect put most of the provincial people in the opposition in the Central Legislature?—That is right.

119. In this document, which is very interesting, you have suggested that you might get over the provincial legislatures by giving responsibility to the people, but at the same time you want to put in a large nominated element in the Central Legislature, so that in effect the tendency will be that the elected members will claim to represent the voice of India and the Central Legislature will be in opposition. Therefore, you will not have any responsibility. There is a tendency in a Nationalist movement to concentrate on the Central Legislature and the minor legislatures, and even local governing bodies are used as fortresses to be captured. Will not there be a danger there by keeping irresponsibility in the Central Government entirely that you will create irresponsibility in your local legislatures?—We think that the provincial legislatures will become much more important than hitherto.

120. Is not there a danger that the party that wants self-government in the Central Legislature will capture all the seats they can in the local legislature and use it merely as a weapon to try and gain their purpose in the Central Legislature?—Yes, and, therefore, it is essential that the Central Government should be strong enough to resist that.

121. The strength not depending on the popular votes?—No.

122. With regard to the Second Chambers, in the document that we have you have not laid down the exact details. In effect you have placed in your Second Chamber all the vested interests—such as land, commerce, and so on?—Yes, intellect, too, we hope.

123. Is not there a danger there, if you put all the vested interests in the Upper House? Your object is to create a strong Labour party in the Lower House?—We have not attempted to name the number. We do not want too big a number. We want the Upper House to be a small, compact body and the idea of the nominations there is that many useful men in all departments would be prepared to serve in the Upper House if nominated and we should have very valuable workers there who would not be prepared to contest seats at a general election.

124. You propose joint sitting in the case of trouble between the two Chambers?—Yes, if they are unable to agree.

125. Therefore in effect the Lower House will be more or less at the mercy of the Upper House unless they can have such a big majority in the Lower House that they can vote down the Upper House plus the Opposition in the Lower House?—I do not think the Upper House will take an unreasonable view. It will not be quite the same thing as the Lower House in regard to parties. They are much more likely to take a reasonable view, and will not obstruct measures which are necessary and advisable. It is difficult to visualise any distinct party system in India for many years to come.

126. Is not there a great disinclination in the Legislative Councils to impose the necessary taxation if needed?—Very strong, yes.

127. And that is stronger among people, I think, who have got a lot of money than those who have got nothing?—Yes.

128. Do you think the Upper House will be averse to put on taxation? Take, for instance, the landowners under the Permanent Settlement of Bengal. Will there not be rather strong opposition to any attempt to put some form of taxation on their unearned increment?—Amongst their own class, certainly.

129. And they are going to form a good part of your Upper House, are not they?—Some of them, certainly.

130. Colonel Lane-Fox: You have suggested the grant to provinces of constitutions varying up to full responsible autonomy. But you have not suggested the machinery?—We regard that as a matter for the Commission to consider.

131. You have suggested it without realising how you are to carry it out?—We cannot carry it out.

132. You recommend a constitution of varying degree. That means you start with a certain amount of information. Whom do you recommend as the authority, and on what grounds?—You mean who is going to make the grant, or who is going to recommend the method?

133. Supposing we recommend some period for you to come up, who would be the authority to deal with that?—The British Parliament.

134. On what grounds? On whose recommendations?—On the recommendations of the Governor-General.

The Chairman: I have understood the use of the word "varying" to mean that you thought it was possible that under the present Reforms there might be a more complete advance to provincial autonomy say in one province than in another. Then the question arises, how is the one behind to get up to the other? If you deal with that it might be either because the Constitution makes a provision for that, or it might by the expression of view by some higher authority later on. I do not think they mean that there is to be, in the case of one province, a variation from time to time. They are thinking rather whether all are going to start at the same level now.

135. Colonel Lane-Fox: You mention as one of your chief safeguards the Second Chamber. But is it not that rather an illusory safeguard in many cases? How is it a safeguard when you transfer all subjects? Supposing you give charge of Police to a Minister, and he administers it as between his community and another, or something of that sort, how is the Second Chamber going to help you?—It is mainly for the purposes of legislation.

136. Lord Strathcona: On the point of Law and Order, would it be a fair summary of your position to say that your Association do not contemplate the transfer of Law and Order unless the five safeguards mentioned on page 108 form part of the new Constitution?—Yes.

137. On page 108 you have stated about dyarchy. I wonder if it is fair to ask you, Sir George, whether it is your opinion that possibly the period of ten years has been rather too short to give a fair test to diarchy?—In my opinion, I think that dyarchy as introduced is such an impossible form of government altogether that it would be difficult to say whether ten years is too short or too long. Personally, I think it is too long.

139. Just one question on Services, page 110. Do you think that if your proposals were accepted and embodied in the New Government of India Act, there would be something in the nature of a quick withdrawal of the British element, and do you think that the Services would be affected to such an extent that there will be rather a rapid withdrawal of the British element?—There is certainly a belief that there would be a very strong tendency to withdraw from the Services.

140. But I gather that the view of the Associated Chambers is that they appear to face that, and as they say on page 110 they are not opposed to Indianisation provided that it does not involve a decline in efficiency or an injustice to Europeans and Anglo-Indians. Your main point is that you want to ensure efficiency in Services and no injustice to those who are in service?—Yes.

141. On page 115, you refer to the Federation of India, and you include the Indian States in it. Have the Chambers of Commerce at their disposal any information as to how any such proposal would be regarded by the Indian States?—No, we have not any reliable information.

144. Lord Strathcona: You say in the last paragraph on page 116, "Therefore they conclude this "note with a strong expression of opinion that," and so on. Could you tell us a little more precisely what you mean by that paragraph? Perhaps I may put it in this way. Does that paragraph mean that if the new Constitution is met with obstruction and non-co-operation in India, the Chambers would make a recommendation that the new Constitution should not be proceeded with—Yes.

145. Mr. Cadogan: I want a little more light thrown on your recommendation for the transfer to a Ministry responsible to the Provincial Legislature of all subjects. You also say that the official nominated members should be withdrawn. I do not quite see how ministerial responsibility is feasible without a party system. I postulate that the remaining reserved subjects should be transferred. Take the case of the Minister responsible for the development of Law and Order as it is called. He would be without the support of the official bloc. He has no party at his back, and yet you make him responsible to the legislature. I understood you to say in answer to Lord Burnham when he suggested that the Ministry might be constantly falling that you do not contemplate that situation with any great misgivings. But would you have some suggestion on the lines that the Ministry would be given some security of tenure during the life-time of the Council? Would that conflict too much with the theory of ministerial responsibility?—We discussed that fully, and we were quite frankly frightened of giving fixity of tenure to Ministers, because there might be Ministers entirely unsatisfactory, and we thought it very much safer in spite of the probability of instability that we should make them responsible to the legislature.

146. Cannot you be equally frank of the situation of the ministry being constantly threatened with defeat? Is not that equally a dangerous situation?—We recognise that it is probable and there are very great disadvantages, indeed. But we consider this better than giving them a fixed tenure.

147. You are looking forward to a party system being valuable in the provincial legislatures?—Yes, party system may be evolved eventually.

148. Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi: You were telling us a short while ago that you contemplate the conditions at present prevailing in India and think that there will be always an Opposition in the Council. That means that there is always a party completely opposed to Government and the carrying on of government? Is that your idea?—That is so.

149. Do you also mean to tell us what your idea is, whether that party will be a very strong party and whether that party is likely to be the major party?—The party in opposition?

150. Yes; it is generally opposed to Government. In that case how do you reconcile that with your suggestion that the Governor should have no powers of certification, no power of vetoing, and things of that kind? If the Governor has no powers of certification, how do you propose things should be carried on?—We do not contemplate that the party or group of parties which produce ministers for working in a Cabinet will be in a minority. Opposition may come from one party or two parties or parts of parties; but we anticipate that the ministers will carry a working majority in the House, and if they carry a working majority in the House the Finance Bill and other proposals they put forward will be passed through the House. We hope that the conditions of provincial autonomy will remove the idea at present existing in the provincial councils that everybody except an official is to be in opposition. We hope that will disappear.

151. That is why you recommend full provincial autonomy? And you visualise a state of affairs in which the Governor will have no powers of certification and no powers of veto, but at the same time has to preside over the Cabinet merely as a figurehead. Is that the idea?—No, we do not want him to be a figurehead, merely attending garden parties and giving champagne dinners. We want him to have a very great influence. We recommend he should retain the veto.

152. Tell us, what powers do you want to give him? In answer to certain questions put to you by the Chairman and members of the Commission, I do not think you were quite clear as to what powers you intend the Governor should have?—It shows the difficulty of expecting us to be thoroughly conversant with all the details of the rules connected with the Governor's powers as they are at present; but the way we understand it is that over transferred subjects the Governor at the present time has very little executive or directive power, but he still sits with his Ministers—please correct me if I am wrong—I believe he now sits with his Council and Ministers—and we think that he should continue to sit with his Cabinet, and his powers will be more or less what they are now in regard to transferred subjects.

153. Will it surprise you to know that the Governor has at present very large powers even with regard to transferred subjects?—You mean in regard to certification, in case there is a necessity.

154. In the working of the transferred departments. On the question of Law and Order, I just want to make clear this point. I will not endeavour to enter into the question whether a majority of the Chambers or a minority of the Chambers hold the view, but there is a view that Law and Order should be transferred, and there is a view that Law and Order should not be transferred. Now, supposing Law and Order is transferred, as regards the safeguards, would you suggest beyond what you were just telling us, that the safeguards should be all centred in the Governor-General, any other safeguard?—That has exactly been our difficulty. We have been working on this question of Police administration. It is certainly one of the main difficulties.

155. Do you also recognise that as things are at present in India there is a lot of communal feeling and that members of one community, unfortunately, do not trust the members of the other community in case of riots and disorders and things of that kind? I may also remind you that in the last Calcutta riots cases occurred when the Police officers were asked to conduct enquiries through non-Indians. Having regard to that, you still think that Law and Order should be transferred?—The Association has not recommended that Police administration should be transferred.

156. Then you are throwing a different light. You do not actually recommend the transfer of the Police?—No.

157. Then, what is your definition of Law and Order? If that does not include Police, what does it include?—Law and Order does include Police. I think it has been discussed, but we as an Association have not recommended that Law and Order or the Police administration should be described as transferred subject.

158. That is why I made my question quite clear.

It is not my intention to go into the question whether the Chambers as a body recommended the transfer of Law and Order. My position was this. From your Memorandum it was quite transparent that certainly a certain section recommended the transfer, and perhaps another section did not. My question is based on the suggestion of that section which did recommend the transfer, and having regard that I asked you a series of questions enquiring whether you thought that when that section recommended the transfer of Law and Order they had taken into consideration the question of the prevalent communal feeling ?—Certainly they did.

159. And in spite of that they thought that Police might be transferred ?—Yes, always subject to the safeguards which they were unable to enumerate or specify in detail.

160. Then you go on to say that you recommend the withdrawal of all official and non-official members from the provincial legislatures. Is that so ?—The bloc of officials.

161. And not non-officials ?—Not the nominated non-officials.

162. You still want to retain them ?—Yes.

163. I now come to another point. You seem to be rather strong in your recommendation about what is known as indirect election for the Assembly. At the same time you do not quite tell us clearly what your ideas are as regards the direct or indirect election to the provincial Councils. What is your view ? Do you recommend indirect election for the local legislatures, or do you not ?—No. Direct election.

164. Have you considered the effect of a proposal like this ? I take it from a perusal of your Memorandum that the reason why you recommend indirect election to the Assembly is that you think that members there do not really possess that representative character which you want they should have, and, therefore, you recommend that these members should be returned by the local councils, that is to say, you want men who really can remain in touch with the constituencies and who are really true representatives. If that is the point, why should you recommend indirect election to one and direct election to the other ? It might be clear if I just give an illustration. Are you aware that the Upper India Chamber of Commerce in their evidence before the Conference very strongly advocated indirect election even to the provincial Councils, and recommend what is known as electoral colleges ?

The Chairman : We know, of course, that there was a recommendation made in favour of indirect election, which you have referred to. Now, let me ask, what is the question you want to put. You do not want to go through the history of the thing ?

165. Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi : I want to know whether they also support the scheme put forward by the Upper India Chamber of Commerce in regard to the electoral colleges ?—I think we have got it down in our Memorandum. You will find it at the bottom of page 112 and the top of page 113.

166. What is the idea in supporting indirect election to the Assembly and not the provincial Councils ?—We hope that the standard of members for the Assembly would be improved by being elected by the indirect method, by the provincial legislatures. Our arguments with regard to provincial councils are set out on page 113: " . . . and the Chambers have given anxious " consideration to the question whether to recom- " mend that a return should be made to the Minto- " Morley system under which provincial Councils " were elected by local bodies. A majority of " the Chambers, however, are opposed to making " any such recommendation, for the problems dealt " with in the councils are more nearly within the " grasp of electors, and allowing for the spread of " general and political education, it may be expected " that the electors will in the future be able to form " more intelligent opinions on the questions raised " at provincial elections. They also doubt the " political expediency of depriving these electors " of powers and rights they already possess."

167. Might I just go back to that vexed question of the transfer of Law and Order. It is a fact that some of you have recommended that ? Now, supposing Law and Order was put in charge of a responsible minister, and at the same time that minister had a board consisting of, say, a European, a Muhammadan. and a Hindu, to advise him, would that meet your objection ? Supposing there was a statutory board like that ?—It is rather difficult for us to give an opinion on that point, because it is a question arising out of what we have not recommended, but I think our feeling would certainly be that it would be an impracticable proposition.

168. As regards your recommendation as to separate communal electorates, do you consider that the pledge given as regards communal representation by the British Government should be fully honoured both in letter and in spirit ?

The Chairman : I think we can assume that. You are quoting the Memorandum on that point.

169. Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi : I am asking this because there seems to be a conflict of opinion amongst the Chambers on certain points. Therefore, I thought I had better make sure of that point at any rate. You quite agree with that, or is there any difference ?—We all agree.

170. Do you consider that the only form of government suitable to Indian conditions is the federal system with complete autonomy and residuary powers vested in the constituent States, the Central Government having control only of such matters of All-India interest as may be specifically entrusted to it by the Constitution ?—I think you are asking for an opinion, which I really am not in a position to give you on behalf of the Association ; but we have referred to the danger of excessive decentralisation.

171. You have raised it in your memorandum. I merely put things in a different language. The idea is there. You talk of federal system ?—If I may say so, for the moment, we have felt throughout that we are working on the declaration of August 20, 1917, and then we have gone on to state what we are prepared to support or recommend, subject to certain safeguards or conditions, but if you ask an individual his personal opinion as to whether a particular form of government very much modelled on the West is suitable to India or not, that makes it entirely different.

174. Mr. Travers : In dealing with the position which your report would bring about, you say that the Governor would take the chair at meetings of the ministers and would in some degree be in the position of the Prime Minister. Do you not think that in taking the chair at meetings of the ministers and assuming some of the duties that are usually performed by a Prime Minister, the position would quickly become impossible ?—No ; not at all.

175. You think that he could do it without having the powers of the Prime Minister, and that he could yet take the chair at meetings without making his position at all invidious ?—Yes.

176. The Governor, of course, sits as representing His Majesty in the provinces. Do you not think that it would really be better if you kept him apart from all such questions of politics that the ministry might discuss ?—Then he becomes merely a figure-head with little influence.

177. One more question I want to ask you, Sir George. You yourself have been a member of the Bengal Legislative Council, and many of your deputation have also been members of provincial Councils. In regard to the Budget, there are certain items which come before the council dealing with His Excellency the Governor's staff and his household which, in our view, raise discussions of a very undesirable nature. Do the Associated Chambers think that it is desirable for all such items to be removed from the Budget to a civil list ?—I am bound to say that we did not consider that point, but I think individual opinions would certainly be strongly in favour of it.

178. I have one question to ask about the Services. You say in one of your paragraphs (page 110): "it is "generally recognised that the withdrawal of the "bulk of the British element would jeopardise the "success of any Indian constitution." You say, in another place (page 110): "The Associated Chambers "desire to point out that they are not opposed to "Indianisation provided that it does not involve "a decline in efficiency." It seems to me that those two paragraphs are contradictory, unless you specify a proportion. Are the Associated Chambers disposed to recommend a proportion of the Services that should be retained?—We do not want, certainly, to go beyond the Lee Commission's recommendations with regard to proportion.

179. Sir Arthur Froom: With regard to your proposal that the Governor should select a Cabinet from the members of the Council who can control a majority, do you mean to convey by that that all the members of the Cabinet should be selected from one party?—No; we expect the Cabinet to be selected from different parties.

180. In fact, you will establish a communal Cabinet, will you?—It might be what is called a Coalition Cabinet.

181. Then do you think that Cabinet will last five minutes?—Why not? One party will have no chance of standing by itself.

182. My question was, do you support the idea of a mixed communal Cabinet being set up?—It will have to be.

183. One question as to what will constitute a breakdown of Government. Would you visualise that supposing a Provincial Legislature passes some measure which the Government might think is wholly against the interest of the Province, the Governor-General should step in and call upon the Governor to take up the administration himself?—It will be rather difficult to describe it; but assuming that the Governor after various efforts finds that it is quite impossible to retain a Ministry which could carry anything through the House, he would naturally have to disperse the Provincial Council and discharge the Ministry. There would be a breakdown and you would have to make provision for taking over the administration. Another instance might be the passing or attempt to pass some legislation or take some action which is entirely unconstitutional and which causes an impossible position. In such cases the Governor might have to report to the Governor-General requiring his assistance, and asking him to exercise his emergency powers, and the Governor-General would declare a breakdown.

184. At any rate the Governor would be the authority to bring such cases to the notice of the Governor-General?—Yes; we certainly assume that the Governor would advise the Governor-General.

185. As regards safeguards, during our tour we heard in one province the question of statutory safeguards from one community and certain other safeguards from another community. So, I take it that any section sought to be inserted in the Government of India Act would be for all minority communities. Will you support that view?—Yes, certainly.

186. Then about the question of finance. Has the Associated Chambers of Commerce examined the question of finance at all? Are you prepared to give evidence on that question?—The interests of the Associated Chambers are spread throughout all India. We could not speak about finance on behalf of one province or of another province.

187. During the course of our travels, we heard a suggestion that there might be a dynamic Constitution. I do not know if you understand what a dynamic Constitution is. But so far as I understand it, it is a Constitution that within itself would suggest that a time will come to further advancement without any reference to another Royal Commission. Will you support that idea that it could be done without reference to the Parliament?—No; I think, certainly, the Associated Chambers would not desire to see a fixed time set, and then a Royal Commission. We do not desire another Royal Commission. but we cannot contemplate that either the Provincial Governments or the Central Government can have any latent power in themselves to produce such advance. Such a thing must come from the British Parliament.

188. I have only one more question. It is a question which, to my mind, is rather complicated; perhaps you might be able to clear it up. It is this. As each department becomes transferred, the recruitment to that department becomes provincialised, and, so far as I have been able to understand it—I think my colleagues hold their own views in the matter—the effect of it is to reduce the element of the All-India Services in certain departments. For instance, take the case of the Education Department, and the Forest Department; and as regards Law and Order, it might have a repercussion in that department also. Have you any suggestion to make, or do you suggest that there should be some legislation or rules laid down that even in transferred departments in the provinces there should be a proportion, following the recommendations of the Lee Commission, of the All-India Services, although such departments have been made provincial?—I think your point is really based on the system of transferred departments under the present Devolution Rules. But the Devolution Rules were issued under the existing Government of India Act. Whatever form the future Constitution may take, it must come under the new Government of India Act, and necessarily it will follow that there will be a new set of Devolution Rules. It is necessary that those Devolution Rules should provide that some proportion or some substantial extent of the British element in some form should be retained in the Services.

189. By "British element," do you mean that the Britishers should come in through the provincial service examination, or do you wish to preserve the All-India Services? This is the important point—They would come in through the present form of recruitments for the All-India Services.

190. A certain number of them should be allotted to serve in those departments; is that your idea?—Yes.

191. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: On page 108 of your Memorandum, you speak about autonomy of the provinces, and you insist on strengthening the position of the Government of India vis-à-vis the Assembly. Since the Government of India already control almost all nation-building departments, such as commerce, finance and currency, and industrial legislation, can you contend that your suggestion, if carried out, will result in any advance to the people in controlling their destinies from the country's economic point of view?—It seems to me that all the progress that has been made in what might be described as nation-building works, such as irrigation works, agricultural improvements and legislation to endeavour to build up similar progress in other directions has been carried out since the British occupation. It is due to the British occupation, and under the British occupation the progress is still being maintained. I do not see what more rapid advance you can expect beyond that.

192. If no measure of control over any of these departments is given to Indians, do you think they will remain content?—Are you speaking of the Provincial Government or the Central Government?

193. I am talking of the Central Government.—We hope that much importance will attach to working in the provinces, and that able intellectual Indians, who are really anxious to improve conditions and go ahead, will work in the provinces rather than go up to the Central Legislature.

194. Can you suggest any means of strengthening the Assembly whereby you could also recommend the transfer of some control to the Assembly?—Not now. We feel that it might come up at some later stage.

195. Even if you raise the franchise for the Assembly, you would not do that?—No.

196. I will take you next to page 110. There you say that your Chambers "are not opposed to "Indianisation provided that it does not involve a "decline in efficiency or an injustice to Europeans "and Anglo-Indians.". What prompts you to suppose that Indianisation of the Services must necessarily entail inefficiency, and injustice to the Europeans or Anglo-Indians?—That really means cases where the tendency might be in a province to promote and push on Indian officers in the Services to the detriment of British officers. There is a well-known reference to the Central Provinces administration which came out in the Reforms Enquiry Committee's report that the Governor had to overrule a minister because the minister paid special attention to giving promotion to the Indian members of the Service irrespective of claims or seniority on the ground that it was necessary to give Indians opportunities for training. The Governor refused to accept those recommendations and said that transfers and promotions should be made irrespective of the race of individual members.

197. The Chairman: I am not clear whether in the constitution that you propose there will be a right of appeal to the Governor or not?—Every Government servant has the power of appeal to the Governor, and it goes up to the Governor-General, and in the case of All-India Services it goes up to the Secretary of State.

198. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: In your opinion is there any real foundation for the allegation made in certain quarters that Indians are unfairly treated where their interests conflict with those of Europeans?—No; we know of cases the opposite way.

199. Could you quote some?—There was a well-known case of a member of the Educational Service in the United Provinces during the time of Sir William Marris, when twenty-two officers of the Service were passed over in favour of an Indian, and an appeal was made. The appeal went up to the Governor and to the Governor-General and ultimately to the Secretary of State, and it took two years to get that set right.

200. I take you to page 114, wherein you have made a reference to statutory safeguards against legislation discriminating against British Commerce. Although logical reasons may be put forward, nevertheless the Government of India were compelled, probably under Manchester pressure, to handicap the cotton industry in India by the imposition of an excise duty on cotton manufactured, for a period of thirty years. In view of this, what grounds of complaint can you put forward in the event of Indians refusing to accord any more guarantees beyond those extended to British people in other dominions of the Empire?—I think you are referring to the excise duty, but Europeans in India never supported that. We are not defending it in any way; we are opposed to it.

201. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: What I say is in view of that, can you put forward any complaint if Indians refuse to accord any more guarantees than those extended to British people in other dominions of the Empire?

Lord Burnham: May I ask what are the guarantees accorded to British people in other dominions?

Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: If there are no guarantees, then there should also be no guarantee given by India.

202. Lord Burnham: What sort of guarantee?

Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: Here they ask for statutory safeguards; that is some sort of guarantee.

The Chairman: I think the question can be put in this way, "Why do you want statutory safeguards?"

203. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: Is it not that India being a part of the Empire it would be desirable for India to accept the principle of Imperial preference?—Yes.

204. And the Dominions have got Imperial preference, and that is why there is no statutory safeguard or anything given by the Dominions. I hope you would not mind according the same thing to India?

The Chairman: Forgive me for my interruption. I am sure, though unintentionally, you are on quite a different point. It is quite plain what these gentlemen want (whether they are wise or unwise) when they ask for statutory safeguards. That has nothing to do in the world with Imperial preference; it has to do with limiting the power of Indian legislatures to pass particular kinds of legislation which they think would discriminate unfairly against them.

205. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: Has the extreme political agitation in India harmed India's credit in the financial world at all?—I think it certainly has a tendency to restrict the investment of funds in India.

206. Has it not adversely affected financial credit?—Yes.

207. I take you to the top of page 116. In your statement you touch on education, poverty and illiteracy of the masses and appeal to the sense of humanity of the British Government to resume their hold upon India. On the same basis of humanity, do not these conditions, after one hundred and seventy-five years of British rule, substantiate the appeal of the Indian public for progressive Dominion status in order that an attempt may be made for improvement?—We do not say that there is not very much room for more improvement. But we say that the improvements are all due to the British occupation. We cannot see that there can be a more rapid improvement if Dominion status is granted.

(MAULVI ABUL KASEM WAS PRESENT DURING THE AFTERNOON SESSION.)

1. Raja Nawab Ali Khan: Is it the view of your Association that the Council of State which is a revising Chamber does not exercise moderating influence over the Legislative Assembly?—(Sir George Godfrey) It does.

2. In that case, where is the need for reducing the number of elected members in the Legislative Assembly?—We look to the Assembly to act as a really important body and that it should not be necessary to rely on the Council of State for moderating as now.

3. The Chairman: The position seems to be that while the Council of State will be able to moderate in the sense of refusing to pass something which the Legislative Assembly has passed, it cannot have the opposite operation of securing passage of something which the other House has not passed.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : It does pass, for instance by certification. The Princes Protection Bill which was thrown out by the Legislative Assembly was certified by the Governor-General and sent to the other House where it was passed. You will find the provision in the standing orders.

4. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : And the cut in the Salt Tax was restored by the Council of State ?—The Salt Tax was part of the Finance Bill.

8. Sir Hari Singh Gour : The next thing you want to do is that you group the Ministries. You want to have the Ministries representing the various groups, and then you want a general control over all subjects ?—On all central subjects, and general control over the provinces in regard to the passing of Acts, and so on.

9. That means you want a larger control of the Central Government over the provinces ?—I would not put it in that way. I do not say we want larger control. We want a final authority on legislation.

10. I will give you an example. The scheme of the Government of India Act is that the final control is now with the Secretary of State, who has got the power of superintendence, direction and control over the Governor-General in Council, and in the same words and in the same terms and to the same extent the Governor-General in Council has the power of superintendence, direction and control over the province, modified to the extent that in the domain of transferred subjects that control is limited. You would give the Central Government an unqualified control in future, or would you limit that control to subjects which are not directly transferred, and if they are all transferred according to your scheme, then would you qualify this control to that extent ?—I would limit it to the extent that the control would be in the nature of the control now exercised over the transferred subjects.

11. At present the Local Governments have got control over the judges, except those of the Calcutta High Court. You want to centralise all the High Courts and transfer their control to the Central Government ?—Yes.

12. You want further the centralisation of the major ports ?—Yes.

13. Lastly, in answer to Sir Arthur Froom, you said you want continuance of the British element in the Services to be safeguarded in spite of the grant of provincial autonomy, and thus you go behind the Lee Commission's recommendations to that extent. The cumulative effect of all these proposals, do you think, will be an advance upon the present form of diarchical government ?—Yes, a great advance.

14. You think that a large section, or even a small section, of the intelligentsia of the country will touch this Government constituted under your scheme ?—I think so.

15. Do you call this a full measure of responsible government as you call it in the last paragraph on the last page of your Memorandum ? You say there, " Therefore they conclude this note with a strong " expression of opinion that if the full measure of " responsibility for provincial government which " they have recommended is granted," and so on. That is to say, your strong expression of opinion is that the provinces get a full measure of responsibility ?—The full measure which the Chambers have recommended. They do not say that it is an absolutely full measure. The definite expression is " the full measure which they have recommended."

18. On page 110 you say " While desirous of making " recommendations of so liberal a character as to " meet all legitimate aspirations." You regard this new Provincial Government which you have suggested to be a liberal measure of reform which will satisfy all legitimate Indian aspirations ? You say on page 108 that the Association is composed of members predominantly European, but includes also Indians. How many Indian members does it include ?—The members of the Associated Chambers of Commerce are Chambers. Therefore I cannot say that there are any individual Indian members in the Associated Chambers.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : This Memorandum is exclusively prepared by European members ?

19. The Chairman : I do not think that is my understanding. I dare say the arrangement is more familiar to me. The Associated Chambers of Commerce are an association of Chambers, not of individuals, but of Chambers. The constitution of the individual Chambers, of course, can be ascertained by enquiry in each case. For instance, there is Mr. Gavin Jones, who represents the Upper India Chamber of Commerce. Are there Indian members in that Chamber, Mr. Gavin Jones ?—(Mr. Gavin Jones) Yes.

The Chairman : So it is not quite correct to say that the Memorandum is prepared by nobody but Europeans. It is presented by an Association of Chambers and some individual Chambers contain some Indians.

20. Sir Hari Singh Gour : Were any Indians consulted in connection with your scheme ?—(Sir George Godfrey) They were.

21. And they were in agreement with you ?—Yes. There was an Indian at the actual final meeting.

22. Seeing that this affects the people of India much more than it does the European interests, because it deals with the constitution of India, did you not consider it advisable that in urging the changes which you recommend you might take one or two Indians as part of your present deputation, so that they might speak in support of your views ?—That was not considered. There were two Indians present at the meeting when the present deputation was selected.

23. You want a strong Central Government, and your whole scheme is that the will of the executive should prevail, that is the Central Government ?—Yes.

24. In order to achieve that purpose you want to increase the nominations and reduce the elected element ? If you want that, the will of the executive should prevail, why do you want the legislature at all in the Central Government ?—(Mr. Gavin Jones) In an advisory capacity. (Sir George Godfrey) Because I think it will not be compatible with the idea of gradually training up India towards Dominion Rule as has been so often declared.

25. It is just to comply with the prevailing desire that you set up a constitution in the Central Government of the nature you have described. You have yourself quoted at page 111 of your Memorandum that " Responsibility for the administration remains " undivided, with the result that while the Governments found themselves far more exposed to " questions and criticisms than hitherto, questions " and criticisms were uninformed by a real sense of " responsibility such as comes from the prospect of " having to assume office in turn." Now, what prospect of having to assume office in turn do you give to these people in the Central Legislature when you have placed them in a position of utter helplessness vis-à-vis the Executive Government ?—We expect the time will come when they will not be in that position.

26. How long will it take for that time to come ?—I could not possibly say that.

28. I suppose it is with the object of strengthening the Central Government that you have recommended the substitution of indirect for direct election to the Central Legislature ?—No, that is not the view. That is not the main object. The main object was to try and obtain for the Central Legislature members who would be more responsible.

29. Do you not foresee that if the members of the Central Legislature are merely representatives of the provincial legislatures the public at large will organise their forces to capture the central citadel by sending in very large numbers, in fact almost to a man, men from a smaller body of the provincial councils which they will capture, and the result of that would be that there would be a deadlock in the provinces, and the executive government will have nothing to intervene with ?—I think whatever system is devised or thought of there may be deadlocks and difficulties.

30. No, but the difficulty is before us. From 1921 down to to-day a very strong party has grown up in the country crying for more, and saying that the Reforms that have been given are either insufficient or illusory. When you embark upon this new scheme of Reforms and strengthen the provincial Governments would not there be a very strong lever to destroy the very foundation of what little there is of responsible government in the country ?—No, we do not think so at all.

31. Now, you do not admit that dyarchy has succeeded ?—No.

32. Therefore the transition from the state of the present diarchy is to full autonomy ? There is no half-way house ?—I cannot admit that. No.

34. Now, as regards the statutory guarantees, I have the very greatest difficulty of understanding the point of view of your Chambers. You say on page 115, towards the end of the third paragraph, that " The Chambers confine themselves to asking for " ' national treatment ' only for industries and " commerce established in India, whether registered " there or not." Now, it does not matter to whom these industries belong, is it not so ? The Chambers confine themselves to asking for national treatment for all industries and commerce established in India, wherever registered, whether registered in Japan or San Francisco ?—Yes.

35. Now, can you show me any country in the world that flings open its doors to uninterrupted development of commerce by all nations of the world without protecting its own commerce or making safeguards for the development of its own industries ? And you want it to be embodied in the Statute ?—Yes, that is right.

36. As a limit upon the power of the Indian legislature to legislate ?—Industries that have been established and are actually in existence should not be interfered with. You will agree with that ? We want to protect them so that they may be carried on.

37. I am quite clear that you want to protect, but there is a limit beyond which protection cannot be given ?—Protection from undue and unfair interference.

38. Who will be the judge of that ?—We want it to be a statutory provision.

39. Who is going to be the judge of whether it is unfair or undue interference ?—Our contention is that the aggrieved party should be able to apply to the court to say that such and such a measure is ultra vires, outside the Constitution.

The Chairman : Sir Hari Singh Gour, do you think that my suggestion would perhaps bear fruit for the benefit of your question as well as others ? If these gentlemen are going to be good enough to send in their definite suggestion I would not mind reserving my judgment about it until we have seen it. It is a suggestion that occurs to me.

40. Sir Hari Singh Gour : I will just conclude. You are aware that in the British Dominions like South Africa and Australia there are Acts limiting the rights of Indians, and you are further aware that following upon the decision of the Imperial Conference the Indian Legislature passed an Act dealing with the law of reciprocity. Now, if any statutory guarantee is given the effect of that would be that while the Dominions will be able to hit India, India will not be able to hit back at all, and yet the Imperial Conference has unanimously decided that India has that undoubted right ?—We have definitely provided for that in our recommendations.

41. I mention these facts so that your legal advisers may advise you on this subject.—We distinctly say that the Chambers feel that this should only apply in the case of countries which do not discriminate against India.

42. That makes your case worse, not better. You are incorporated bodies and your shares are sold, and freely sold, on the stock exchange. You cannot make a rule that your shares shall not be held by, we will say, a South African or a New Zealander or an Australian. Consequently the new reformed Indian Government desiring to reciprocate against these people would attack you because you have got those shareholders ?—But I take it that in regard to shareholding in public companies the Government has no moral right to interfere.

43. Lord Burnham : There are restrictions in some cases.—There may be for special purposes, but it is a thing that should be avoided if possible.

44. Sir Hari Singh Gour : Of course that is a matter for the consideration of the Government in this country. If we were to make a law preventing you from selling your shares to anybody who is not a pure Indian or a domiciled British Indian or, it may be, a Britisher, that would hit your trade very hard, because the value of your shares will go down ? —That would not affect the companies. It would affect the Indian who bought shares and wanted to sell them.

45. The exchange value of the shares will go down ? —The shares going down does not affect the financial stability of a company.

46. No, but I do not suppose you will be able to get debentures at that low rate which you would otherwise have, if you had your shares standing at a premium. You see that the question is a complicated question, and I do not think the Associated Chambers have considered the various aspects of it. —We discussed it a great deal.

47. Sir Hari Singh Gour : * * * I understand you want the Viceroy's executive council to continue ?—Yes.

48. What is your view about the recruitment of members of the executive council from amongst the elected members of the two Houses of the legislature ?—We should have no objection whatever to elected members of the Central Legislatures being on the council, but we would certainly not be in favour of restricting the selection to the legislature. The Governor-General must be in a position to select his own councillors.

49. Then you go back again to the objection which I have pointed out, in the Montagu-Chelmsford report, that you do not give the remotest chance to the members of the legislature ever to have any prospect of having to assume office in any shape or form ? —Not for the time being, certainly. But there is no reason why an elected member of the legislature should not be a person selected by the Viceroy. I think you will agree that the personnel of the council is a matter of very great importance, and that the best men should be selected.

50. But ask your members in the legislative council what they think of the personnel, and they will tell you what they think about it. Now, as regards the constitution of the Council of State, would you keep the Council of State as it is, or would you stiffen its constitution so as to give the executive a considerable voice ? —No, we make no suggestions for altering the Council of State.

51. You want to continue the Council of State as it is and reduce only the elected members of the Assembly, to which you want indirect elections ?—Yes.

52. And in the provinces you have pointed out that the ministers will be in the Lower House ? —Yes.

53. And they will be responsible to the Lower House ?—Yes.

54. And if the Lower House having an elected majority turns them out what can the Second Chamber do to help them ?—It will no doubt use its influence amongst the different groups.

* * * * * * * *

56. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : Now, I want to be very clear about this. I think you have maturely considered this point. In the provinces, for example, there would be a Prime Minister ?—We are not recommending Prime Ministers.

57. Supposing that point is conceded and a Cabinet is formed with a Prime Minister, then there would be a strong party in favour of the Prime Minister who forms the Cabinet ?—To do that you are getting away from our recommendations.

58. You want the local councils to elect the members of the Assembly.—Yes.

59. Supposing there is no Prime Minister, as you have suggested, then you would have the members of the Assembly elected by the Council, but if there is a Prime Minister you would not have indirect election ?—I am afraid we are at cross purposes.

60. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : The question I want to put is this. Sir George, you have explained that the elected members of the Assembly may be sent up by the elected members of the legislative councils. Now, in case of there being a Prime Minister and his Cabinet, would you still support this idea ?—Yes, that makes no difference ; but it is not our recommendation.

61. Would you kindly enlighten me on this point ? Supposing the Prime Minister has a strong party, in every province there ought to be a strong party, and supposing the Prime Minister has his nominees elected to the assembly, do you think in the Assembly itself there would be a free expression of opinion on subjects concerning the provinces, because these elected members would be under the influence of the Prime Minister ?—That question is based on a hypothetical condition that there is going to be a strong party from which the Prime Minister and the ministers are drawn, but we cannot visualise that at present. In our view the imaginary ministry will be drawn from a coalition party, a group of parties.

62. What about the Prime Minister ?—The Prime Minister would be one of the group who form the ministry, if there is to be a Prime Minister.

63. Then that Prime Minister ought to be supported by the majority of the council members forming the respective parties ?—He ought to be.

64. Because if the Governor calls upon somebody who is the most powerful member in the legislative council, then he alone can form a stable government. Under those conditions what I want to know clearly is whether you would in those conditions support the idea of indirect election ?—Certainly I would.

65. Whether you get a really representative element in the Legislative Assembly or not ?—Yes.

67. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : Then with regard to the transfer of Law and Order, do you think that in the existing condition of strained relations between the communities, you could safely transfer Law and Order ?—I have once before replied to that question already, and I may repeat my answer. We have divided the subject of Law and Order into judicial administration and police, and we recommend that judicial administration and the High Court should be a central subject under the Central Government. As regards police, there are three different points about it as we have already mentioned before the Conference this morning, and we have made no specific recommendation about the police administration.

68. Then you want to strengthen the Central Government by the creation of a Second Chamber ? —Not the Central Government ; it is for the provincial Government.

69. For the Central Government also ?—No.

The Chairman : In the Central Government they propose to keep the Council of State, which is a Second Chamber.

70. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : Then in the provinces you want a Second Chamber ?—Yes.

* * * * * * * *

72. What I want to know is this. In the event of a Second Chamber in the provinces, do not you think that the demands conceded may be nullified by the operations of the Second Chamber in the province ? —Oh, not at all. I do not see why you should expect to find in the body we have suggested men not imbued with a spirit for working in the interests of their country.

73. This is the view in the provinces, I know—at any rate in certain provinces—that the Second Chamber certainly is a sort of drag on the Government. Anyhow, you do not think so ?—No.

75. In your Memorandum you say that very large sums of European money have been invested in this country ?—Yes.

76. It is perfectly true. You have taken a very honourable share in the development of this country ; but, at the same time, you do not want to create an impression in the minds of the people that you stand in the way of the constitutional reforms in India ?—That is so.

77. You wish the Indian people to get on along the paths of freedom and liberty and constitutional reform ?—Yes.

78. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : Your organisation was constituted in 1920 ?—Yes.

79. And the aims and objects are also given down below in four classes ?—Yes.

80. They relate mostly to the protection and promotion of trade, commerce, industries and manufactures ?—Yes.

81. Am I to understand that this is the first time your Association has come into the field of politics in order to make recommendations for the future government of India, or has it taken an interest, since the constitutional reforms, in the politics of the country ?—As a report or recommendation or Memorandum by the Association, this is the first occasion on which it has dealt with matters which may be possibly designated as political ; but, of course, we are doing it as commercial representatives, and that is the reason why, I would explain, we have not gone into all the details connected with constitutional reforms.

82. Dr. Suhrawardy : With reference to the system of indirect election recommended by your Association, may I inquire whether you have considered that under the old Minto-Morley Reforms this system of election was tried on a small scale, inasmuch as the Local Legislature sent up two or three members to the Council ?—Yes.

83. And is it not a fact that this system of election was given up subsequently ?—It was given up at the time of the introduction of the Reforms, of course.

84. It was tried as an experiment under the Minto-Morley Reforms on a small scale, and it has been given up ?—It has been given up when the present Reforms came in.

85. I simply want to draw the attention of the Conference to the fact.—It was not given up on its merits ; it was given up under the new Act.

86. The Chairman has pointed out that it was considered by the Reforms Committee ?—Yes.

87. With reference to Law and Order, do I understand that you are in favour of the transfer of Law and Order to the popular control, excluding the Police ? —Judiciary and administration and High Court.

88. That is to say, so far as Police is concerned, you are not in favour of the transfer of Police to the popular control ; but so far as Law and Order, excluding the Police Administration, is concerned, you are in favour of its transfer to popular control ?

—We are in favour of the centralisation of High Courts, and justice in what we term here judicial administration. As regards the Police Administration, we have made no recommendation as to whether it should be transferred or non-transferred or a central subject.

89. As regards the High Court, do you recommend its transfer not to a Minister, but to the Second Chamber ?—No, to the Central Government.

90. In the event of Law and Order being made a transferred subject in the province, are you in favour of the Governor being given powers of restoration and certification of grants which he now possesses with regard to reserved subjects ?—I think I would rather not reply to that question, because there again it assumes a condition which we have not recommended.

91. You have not considered that point ?—We have considered it very fully. We recognise the difficulty. If you transfer to a Minister and then give the Governor powers of certification, we realise that the effect of that is practically to reserve it instead of transferring it.

* * * * * * * *

The Chairman : We are very grateful to you, gentlemen, and you have been very patient and good in giving us answers to questions from all sides. I am afraid we have kept you a very long time ; but we shall be very grateful if for a time you feel disposed to stay and listen to the evidence which is to be given by the Members of the European Association, but that is exactly, of course, as suits your convenience.

The Witness : We shall be very glad to avail ourselves of the opportunity to stay, sir.

APPENDIX.

LETTER No. 160/13–A.C., DATED 6TH APRIL, 1929, FROM THE ASSOCIATED CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE OF INDIA AND CEYLON.

It will be within your recollection that when the delegates from the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon gave oral evidence* before the Indian Statutory Commission towards the end of January last, the President of the Commission requested them to draft a clause for the new Government of India Act which would provide reasonable safeguards against discriminatory legislation. From the report of the oral evidence it would appear that Sir John Simon's words were :—

> " I would ask you to let us have, on whatever
> " professional advice you choose to employ, the > " draft of the sort of clause that you have in > " mind. Do not leave it by saying that you will > " leave it to the lawyers ; just employ the best
> " men you feel inclined to employ if you do not > " feel inclined to do it yourselves, and have a
> " Committee meeting and put it down. We > " would really like to have a clause about this."

It was consequently decided by the Association to endeavour to have such a clause drafted by the most suitable counsel available in Calcutta and Bombay. I am accordingly attaching hereto drafts prepared with the assistance of the legal advisers of the Bengal and Bombay Chambers of Commerce. In connection with the Bombay draft I am to suggest that the proper place for the first clause would be somewhere after Section 65 of the Government of India Act, while the proper place for the second clause would be in Part 9 of that Act which relates to the High Courts of India. I am to add that sub-clauses 2 and 3 of the second clause of the Bombay draft are taken from Order 46 of the Code of Civil Procedure, while the rules contemplated by sub-clause 5 will be on the lines of the rules contained in the same Order.

I am to express the hope that these drafts will be of assistance to the Statutory Commission in drafting a clause which will meet the wishes of the Association in regard to discriminatory legislation.

BOMBAY DRAFT.

FIRST CLAUSE.

The Indian Legislature has not power to make any law intended or calculated to discriminate against any commercial, industrial, or agricultural interests established or to be established in British India by any person or association of persons, whether British subjects or not.

Nothing herein contained shall affect the power of the Indian Legislature to make any law of a discriminative nature against the subjects of any country if any law has been passed by the Legislature of such country discriminating against British Indian subjects residing or carrying on business in that country, or the power to impose any duty or duties for the protection of any trade, commerce, or industry, agricultural or otherwise, in British India.

SECOND CLAUSE.

(1) When any question arises in any Court in British India subordinate to a chartered High Court as to whether any law made by the Indian Legislature or a Provincial Legislature was within the power of the Legislature, such question shall be referred by such Court to the chartered High Court of the Province in which such Court is situated.

(2) The Court making the reference shall stay the proceedings in the case until the question is decided by the High Court.

(3) The High Court, after hearing the parties if they appear and desire to be heard, shall decide the point so referred, and shall transmit a copy of its judgment under the signature of the Registrar to the Court by which the reference was made, and such Court shall on the receipt thereof proceed to dispose of the case in conformity with the decision of the High Court.

(4) An appeal shall lie to the King in Council from the decision of the High Court.

(5) The High Court shall have the powers to make rules regulating the procedure on such reference and other matters relating thereto.

BENGAL DRAFT.

No law, ordinance, or other measure shall be made or sanctioned by the Indian Legislature or by any Provincial Legislature or by any Municipality or other Local Authority :—

(a) which discriminates, or shall tend to or is calculated to discriminate, as between the races or classes comprising His Imperial Majesty's subjects, and which expressly or impliedly excluding from amenability thereto others of such subjects shall operate directly or indirectly to abrogate, restrict, detract from or adversely affect the status or rights of the members of any race, creed, community, or class or classes of persons either with regard to their personal liberties, property or contractual rights or otherwise howsoever as held and enjoyed by them at the date of the commencement of this Act in common with others of such subjects, or to interfere with the exercise by the members of any class or classes of any profession, calling, or vocation, or with the conduct by them of any trade, industry, or business upon equal terms in all respects with others of such subjects—

(b) to levy any taxation, cesses, duties, or other imposts of whatsoever nature or kind exclusively upon any persons as being the members of any race, creed, or class—

PROVIDED THAT nothing herein contained shall affect the right of the Indian Legislature to take any steps in the interests of public safety or to subsidise or assist any industry or undertaking in pursuance of any existing laws providing for special assistance at the expense of the taxpayer or consumer generally, nor prevent the imposition of such protective duties as may be imposed from time to time by the Government of India.

In any event the aforesaid restrictions shall not apply to the case of subjects of such countries as have adopted or may hereafter adopt discriminating measures against subjects of India, whether ordinarily resident in those countries or not, or against the import of Indian goods.

LETTER No. 310/13A–A.C., DATED 1ST AUGUST, 1929, FROM THE ASSOCIATED CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE OF INDIA AND CEYLON.

I am directed to refer to this Association's letter, No. 160/13–A.C., dated 6th April, with which were forwarded, for the consideration of the Commission, two draft clauses dealing with discriminatory legislation.

These draft clauses have given rise to further consideration of the question, and in the result two further alternative draft clauses have been prepared in consultation with counsel.

The Association feels that it is unnecessary to make any apology for following up its earlier suggestions by this further reference, both because of the importance and difficulty of the subject and because the suggestion that the Association should assist the Commission originated with Sir John Simon. I am accordingly instructed to forward the further alternative drafts marked A and B respectively, together with the following remarks thereon.

Draft A is on the same lines as the original "Bombay" draft, but is more comprehensive. The "Bombay" draft dealt solely with industrial and commercial matters.

The criticisms levelled against this draft are three.

(1) Doubt is expressed whether being so wide in its terms it may not appear to the Commission to be insufficiently specific. It is suggested that Sir John Simon may have had it in mind in asking for a draft that it should be formulated in as precise terms as possible, and that it might be better to express in more detail the various rights which require protection.

(2) It is felt that the words "Indian Legislature" should be more precisely defined so as to make it clear that Provincial Legislatures, Municipalities and Local Bodies are included. This point is developed later under Clause B. It is suggested further that the expression "Legislature" is not sufficiently wide to cover rules framed in exercise of powers conferred by an Act.

(3) It is pointed out that it is altogether wrong and objectionable and contrary to all constitutional principles that High Courts should be empowered to pass judgment abrogating the Acts of the Legislatures to which they are themselves subject. It is held that it is very important to ensure that a Bill of a discriminatory nature, if introduced, should not pass into law, and that it must not be left to some Tribunal to declare an Act to be ultra vires after it has passed into law.

Draft B follows the lines of the "Bengal" draft previously forwarded, with the addition of a clause making the Governor-General in Council the arbiter of what is discriminatory legislation.

The criticisms of this draft are as follows:—

(1) It is pointed out that it is dangerous to be too specific, and that the more exhaustive a measure may be in its terms the greater the risk of overlooking possible contingencies which not having been expressly included are therefore ipso facto excluded.

(2) It is held that the words "or any Provincial Legislature or any Municipality or any other Local Authority" and also the whole of Clause (b) which refers to taxation are redundant for the following reasons:

No Provincial Legislature can pass any law which the Indian Legislature has no power to pass.

The Municipal and Local authorities are the creation of statute. Every Municipality and every Local Authority is established by legislation. The Act which creates it also empowers it to impose taxation, cesses, duties and other imposts. Every Municipal Act contains a section which defines its powers to impose taxation, octroi duty, etc. These taxes as a rule, are divided into three classes, namely:—

(a) those which the Municipality can impose without the sanction of Government;

(b) those which it cannot impose without the previous sanction of the Local Government; and

(c) those which it cannot impose without the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council.

Similarly every Act creating a Local Authority contains a section which prescribes its powers.

If there is an absolute prohibition to the Indian Legislature to pass any law of a discriminatory nature such as is described in Clause (a), it follows that no such legislation can be passed by a Provincial Legislature, or a Municipality or a Local Authority.

On the other hand it is pointed out that it is not possible at this stage, when all is a matter of uncertainty as to the powers which will be vested in the different Legislatures, to predict that a provincial legislature, if autonomous, will not be empowered to pass laws without any interference from the Central Legislature.

(3) On the question of making the Governor-General in Council the arbiter of what is, or is not, discriminatory legislation, the contrary view to that expressed above in dealing with Draft A is that it would be unconstitutional that the question whether a piece of legislation is ultra vires or intra vires should be left to be decided by an executive body. It is held to be essentially a question of law which must be left to the determination of the High Court.

A further point is made in this connection, viz., that supposing the majority of the Council of the Governor-General as newly constituted were to consist of extremists, a Bill of a discriminatory nature might be hatched in the Council itself. Then if the Bill were to be passed into law the Governor-General in Council would be called upon to say whether a Bill which had emanated from his Council was ultra vires or not.

I am instructed to make it plain that the Association does not feel that it is in a position to pronounce in favour of one or the other Draft and considers that it cannot do better than place before the Commission for their consideration the various points which have emerged during the discussion of this difficult subject.

DRAFT A.

FIRST CLAUSE.

The Indian Legislature shall not have power to make any law or pass any measure—

(a) which discriminates or shall tend to or is calculated to discriminate as between the races or classes comprising His Majesty's subjects in any matter whatsoever, or

(b) which shall affect or tend to affect expressly or impliedly any rights of the members of any race, creed, community or class of any nature or kind whatsoever hitherto enjoyed by them in common with others of such subjects in any matter whatsoever, or

(c) which shall interfere, or tend to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the exercise by the members of any class of such subjects of any rights in any matter whatsoever upon equal terms in all respects with others of such subjects.

PROVIDED THAT nothing herein contained shall affect the right of the Indian Legislature to subsidise or assist any industry or undertaking in pursuance of any existing laws providing for special assistance at the expense of the taxpayer or consumer generally, nor prevent the imposition of such protective duties as may be imposed from time to time by the Government of India.

In any event the aforesaid restrictions shall not apply to the case of subjects of such countries as have adopted or may hereafter adopt discriminating measures against subjects of India, whether ordinarily resident in those countries or not, or against the import of Indian goods.

SECOND CLAUSE.

(1) When any question arises in any Court in British India subordinate to a chartered High Court as to whether any law made by the Indian Legislature or a Provincial Legislature was within the power of the Legislature, such question shall be referred by such Court to the chartered High Court of the Province in which such Court is situated.

(2) The Court making the reference shall stay the proceedings in the case until the question is decided by the High Court.

(3) The High Court, after hearing the parties, if they appear and desire to be heard, shall decide the point so referred and shall transmit a copy of its judgment, under the signature of the Registrar, to the Court by which the reference was made; and such Court shall on receipt thereof proceed to dispose of the case in conformity with the decision of the High Court.

(4) An appeal shall lie to the King in Council from the decision of the High Court.

(5) The High Court shall have the power to make rules providing for the expeditious hearing of such cases by a Bench of two or more judges and for regulating the procedure on such reference and other matters relating thereto.

DRAFT B.

The Indian Legislature or any Provincial Legislature or any Municipality or any other Local Authority shall have no power to make any law or any other measure—

(a) which discriminates or shall tend to or is calculated to discriminate as between the races or classes comprising His Imperial Majesty's subjects and which expressly or impliedly, excluding from amenability thereto others of such subjects, shall operate directly or indirectly to abrogate, restrict, detract from or adversely affect the status or rights of the members of any race, creed, community, or class or classes of persons either with regard to their personal liberties, property or contractual rights or otherwise howsoever as held and enjoyed by them at the date of the commencement of this Act in common with others of such subjects, or to interfere with the exercise by the members of any class or classes of any profession, calling or vocation, or with the conduct by them of any trade, industry, or business upon equal terms in all respects with others of such subjects.

(b) to levy any taxation, cesses, duties, or other imposts of whatsoever nature or kind exclusively upon any persons as being the members of any race creed or class—

PROVIDED THAT nothing herein contained shall affect the right of the Indian Legislature to take any steps in the interests of public safety or to subsidise or assist any industry or undertaking in pursuance of any existing laws providing for special assistance at the expense of the taxpayer or consumer generally nor prevent the imposition of such protective duties as may be imposed from time to time by the Government of India.

In any event the aforesaid restrictions shall not apply to the case of subjects of such countries as have adopted or may hereafter adopt discriminating measures against subjects of India, whether ordinarily resident in those countries or not, or against the import of Indian goods.

(c) When any question arises as to whether any law made, or any other measure taken, by the Indian or any Provincial Legislature or any Municipality, or any other public authority, was within the power of such Legislature or Municipality or Public Authority, the decision of the Governor General in Council on such question will be final.

Memorandum submitted by the Council of the European Association.

On behalf of The Council of the European Association we have the honour to submit the following Memorandum :—

INTRODUCTORY.

1. The position of the British Community and the European Association. The Council of the European Association, in placing before the Statutory Commission appointed under the Government of India Act 1919, its views on the problems which are within the scope of the present inquiry, feels it essential at the outset to explain the position in general of the non-official European Community in India and in particular of the European Association which it has the honour to represent and on whose behalf this Memorandum is submitted.

2. Historical Record. The British Non-Official Community in India is the direct descendant of those merchants who, in 1612, settled at Surat for trading purposes under a Firman from the Moghul Court and extended their activities in 1643 at Masulipatam, in 1661 at Bombay (ceded to the English by the Portuguese), and in 1716 in Bengal, again under Firman from the Moghul Emperor.

From these small beginnings and in the protection of their trading interests, suffering from the general disorder and breakdown of administration following the collapse of the Moghul Empire, the British gradually assumed control over the whole of the Indian Sub-Continent and gave to India an era of peace and prosperity which hitherto she had not known. In all spheres of activity Britishers shouldered the greater portion of the burden in bringing order out of chaos, and it is largely due to their initiative, enterprise and capital that India to-day occupies a prominent place both industrially and politically among the nations of the world. The British Community in India, therefore, by right of its past labours, the constructive work it is carrying on to-day, and the immense financial responsibilities under its direct control, can claim the fullest hearing on the important problems which His Majesty has called on the Royal Commission to study.

3. The Census. According to the 1921 Census the European population of British India amounted to 156,637.

Officials	11,351
British troops	63,538
Women	45,577
Non-officials—Males—under 18 years of age	14,391
	156,637

A large majority of the 21,780 Non-Officials occupy posts of great responsibility as Partners, Directors, Managers and Heads of Departments in various Industrial, Commercial, Banking and Agricultural concerns throughout India.

4. Financial interests and responsibilities. The total capital controlled by the British Community amounts to many hundreds of million pounds, while of the immense Import and Export trade of India amounting annually to £400,000,000 Europeans have responsibility for the larger share.

It would appear unnecessary to emphasize the fact that the well-being of the Indian people is as much dependent on the development of India's economic resources as on the development of her political organisations, and in the former sphere the British Community will for many years to come have to play a leading part.

5. The European Association. Throughout India the British Community has various commercial, industrial, and agricultural organisations, which will give evidence before your Commission, but its sole political organisation is the European Association. The Association was founded in 1883 on the introduction of the Ilbert Bill, but, as its founders say in their first report, the causes which made such an Association necessary had their origin long anterior to the Ilbert Bill. "On that occasion a demand "arose for a united and concentrated effort and for "a channel through which the Anglo-Indian (British) "Community might give expression to its political "views and notify to the governing body its political, "social or economical requirements." "The case "was not one which could be satisfied by the "accustomed action of existing public bodies, "inasmuch as these bodies each represented a special "interest in a special way. It thus became necessary "to form an Association having a distinctly political "end in view and representing not one interest but "all interests, not one class but all classes, not one "Community but all Communities of Englishmen "settled or employed or domiciled in India." This, the Council claims with confidence, the Association still does for all British residents in India. The Council, the governing body of the Association, is elected annually by its members in the various Provinces and contains representative men of every class, among whom are many of the acknowledged leaders of the British Commercial Community throughout India.

The Branches, Sub-branches, and Agencies of the Association number in all 31, and their distribution throughout India is graphically shown on the accompanying map (Appendix IV).* The Chairman and Committees of these branches are also elected annually by the members within the area administered by them. Membership of the Association is open to all European British subjects as defined in the Rules under the Government of India Act 1919, and of the 21,780 Europeans eligible in India 8,000 are members of the Association.

6. The authority behind the Memorandum. The Memorandum is divided into two parts. In the first part which is entitled "General Considerations" the Association set out their views on the present position and their recommendations as to the general lines on which the changes should be made. Representing a community with large interests in India, many of whose members have had practical experience of the workings of the Central and Provincial Governments under the Government of India Act 1919, the Association hopes that the views expressed will be of use to the Commission.

In the second part the Memorandum deals with the special position of the European and Anglo-Indian non-official communities, and the manner in which their interests might be affected in the event of any extension of responsible government. Suggestions are made as to the desirability, especially in matters of taxation, trade and commerce, for safeguarding the present position under which Europeans and Indians have equal rights.

This Memorandum has been fully considered, discussed and approved by all the Branch Committees who themselves will submit memoranda and give evidence more particularly on Provincial affairs, when your Commission visits the various Provinces. The responsibility for the wording of the Memorandum rests, of course, with the Council of the Association, but in order to avoid confusion with the various "Councils" of the Provincial and Central Governments, which are frequently referred to, the Council of the Association refer to themselves in what follows as "the Association."

* Not printed.

PART I.
GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.

SECTION I.
GEOGRAPHICAL, GENEALOGICAL, ECONOMIC AND OTHER FACTORS.

7. Realities of Position. The Association has observed that in the discussion of constitutional reforms and the progressive development of India's political organisation there is a marked tendency to pay too little attention to the divergent and complex factors which go to the making of modern India. If, therefore, the Association lays emphasis on the difficulties inherent in the problems under examination it is with no desire to exaggerate such difficulties into obstacles to political advancement, but to ensure that in considering progressive solutions of the problems the realities of the position should not be overlooked.

8. Geographical. The question "What do we mean by India?" needs only to be asked to disclose at once considerable divergence of opinions, for its very geographical boundaries are subjects of argument. "Is Burma part of India, and what have far-off Lahoul and Spiti, living in the fifth century on the rim of the eternal snows, got to do with twentieth century India of the crowded ports and limitless horizons?" "The mere space of India and its strongly contrasting physical conditions can be understood by anybody who takes the trouble to read Geography, but these are only the externals of the problem. We get nearer to its essentials when we examine the Indian population and see it as a vast palimpsest on which layer after layer of writing can be read—Aryan, Dravidian, Mongol and Autochthonous Negrito—and nearest of all when we study the working through many centuries of religious, racial, social, political and economic forces on these immensely different peoples scattered throughout India's vast extent and many conditions of climate and soil."

9. Genealogical. The number of main castes in India is given as 67, irrespective of tribal subdivisions, and the languages in general use throughout the Sub-continent number 53, or with dialects, 222. These are factors militating against any rapid growth of nationalism, and Mr. Marten in his report on the Census of India, 1921, says "The sense of a common political nationality has never in the history of the people achieved sufficient intensity to override the facts of cleavage which are inherent in the social system."

The more obvious of the realities of the Indian situation which face any reformers are the immense inequalities in the historic antecedents, in the state of education, and in the general level of culture of the many different peoples of India, which postulate not only wide differences in their political capacity, varying from a high capacity to none at all, but also equally wide differences in their capacity for self defence under modern political conditions.

10. Hindu Moslem Relationship. In particular is this cleavage noticeable in the existing relations of Hindu and Muhammadan. The latter, for many years lagged behind his Hindu fellow-subject in all spheres of activity, and in consequence is faced to-day with the political and economic dominance of the Hindu. The obvious transfer of power from British to Indian hands brought about by the Reforms has made the Muhammadan alive to his backward position and to the fear that under the majority rule of democracy he be definitely relegated to a secondary position. In consequence, throughout the period covered by the Reforms, the Muhammadans have sought to ensure their position in the future government of India by pressing for proportionate representation in the legislatures and in all Government services. Feeling has run high and has led during the past few years to frequent outbreaks of rioting between the two communities, and the present position, which is likely to become more strained with every step in political progress, seriously threatens the internal peace of India. The problem is one of the major difficulties with which we have to reckon in considering India's political progress.

11. The Indian States. Another of the important factors in the problem of India is the question of the Indian States. Occupying approximately one-third of India and with a population amounting to 70 millions, these States number 678. A glance at the attached map of India (Appendix V.)* which is coloured so as to show clearly the areas occupied by British India (red) and the Indian States (yellow) and non-regulation districts (orange) is enough to show the importance of this subject. There are islands of State Territory in British India, and British enclaves in some of the States. The people of British India and the neighbouring States are the same in language, race, and religion. No matter what solution of the political problem of the Indian States may be admitted, nothing can alter the fact that India is economically one.

The Association is unable to envisage any Reform in the political organisation of India that leaves unsettled the political status of the Indian States and their relationship with British India, and at a later stage in this Memorandum will put forward definite proposals as to the solution of this problem.

12. Economic Factors. It is generally recognised that the chief problems which now face national Governments are economic problems. This does not represent the whole truth as far as India is concerned—for we know that she has political problems of the first magnitude to solve—but it gives rise to a reflection of the utmost importance. It is a fair question to ask whether in future developments political arrangements should not rather be accommodated to the conditions imposed by economic facts. The Association would quote from the inaugural address of Colonel Stimson, Governor-General of the Philippine Islands, who recently took over from General Wood. He says "It has often seemed to me that sometimes in our insistence upon political development we overlook the importance of the economic foundations which must underlie it and upon which it necessarily rests." That statement the Association believes is equally true of India, where, as elsewhere, economics must be a dominant factor in the political organisation of the country.

Questions of customs, communications, ports, currency and exchange, in fact the great majority of subjects now dealt with by the Government of British India, vitally affect the Indian States and their subjects, whilst the actions of States have their reactions in British India. The Association considers the economic factors of the problem of great importance and in making the recommendations which follow, many of which are political in character, the Association has borne in mind the probable economic effect of the various courses which might be taken.

SECTION II.
HISTORY OF REFORMS IN INDIA.

13. Faith in British Institutions. The history of Political Reform in British India was very adequately dealt with in the historic report of Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford in their second chapter on the growth of the administrative system. The Association feels that there is therefore no need again to set out in detail the actual facts. It does, however, feel that the close connection of Political Reform in India with Political Reform in England deserves some emphasis. Through her close connection with England, India has shared in due proportion to her conditions and needs in the benefits of the rising

* Not reproduced.

Liberal tide in England which was throughout the 19th century the motive force of Great Britain's development at home and in her dominions overseas. It appears to the Association that in spite of the practical difficulties of implanting Western institutions on an Oriental civilisation, the Britisher's faith in his own institutions and political traditions is so strong that he clings persistently to his desire to give the same benefits to other races with whom he comes in contact. During the discussions among the British Community throughout India which preceded the preparation of this report that trait was strongly in evidence and, whilst there are individuals who consider the Indian political problem an original one, which, owing to the complexities shown in Section I of this Memorandum, needs original treatment, the majority have an abiding faith in their own political traditions. That faith, however, is not blind to the difficulties inherent in any attempt to graft on to an Oriental civilisation, accustomed to personal rule, Western democratic institutions, and belief in the eventual success in India of British institutions is tempered by a realisation of the vital necessity of making good each step towards the goal of responsible government before fresh advance is tried.

14. Antagonism refuted. The European Association and the British Community which it represents are sometimes charged with being antagonistic to Indian political aspirations. The Association definitely repudiates the charge. Its attitude throughout has been that of constructive criticism while reform proposals were under discussion, and loyal co-operation when the reformed constitution became Law.

15. Policy of Association. In support of this contention the Association would draw the attention of the Commission to the policy which guides it in its examination of all problems.

OUR POLICY.

While the principles for which the Association stands remain unchanged in its history, its policy must be kept abreast of the times, and in conducting the affairs of the Association, the Council keep prominently before them the following aims, which were adopted in their present form by a General Meeting of the Association held in the year 1926.

(1) Maintenance by all constitutional means of the rights of the British Community in India. The claim to these rights involves neither infringement on the rights of others, nor the acquisition of privileges which it is unwilling to share with others.

(2) Protection of British Minorities throughout India from aggression, racial or otherwise.

(3) Practical sympathy with the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled Community in their political aspirations, and the fostering of a relationship of cordiality and co-operation with those Indians who are working constructively for the good of India.

Among others, the following considerations govern the Council's actions :—

(i) Maintenance and promotion of ties strengthening the position of India as an integral part of the British Empire.

(ii) The wisdom of assisting the political and economic development of the country in which we live with due regard to the benefit and contentment of its various peoples.

(iii) The maintenance of the British Garrison at a strength sufficient to guarantee India from internal disturbance and external aggression.

(iv) The assurance of a reasonable standard of efficiency in the Indian Administration by preserving in the Services the minimum European British element laid down by the Lee Commission.

(v) The necessity for legislative safeguards for the protection of the religious, educational, social and legal customs of the British Community, with special regard to the maintenance and extension of trial by mixed juries and experienced magistrates.

(vi) The vital necessity for communal representation as the only practical method of securing the British Community's political position and a truly representative Government.

(vii) The loyal acceptance of the Reformed Constitution and the retention of the Preamble to the Government of India Act 1919 as an indispensable test for determining the time for each advance towards responsible government.

(viii) The necessity for the preservation and increase of British prestige and for practical recognition of the duties of European British subjects to their own community and to the land they live in.

16. Europeans in Legislature. A careful study of the actual work of non-official Europeans in the Central Legislature will show the extent of co-operation offered and the measure of the endeavour of the British Community to assist in furthering India's political advance. A detailed account of this work is given in the two volumes attached to this Memorandum, entitled " European Non-Officials in the Indian Legislature " Vols. 1 & 2.*

SECTION III.

CRITICISMS OF REFORMED CONSTITUTION.

17. Terms of Reference. The terms of reference of your Commission define the problems under examination. They are :

> " To enquire into the working of the system of government, the growth of education, and the development of representative institutions in British India, and matters connected therewith, and the Commission shall report as to whether and to what extent it is desirable to establish the principle of responsible government, or to extend, modify, or restrict the degree of responsible government then existing therein, including the question whether the establishment of Second Chambers of the Local Legislatures is or is not desirable."

It is necessary therefore for the Association in the first instance to examine the working of the existing and experimental measure of responsible government instituted by the Government of India Act, 1919.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

18. Survey of working of local bodies. The true test of the advance made in responsible government is to be found first in the working of Local Self-governing bodies, panchayats, district boards, and municipal bodies. A study of the official reports on local administration shows that whilst some advance has been made by the electorate, the growth of a realization of its full responsibilities has been checked by outside political issues and personal jealousies. That the efficiency of local administration, passing from the hand of the trained administrator to that of an elected chairman, would suffer to some extent was to be expected. The intensity of communal feeling and personal jealousies seriously threaten to delay if not to jeopardise altogether further healthy development. The Association believes that the village panchayats, municipal and district boards are the primary training ground for responsible government in India. The Association, therefore, advocates the development of the panchayat system in all villages throughout India with the delegation to panchayats of definite though limited powers of taxation to cover the village administrative requirements, and based on the widest possible franchise. At the same time in view of the criticisms so constantly made in official reports on Local Self-government, the Executive must retain powers and be armed with instructions adequate to remedy maladministration. At the moment there is leniency towards inefficient and corrupt administration.

19. Executive Posts. The Association is compelled to call attention to the tendency to make executive posts in municipal and other local self-governing bodies a question of party patronage. It considers this a dangerous practice which needs summary check, and is of opinion that where possible executive posts in Local Self-governing bodies should be filled by members of a Local Government service recruited through Provincial Service Commissions.

THE PROVINCIAL SPHERE.

20. Previous Criticisms. The system of dyarchy introduced by the Government of India Act, 1919, has been in operation for some seven years. The Association was a strong critic of the scheme of Reform put forward by Mr. Montagu, the then Secretary of State for India, and Lord Chelmsford, and the Council considers it advisable to republish as an Appendix the views put forward by the Association on that occasion since much of the criticism then made has been amply justified. (Appendix I).* These opinions are of more than academic value since they are the effort of men with great practical experience of India to apply to her complex conditions the political traditions of England which they have inherited. It is of definite value therefore to see how criticisms made prior to the initiation of the experiment have been shown to be well-founded, and to what extent they find support in the general views elicited during the present examination of the problem.

21. Financial Aspects of Dyarchy. Before, however, undertaking that task the Association would emphasise factors outside the problem itself which have been an added difficulty confronting the Reforms. It was unfortunate, though perhaps unavoidable, that the Reforms should have been initiated at the commencement of a period of great financial stringency, calling not only for severe retrenchment in all departmental expenditure, but in some cases for additional taxation. Funds had to be found for the maintenance of the primary functions of government, all on the reserved side, at the expense of benevolent activities on the transferred side. Ministers were consequently faced with the necessity of carrying on, but in many instances owing to lack of funds were deprived of a full opportunity to show their abilities in the initiation of new schemes and thus appreciate the real value of the power handed over to them.

22. Tends to irresponsibility. Further, the obvious difficulties of working dyarchy in departments without dyarchy in finance has, as this Association anticipated, bred irresponsibility. The Association in its Final Statement on the Reforms Scheme, referring to the relations between the Ministers and the Indian members of the Legislative Council asked this pertinent question—"Will they now favour or assail him accordingly as they approve or dislike his attitude towards the momentous reserved questions . . . It is certain as a rule they will." It is now possible to add "they have."

* Not printed.

23. Summary of previous views. The main criticisms of the Reforms previously made by this Association can thus be briefly summarised.

(a) REPRESENTATION. "The problem in India is much less to find individual Indians possessed of character and administrative ability than to create an electorate which may be depended upon to choose such men in preference to those less able or less worthy."

This difficulty has been emphasised in the working of the Reformed Constitution, and the Association can point to numerous instances in which the choice of the electorates has fallen on men unsuited to be their representatives.

Opinion on this question has not changed and the Association considers that the existing system of communal electorates must continue. It is confirmed in its opinion by the views expressed by the Director of Public Information in his review of the moral and material progress of India for 1926-27. There is no denying the fact that communal tension, always present in India, has been increased since the introduction of the Reforms, and the Association considers this the natural result of realizing that power is gradually being handed over, and is more in the nature of a fight for political position than the outcome of communal electorates. It is, however, true that the formation of communal electorates has led to much proselytizing amongst those individuals who lie on the border line of Hinduism and Islam with a view to showing that a particular community had a numerical majority in a particular province and was therefore entitled to a majority of seats in the Provincial Legislature. It feels that some of the existing tension is due to the continued insistence of the majority community on joint electorates and believes that if the majority community would recognise the practical difficulties of the position, and the undoubted nervousness of minorities, it would materially assist the growth of a more healthy atmosphere. The Association, while fully alive to the defects of communal electorates, disapproves of the endeavour to find a superficial settlement of the communal problem by a redistribution of Provinces. It considers that communal electorates must remain at present, but would suggest that the foundations of an improved political electorate might be laid by the addition of electorates formed on some basis of common interest which cuts across the communal interest.

(c) DIRECT ELECTION. The Association in its previous Memorandum definitely favoured direct election and that remains the opinion of the Association to-day in so far as the Provincial Councils are concerned. Experience in the past of the intrigue and corruption arising from limited electorates inclined the Association to a wide electorate, which, even if ignorant of its responsibilities, would at least have been too large to be entirely swayed by corrupt methods. Much buying of votes is still reported, though in so far as the Association is aware no election petitions on the grounds of corruption have been proved. It might thus be argued that a wider franchise would be still less corruptible. But it should not be overlooked that whilst the electorate has shown some awakening, a large proportion is still too ignorant to exercise the vote in a responsible manner, and it would be unwise to swamp the existing electorate with a fresh crowd of ignorant voters until those now enfranchised are more fully acquainted with their responsibilities. In England changes in the franchise were made at considerable intervals.

(d) MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY. In its final statement on the Reforms, the European Association said that in its opinion, "The test (of representative government) could only be made real by making ministerial tenure of office dependent on the vote of non-official members of the Legislature."

To some extent that recommendation was incorporated in the Government of India Act, 1919, though owing to the obstructionist activities of the Swaraj party, ministers in most provinces have been forced to depend for support on the Government block. Further, there has been no real or effective test of the suitability to Indian conditions of representative government owing to the facts that in no Province has Dyarchy been complete, and that the transferred side has lacked a separate purse.

As was expected, the politician has sought to identify the ministers with the reserved side, and the electorate has never been consulted on questions of policy affecting only those departments over which the Legislature has full responsibility. Again, relying on the Governor's powers of certification, opportunity has been taken to make irresponsible cuts in Budget grants. Similarly, the right to criticise in resolutions the action of the Reserved half of Government without any responsibility for that action has led to the growth of irresponsibility in some Provinces, particularly in Bengal and the Central Provinces. The Association finds itself in entire agreement with the views expressed by its predecessors that real training in responsible government can only be secured by making ministerial tenure of office dependent on the vote of non-official members of the Legislature. The Montagu-Chelmsford report repeatedly emphasises the ill effects of giving powers of criticism without responsibility, and the Association cannot emphasise too strongly its agreement with that criticism both as regards the Provincial and Central Legislatures.

CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.

24. Responsible Government opposed. The Association would now turn to the Reformed Central Legislature. Here again the Association finds itself in agreement with the views of its predecessors both in their Final Statement on the Reform Scheme and in their Memorandum to the Reforms Enquiry Committee (Appendix II).* The Association is opposed to the undue acceleration of responsible government in the Central Government prior to satisfactory proof of the experiment in the Provinces.

Apart from this, the institution of an elected majority without responsibility and inherently in opposition to Government has weakened materially the Executive which finds itself responsible but in a minority and unable to carry such measures as it may deem highly desirable, but which could not rightly be certified as essential "to the safety, tranquility, and interests of British India or any part thereof." It appears essential to the Association that the position of the Executive in the Central Government should be strengthened, particularly if the recommendations for a further transfer of power in the Provinces are accepted.

25. Weakness of Executive. The Association considers that the Legislative Assembly has been wrongly constituted, and can in no way be considered representative. Many of the constituencies are unwieldy and it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for an elected member to keep in touch with his constituency. Apart from this, the qualification of existing electorates is in many Provinces too low, and but a small proportion of the electorate is capable of understanding the many intricate problems which are dealt with by the Central Legislature. It is well known that election to the Legislative Assembly is less strenuously contested than elections to the Provincial legislature. This is due primarily to the fact that the Provincial legislature offers more hope of advancement to the politically ambitious than does the Legislative Assembly, and secondarily to the difficulty which suitable men in business or the professions find in being absent from their business or professions for long periods. An analysis of the elected members of the Central Legislature will show that with a few outstanding exceptions the members have neither the political nor the social position in their Provinces which might be expected. As to the unrepresentative character of the membership this has been testified to by members themselves during debates on questions of social reform. For various reasons, the chief one of which is the language difficulty, an undue proportion—over 50 per cent.—of the elected representatives are drawn from the lawyer class and the small urban interests to which they belong have thus secured an undue share of political influence at the expense of agricultural and commercial interests.

26. Need for Strong Central Government: The modern, and particularly the more recent, history of countries under federal government teaches lessons of importance for India. It shows how economic conditions press continually and with increasing success against the barriers raised by State and Provincial rights and jealousies. The growth of communications, the expansion of commerce and industry, and the ever growing scope of economic problems lead all the time to a greater concentration of power in the hands of the Central Government, and the consequent diminution of the importance of the constituent units in a federal state. This fact is particularly relevant to India, in which the various Provinces in British India and the Indian States form an economic unit.

Arising out of this consideration, there are two further important criticisms of the Central Legislature which the Association has to make before it passes to its recommendations.

27. Economic Unity. All over India the boundaries of the Indian States, most of which are merely imaginary lines, run side by side with the boundaries of British India. There are islands of State territory in British India, and British enclaves in some of the States. The people of British India and the neighbouring States are the same in language, race and religion. No matter what the solution of the big constitutional question of the future relation of the Indian States with British India may be, nothing can alter the fact that India is economically one, and to consider only one aspect of the political development of India might inflict immense loss and hardship on the whole country and injure Indian commerce and industry.

28. All-India Subjects. The majority of questions now dealt with by the Central Government of British India intimately affect the Indian States, who have at present no say in the settlement of these questions. Already the difficulties of this position are being felt acutely and it would be wrong, and entirely contrary to British treaty obligations with the Indian States, if these questions were delegated to settlement by a self-governed British India alone.

In examining the problem of the political organisation of British India, there are therefore more than sufficient grounds to justify a recommendation for the establishment of an All-India Government.

29. Government Publicity. There is one other point which the Association would particularly emphasise. The Government of India to-day is called upon to gain support for Government policy without any provision for placing that policy before the electors. With the exception of the Anglo-Indian press the entire Indian and vernacular press is definitely hostile to the Government. At election times Government has no machinery to place its position before the electors. Government officials are prohibited from active participation. The candidates in the majority of cases vie with each other in seeking the suffrages of the elector by a virulent campaign against the Government. This position is not only undesirable, but is full of potential danger since every election tends only to diminish the authority of Government. To meet this position the Government of India is provided with an entirely inadequate publicity office subject to the vote of its opponents and consequently lacking in that vigour essential to successful propaganda.

SECTION IV.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

THE ELECTORATE.

30. Local Self-Governing Bodies. (a) The Association in putting forward its recommendations for consideration by the Statutory Commission would emphasise the danger of building a superstructure before the foundations are secured.

The electorate, being the foundation upon which responsible government rests, calls therefore for primary consideration. The Association has previously stressed the necessity of looking to Local Self-governing bodies as the initial training-ground for the electorate and recommends that where village panchayats are not in existence they should be formed on the widest possible franchise with limited powers of taxation to cover the cost of village administration, and that the electorate for District Boards and Municipal bodies should be made as wide as possible. At the same time the Association realizes that the success of these bodies is largely dependent on the interest shown in them and the guidance that can be given by the District Official. It would appear a necessary safeguard to provide the Local Self-Government Department with adequate power to take over and administer these bodies in the event of maladministration.

The Association also recommends that where possible executive posts in Local Self-Governing bodies should be filled by members of a Local Government Service recruited through Provincial Service Commissions.

The Association is also convinced that the growth of a sense of responsibility in the electorate is dependent on the spread of primary education, a subject on which it will make representations to the Committee appointed for this purpose.

The Provincial Legislatures. (b) The Association does not recommend any extension of the franchise for the Provincial Legislative Councils, on the ground that the existing electorate has still much to learn and the growth of its sense of responsibility would sustain a definite setback if the existing voters were to be overwhelmed at this stage by an influx of illiterate voters. The position in the various Provinces differs considerably and at present the franchise is not similar. The various Provincial Committees of the Association will be addressing the Commission on this and other matters of particular Provincial importance, and the Council of the Association would not oppose any recommendations for a change in Provincial franchise which Branches might consider justified by the conditions in their Province.

The Association is, however, convinced that communal electorates must remain for the present, but recommends the formation of additional electorates based on a community of interest which would cut across the communal electorate. The majority community press continuously for the theoretically sound system of joint electorates, but the Association is not convinced that the insistence on joint electorates is entirely disinterested.

The Association suggests a careful examination of the interests represented by the present sitting members in the Provincial Legislatures, and considers that a greater proportion of seats should be given to Agriculture, Landed and Business interests, Labour and the Depressed Classes.

India, in its social customs, is still too conservative to take readily to democratic methods, and many representative and able Indians of standing will not submit themselves for election under the present electoral system, one of the reasons being that the atmosphere surrounding the polling booths is one of intimidation and rowdyism. In fact many suitable candidates of high social standing would consider their prestige irreparably damaged by having to canvass the suffrage of the electorate and to submit to the volume of personal abuse which is a marked feature of all elections. This position must be recognised.

The Council of State. (c) The Association recognises the valuable work done by the Council of State, whose members throughout a difficult period have fulfilled their duties with a real sense of responsibility without being slavish followers of Government. No change is suggested, therefore, in the electorate for the Council of State.

The Legislative Assembly. (d) The Legislative Assembly has already been criticised as being unrepresentative and constituted on an unsound basis while the responsible Executive has been placed in an impossible position. The Association cannot approve the existing system of direct election owing to the difficulty of securing the necessary link between members and their far-flung constituencies. In addition, the existing composition has given undue political influence to the small urban interests. The Association therefore recommends the abolition of the present system of direct election to the Legislative Assembly and the introduction of a system of indirect election by Provincial Legislatures and approved public bodies representing Landed, Commercial, Labour and Minority interests. Agricultural interests must also be given adequate representation. The Association recommends that of the elected members 40% should be elected by Provincial Legislatures, 20% by Commercial and Industrial Bodies, 20% by Landed and Agricultural interests and 20% by Minority interests.

CONSTITUTION OF LEGISLATURES.

31. Provincial Councils. The Council of the Association is prepared, subject to adequate safeguards, to recommend the grant of full responsible government to the Provinces where such is recommended by Provincial Committees of the Association having a special knowledge of the conditions of their own Province. Non-regulation districts should, however, remain under the direct administration of Governors. In those Provinces in which European opinion believes that the conditions of the Province require for the present the reservation of law and order, this department should be placed under the direct administration of the Governor, the cost being a non-votable charge against the revenues of the Province.

The safeguards which the Association regard as essential are :—

(b) That all bills passed by Provincial Legislatures shall require the assent of the Governor-General in Council.

(c) That there be adequate constitutional safeguards against legislation which discriminates against any particular section or community in matters of Taxation, Trade or Commerce, and that it be made a charge on the Governor to use his power of veto on any legislation which appears to be unfairly directed against any particular section or community.

(d) That the recommendations of the Lee Commission as to the Services be adhered to.

(e) That the financial relations between the Central and Provincial Governments be re-examined and adjusted to overcome the inequities of the Meston award.

(f) That the Governor-General in Council have powers to take over and administer a Province in which the administration breaks down.

(g) That a Public Services Commission be appointed in each Province.

32. The Constitution of the Central Legislature. (a) In considering the constitution of the Central Legislature the Association has been impressed by the fact that under the Government of India Act 1919, the Central Legislature has considerable power over legislation of an All-India nature, legislation affecting not only British India, but also indirectly the Indian States, whilst the latter have no say in regard to such legislation and have to rely entirely on the Viceroy in Council to protect their interests.

The Association proposes to confine its suggestions here to the Central Legislature for British India, but would point out that its views are governed to a large extent by the considerations dealt with in detail in paragraphs 36 to 39 hereunder.

Powers and Responsibility. (b) The Montagu-Chelmsford report emphasized very strongly the disadvantages of giving powers of criticism without responsibility, and a perusal of the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly will show in many places how true was the summing-up of the position by the authors of the report. While admitting these defects in the present constitution of the Assembly, the Association is faced with the difficulty of submitting an alternative proposal which meets with the unanimous approval of the members of the Association and which would secure the strengthening of the executive, upon the vital necessity of which the Association is unanimous. Two alternatives have been suggested (i) That the central legislature be converted to a single House with powers curtailed to those of a purely advisory body, and (ii) An increase in the number of nominated seats. Neither alternative has adequate support from our Association to justify our making a definite recommendation on this point.

A far-reaching advance in responsibility has been recommended for the Provinces, and sufficient time must be given to prove the success of the great adventure there and to consolidate the position before introducing an unexplored extension of responsibility in the Central Legislature.

Executive should be strengthened. (c) It is hoped that the revised electorate recommended for the Legislative Assembly will provide a more representative House than the present, but it will not entirely overcome the difficulty with which the Government is faced in working with a minority.

Nominated Officials. (d) The Association think that the present position of nominated Government officials in the Legislative Assembly is unsatisfactory. It is obviously necessary that for the present Heads and Secretaries of Departments must be members of the Central Legislature, but the Provincial nominated members are in an anomalous position. Presumably they are nominated to the Central Legislature to represent the views of their Provincial governments, but in practice even when dissenting from the opinion of the Central Government they are obliged to vote with that Government (as for instance during the debates on Provincial contributions). The result has been that those members, many of whom could make valuable contributions to the solution of problems under discussion and who could bring to bear their practical knowledge as district officers, remain silent voting machines. The Association is theoretically opposed to the intervention in politics of permanent officials, but recognises that at the present stage of development their retention in the Central Legislature is necessary. The Association would, however, definitely recommend that members nominated to represent Provincial governments should be free to speak and vote in accordance with the requirements of their Province. Further, provincial administrative requirements necessitate far too frequent changes of representatives, and the nomination of official members for at least a session would seem desirable.

There is one point in favour of having nominated official members. It is that experience in the Legislature may be valuable training for them if at a later date they come to be Members of Council or Secretaries in charge of departments.

Viceroy's Executive Council. (e) The Association has little criticism to offer as to the existing constitution of the Council. It is convinced that the Council must remain predominantly British. It has been concerned at the personal attacks to which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has been exposed in the Legislative Assembly derogatory to his exalted position and subversive of military discipline. With the growth of politics in the Central Legislature the Association holds the view that it would be wiser to relieve His Excellency of his responsibilities in the Executive Council and that he should be replaced by a member for Defence who should for the present be British.

Link with Assembly. (f) Suggestions have been made for a definite link between the Executive Council and the Central Legislature, and provided this does not unduly restrict the opportunity for the Viceroy to select the best non-officials the Association would not be opposed to such a change. It is the general opinion that the non-official members of the Viceroy's Executive Council have not always been wise and suitable selections, particularly from the point of view of the legislative work they are called upon to perform. It is possible that the appointment of a member of the Legislative Assembly to the Executive Council might be an additional strength to the latter body.

Finance. (g) The outstanding difficulty in the problem is undoubtedly the question of the division of finance between the Central Government, Provinces, and, if they are brought in, the Indian States. The existing arrangement based on the Meston award, has been the subject of much criticism and controversy and any recommendations made in this Memorandum are subject to a revision of that award. The Association has not attempted, nor has it the authority, to put forward any recommendation on this vital portion of the problem. All it can do is to re-emphasise the necessity that the problem should not be looked at from the purely provincial point of view to the detriment of the wider and more unifying activities of the Central Government. It would recommend that the Statutory Commission should forthwith appoint an expert finance committee to examine this portion of the problem and it is confident that the Provincial Committees of the European Association would, if invited, be ready to place their views before any such Committee.

SECTION V.

AN ALL-INDIA GOVERNMENT.

33. Provincial Outlook. The Association has previously emphasised the economic aspect of the problem, and whilst recognising the desirability of decentralisation in certain matters, is convinced that the Central Government must have definite powers to intervene in Provincial matters with a view to checking the abuse of a purely Provincial outlook, already very noticeable in the discussions on Provincial contributions arising out of the Meston award, to the detriment of a wider All-India outlook and the final development of India's economic prosperity.

34. Subjects distribution. This involves a careful examination of the subjects to be administered by the Central Government and the Provincial Governments respectively. The Association considers the existing distribution of subjects as between Central and Provincial Governments satisfactory, but would recommend that the Government of India should be given power to co-ordinate the work of Provincial Road Boards in the development of India's Road system.

35. Social Reforms. Whilst on the question of Central subjects the Association would also recommend the delegation of such powers to the Provinces as to enable each Province individually to deal with social reform. The moral and material progress of the peoples is largely dependent on the ability to modify existing and ancient customs to suit the requirements of modern India. To ensure an equal advance of public opinion throughout India is a difficult task likely to delay social reforms. Already certain Indian States possessing as they do the necessary authority have introduced social reforms, and if provinces were similarly empowered to undertake social legislation, advance would be more rapid and the consideration of questions of social reform might assist in the healthy growth of parties in the Provincial Legislatures.

36. Federation of States. The most difficult portion of the problem from the economic point of view is, however, the status of the Indian States. The Association is convinced that some advance should be made towards developing a Federation of Indian States having a definite connecting link with the Government of British India. The Association is mindful of the existing treaties with the Indian States. So long as these treaties exist carrying with them responsibilities for the external and internal security of the Indian States, the Crown cannot delegate those responsibilities to the British India Government or any other, particularly one responsible to electorates in British India alone. It is obvious, however, that the Ruling Princes are alive to the political development proceeding in British India and recognise that moral and economic factors are compelling them to some change in existing relations. They desire, and justly, an adequate voice in All-India subjects materially affecting the welfare of the States and their peoples, and some of them have shown courage and statesmanship in the reforms which they have voluntarily introduced within their States. The Association welcomes this move in the direction of a united India, though it recognises that participation in any such reform which may be introduced must be entirely voluntary. It has given much thought to the problem and would place on record in some detail a suggestion which it believes will create tendencies towards final federation.

37. Ultimate goal. It will not be possible at the moment to take more than an initial step towards the ultimate and distant goal of an All-India Government consisting of a federation of Indian States working harmoniously with British India through legislatures which would draw their representatives both from British India and the Indian States.

38. Federation of States. The first step towards this goal would appear to be the building up of a federation of the Indian States, working through the Chamber of Princes and controlled by a Viceroy in States Council, corresponding to some extent to the Viceroy's Executive Council in British India, to which the participating Indian States would delegate certain definite powers. In questions affecting both the Indian States and British India, the Indian States Council and the Executive Council of British India might meet as a Union Council under the Viceroy.

Supreme Court. If the Indian States are included in the future constitution it might be found desirable to establish a Supreme Court, to the jurisdiction of which the Indian States would become amenable.

39. Economic Aspect. The Association wishes to emphasize the economic aspect of the problem which in its opinion necessitates the fullest examination of India's political organization and an alteration in the existing constitution which will create a tendency towards the ultimate development of an All-India Government in which both the Indian States and British India will have their share.

SECTION VI.

MISCELLANEOUS.

40. The Secretary of State. The position of the Secretary of State and the India Council are questions which come within the purview of the problem under consideration.

There has been, and there will continue to be, criticism as to the desirability of interference by the Secretary of State.

The provisions of Sections 19 (a) of the Government of India Act which deal with the relaxation of the powers of the Secretary of State give ample scope for advance. The Association is not prepared at present to recommend any change in the India Council. The arguments put forward by the Joint Select Committee are just as urgent to-day as they were when they were written.

41. Redistribution of Provinces. The Association has had also under consideration the question of a redistribution of Provinces. Muhammadan opinion has for some time strongly advocated the separation of Sind from Bombay, and members in the Assembly have pressed for the formation of an Oriya Province, whilst many Indian politicians look for some readjustment of the Provinces on linguistic grounds.

The Association recognises that the Indian Provinces are not natural divisions, but administrative units, and that in the course of time, and when financial considerations permit, some redistribution is probable. The Council of the Association, however, is compelled to leave its Committees in each Province to deal with any proposals for a change in this direction.

THE SERVICES.

42. Lee Commission. The Association in its readiness to agree to the transference of further power in the Provinces stated the necessity for certain safeguards, one of which was adherence to the recommendations of the Lee Commission regarding the Services.

The Association is not concerned with the nationality of Government servants, but is insistent on the British character of the administration being maintained. The Association from its own observations is satisfied that there has been deterioration in the efficiency of the administration since an increased policy of Indianisation has been adopted, and would emphasise the fact that a too rapid elimination of the British element and its substitution by an Indian element inevitably means that the character of the Administration would become Indian.

43. British Standards. It is true that many of the Indian Civil and other Government servants are already adequately maintaining British standards, and that, given the continued support of their British colleagues, there is some hope that the sound traditions of the services will not be impaired. In the opinion of the Association India will require for many years to come the services of Britishers in all branches of the administration, and the new conditions under which they will have to work and the new responsibilities of guidance which will fall to them call for the best men whom Great Britain can send. The Association, therefore, considers it essential that no further steps in the reduction of the British element should take place.

44. Nervousness of Members. The Association has noted with pleasure the improved recruitment in London for the Indian Services, but it is not too confident that the position can be maintained. The Services are far from satisfied with their existing position, and nervous as to their future and their pensions. In many cases the inevitable changes which are taking place in the form of Government are depriving or are likely to deprive such officers of high appointments formerly open to them, whilst their advance in the Service is further threatened by political expediency. The discontent in the Services is also in large measure due to their dislike of many practices which have grown with the Reforms and are possibly the inevitable outcome of political government; in particular the use of their patronage by Ministers. Here the divergence of outlook between European and Indian must inevitably lead to difference of opinion.

45. Proportionate Pensions. These are not conditions under which men can give of their best, and in spite of improved recruitment, the Council of the Association is aware of the strong opinion held amongst the Services that Indian Service no longer affords Britishers adequate opportunity. Such an attitude in the Services themselves does not create an atmosphere favourable to recruitment. The Association does not endorse any such view, and believes that India still offers a fine career to men of ability imbued with a true spirit of service. At the same time it is essential that everything possible should be done to relieve members of the Services of nervousness as to their future careers. At the moment men who are dissatisfied with the conditions of service due to changes brought about by the Reforms are entitled to go on a proportionate pension. This concession, however, closes in 1930 prior to the announcement of the Statutory Commission's enquiry and parliamentary legislation arising therefrom. The consequence may be that many Government servants forced to come to a definite decision before the period of the privilege closes may proceed on proportionate pension rather than face an uncertain future. The Association strongly recommends that the privilege of proceeding on proportionate pension be made a permanent factor of Indian Service, and that such steps, as may be possible, be taken to reassure the Services with regard to the security of their pensions.

46. I.M.S. The Association has also some remarks to make on the regrettable position of the Indian Medical Service, and the effect that this will have on the spread of Western medicines, and in the prosecution of research. The Association is strongly of opinion that the Government must continue to recognize the right of European Government servants and their families to treatment by doctors of their own race and that adequate provision should be made accordingly. It is equally convinced that the necessary British element should be retained for the purposes of education in Western medicine, and for research in the treatment of tropical diseases. There is already a general tendency to turn to indigenous medical systems and whilst it may not be immediately possible to provide adequate medical treatment on modern lines for the bulk of the population, and there is therefore some justification for assisting and improving indigenous systems, the Association would press for adequate provision for instruction in more modern methods.

The recent proposals of the Government of India have gone some way towards remedying a state of affairs which was deplorable, but in the opinion of the Association the importance of this question justifies further consideration by your Commission.

PART II.

NON-OFFICIAL EUROPEANS.

47. Special Electorates. The European community are in numbers a very small minority in the population of India. They are for the most part engaged in trade or commerce, many of the big commercial firms having an unbroken connection with India for a century or more. Their importance in the trade and economic life of the country could not, the Association think, be disputed. At present in matters of taxation and trade Europeans and Indians are treated alike, have similar obligations and similar rights.

The Association has already expressed its opinion on the necessity for maintaining for the present the existing system of communal and special electorates. The Non-official European Community and the vast interests for which it is responsible could not secure adequate representation by any other methods. The Association has already pressed for greater representation of Interests—a principle which it believes is more just under Indian conditions and will give greater stability than the more usual form of democratic representation.

The Association also presses for adequate representation for European interests on all Local Self-governing Bodies wherever justified, and in particular Assam.

48. Danger of Discriminatory Legislation. The position of the European Community in India is one of some complexity. Whilst the community as such, and the majority of the big commercial firms, have an unbroken connection with India for a century and more, the individuals which compose it are constantly changing. They come to India at the outset of their careers and leave it on retirement after the best years of their lives have been given in its service. Whilst the community's position in India is recognized to some extent by the grant of representation in the legislature of the country, there has been a persistent endeavour by Indians to deny its members the full rights of Indian citizenship. The Government of India, yielding to the demands of Indians in this respect, have shown a serious lack of sympathy and an increasing tendency to look upon the non-official community as foreigners. The Association feels compelled to protest against this attitude on the part of Government and of Indians, and claims that as in England the Indian has equality of status and legal rights so in India the Englishman should suffer no legal disabilities or unfair discrimination against his commercial interests. The attack which has been made on British Trade since the institution of the Reforms has been so determined that the Association is forced to call the special attention of the Commission to this question. The Association asks for no privileged treatment, but it desires statutory recognition of its right to a permanent place amongst the great communities of India, and to equality of treatment for its individual members in accordance with Queen Victoria's declaration.

The Association has not previously pressed for any specific Statutory protection but these attacks upon the community, upon its commercial interests, its legal and social customs, have been so persistent during the period of the Reforms that it is compelled to ask the Commission to give very special attention to the necessity of introducing statutory safeguards.

49. Statutory Safeguards. The Association has no wish to impute hostile intentions against the European community to any section of Indian opinion likely to obtain control of the provincial governments. The Association, indeed, hopes sincerely that Europeans and Indians, realising their common interests, will work in progressively increasing harmony. At the same time the facts themselves and the expressions of hostility by leaders of certain sections of Indian opinion make it plain that discrimination against Europeans either in legislation or administration is a possibility unless adequate steps are taken to prevent it. The Association puts forward a claim to statutory safeguards merely as a minority contributing to the life of the country. In the past minorities have been able to rely on the disinterestedness of a Government and Administration which was not identified with any one section or community in India more than another. If responsible government is granted to the Provinces the position so far as minorities are concerned will have changed. There may well be a Government which owes nothing to the support of certain minority communities and whose supporters are inclined to disregard the interests of such communities. There is, of course, nothing in the least derogatory to Indians in such a suggestion. The problem is a familiar one in Europe. There remains to consider the limits within which safeguards should be operative. At present the Instructions to Governors contain an authority in the most general words to prevent any unfair advantage or discrimination in interests arising from race, religion, education, social condition or wealth, or in matters affecting commercial or industrial interests. These Instructions (Par, VII. (3) to (5)) provide as follows :—

> " (3) To see that no order of your Government and no Act of your legislative council shall be so framed that any of the diverse interests of or arising from race, religion, education, social condition, wealth or any other circumstance, may receive unfair advantage, or may unfairly be deprived of privileges or advantages which they have hitherto enjoyed, or be excluded from the enjoyment of benefits which may hereafter be conferred on the people at large ;
> (4) To safeguard all members of our Services employed in the said presidency in the legitimate exercise of their functions, and in the enjoyment of all recognised rights and privileges, and to see that your Government order all things justly and reasonably in their regard, and that due obedience be paid to all just and reasonable orders and diligence shown in their execution ;
> (5) To take care that, while the people inhabiting the said presidency shall enjoy all facilities for the development of commercial and industrial undertakings, no monopoly or special privilege which is against the common interest shall be established, and no unfair discrimination shall be made in matters affecting commercial or industrial interests."

The Association is completely in favour of the continuance of these or similar instructions. In asking, however, for definite constitutional and statutory safeguards the Association realises that the restriction on constitutional powers must be capable of clear and exact formulation and must be limited to fields in which discrimination itself must necessarily be regarded as unfair. Taxation, Trade, Professions, Commerce and Industry are, it is suggested, matters on which it would be proper and practicable to forbid discriminatory legislation altogether. The Association realises that there are of course other matters, religious, educational and social, in which discrimination is possible. The Instructions to Governors referred to deal quite generally with such matters. The Association feels, however, that so far as the European community is concerned it would be impractable to ask for statutory safeguards on these points. In education, for example, it might be desirable to give special facilities to some community which might be discriminatory and yet fair. If and in so far as it is practicable the Association would in principle support any statutory protection required by a minority. On the matters in which the suggestion of the Association is put forward, namely, Taxation, Trade, Professions, Commerce and Industry, the Association feels that all sections of the community should unite in repudiating any idea of discriminatory legislation.

Precedents for the prohibition of discriminatory legislation are to be found in the Statute Book, for example paragraph 16 of the Irish Treaty, scheduled to and given the effect of law by the Irish Free State Constitution Act, 1922, and Section 73 of the British North America Act of 1867.

50. Representation and Rights. (a) The present position in the Central and Provincial Legislatures is as follows :—

EUROPEAN REPRESENTATION IN CENTRAL LEGISLATURE.

Council of State.
Chambers of Commerce, India	2
LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.
European members from :—
Madras	1
Bombay	2
U. P.	1
Assam	1
Burma	1
	10

QUALIFICATION.

Residence and income qualification which varies from the payment of income tax to an income of Rs. 12,000 in Bengal.

EUROPEAN REPRESENTATION IN PROVINCIAL COUNCILS.

Province	Elected by a General Constituency	Commerce and Industry	Trades	Total
Bengal	5	10	1	16
Madras	1	3	1	5
Bombay	2	3	1	6
U. P.	1	3	—	4
Bihar and Orissa	1	1	—	2
C. P.	—	1	—	1
Punjab	—	1	—	1
Total	10	27	3	40

The Association would press for the representation of the European population of the Punjab in the Legislative Assembly, but otherwise the Association is satisfied with the present representation as set out above so far as the Central and Provincial Legislatures are concerned. Any changes made should contain provisions to prevent those rights being infringed or diminished. The Association is, as has been stated, in favour of the retention and development of the communal electorate system.

Trial by Jury. (b) The Association attaches great importance to the preservation of the right to a jury containing a majority of Europeans in a criminal prosecution. A corresponding right in the composition of juries is enjoyed by Indian British subjects.

Education. (c) The Association regard the state-aided schools for Europeans as important and necessary. Grants to some of these schools have recently been cut down. Their right to an adequate grant should if possible be protected, and the Association will address the Education Sub-Committee on this subject.

THE ANGLO-INDIAN COMMUNITY.

51. Ties of Kinship. The Association, in view of the ties of kinship existing between the British and Anglo-Indian community, share with the leaders of that community the anxiety with which they view altered conditions. The past loyalty of the Anglo-Indian community and the valuable work of its members in many departments of Government activity, particularly the Railways, Posts and Telegraphs, Customs and Auxiliary Force, perhaps needs emphasis, for such services are liable at times to be overlooked. It is not on its past services, but on its present and future sphere of usefulness to India, that the Anglo-Indian community can best base its claim for Government assistance.

52. Status. The position of the community to-day is far from satisfactory. The community belongs to and is of India, but is as distinct from the other races of India as is the Muhammadan from the Hindu or the Bengali from the Madrasee. Legally its position is ambiguous :—

For purposes of the Law Courts the definition of a European is :—

> "Any subject of His Majesty born, naturalised or domiciled in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or in any of the European, American or Australian Colonies or possessions of His Majesty, or in the Colony of New Zealand, or in the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope or Natal."
> "Any child or grandchild of any such person by legitimate descent."

For purposes of the Franchise the definition of a European is :—

> "A European means any person of European descent in the male line, being a British subject and resident in British India, who either was born in or has a domicile in the United Kingdom or in any British possession or in any State in India, or whose father was so born or has, or had up to the date of the birth of the person in question, such a domicile."

And of an Anglo-Indian is :—

> "An Anglo-Indian means any person being a British subject and resident in British India.
> "(i) of European descent in the male line who is not a European, or
> "(ii) Of mixed Asiatic and non-Asiatic descent, whose father, grandfather or more remote ancestor in the male line was born in the Continent of Europe, Canada, Newfoundland, Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa or the United States of America, and who is not a European."

For purposes of employment in Government Service the Anglo-Indian is officially styled a Statutory Native of India. For purposes of the Auxiliary Force the Anglo-Indian becomes an European British subject.

In actual practice the community, which should represent all those of European stock domiciled in this country, finds much of its best material classifying itself under the existing rules as European, to escape the ambiguous position of being styled Anglo-Indian, whilst the bottom grades of the community are constantly being filled by Christians of very doubtful European stock, in fact often pure Indian stock, who seek thus to escape from their wretched social position among the depressed classes.

53. Legal Position. The Association recommends that the whole legal position be reconsidered and that the Anglo-Indian community should be clearly defined and be definitely recognised as one of the communities of India, and as such fully entitled with all other Indian communities to enter into Government service. That legally members of the community should be permitted to claim trial by a jury consisting of a majority of Europeans if they so desire; in fact they would extend to all accused, irrespective of race or creed, the right to a majority of Europeans or Indians as they might desire.

54. Economic Position. The problem is, however, mainly economic. The Anglo-Indian has acquired and maintains to the best of his ability Western standards of living, and consequently finds himself faced with and being squeezed out by the economic competition of the Indian with his simpler and cheaper Indian standards. It is the same problem as faces South Africa, in fact the whole of the West to-day, when the lower standard of living and consequently lower wages of Indian labour are enabling the industries of India seriously to attack the industries of the West with higher standards to maintain. The Association can find no panacea for this state of affairs. The major portion of the economic life of the community is closely connected with the Railways, and the Association endorses the Honourable Commerce Member's remarks in the Legislative Assembly during the discussion on the Railway Budget in February this year that

> "When, as a matter of history, members of a particular community have held a very large number of appointments of a particular class, inevitably the whole economic organisation of the community becomes involved with that fact. That is a point that the Government of India cannot possibly ignore and to take measures which would summarily involve a sudden violent dislocation of the economic existence of an important community would clearly be a matter in which the Government of India ought to proceed very cautiously."

55. Employment. It would seem necessary therefore to secure for the community for a period of years a definite reservation of employment in those departments which have previously found their recruits largely from this community.

56. Education. The Council of the Association have had the opportunity of a discussion with the leaders of the community on the problems which face them. In many spheres of Government activity the Anglo-Indian finds himself to-day excluded owing to his poor standard of education, and possibly the most practical method of assistance which could be given to the community would be a general revision of the whole of the question of European education in this country. On this question the Council of the Association will in due course address the Special Educational Sub-Committee which has been appointed, but at the same time it endorses and supports the claim of the Anglo-Indian community for special educational assistance.

57. Representation. To maintain the position of this community and to keep its problems prominently before Government and the Legislatures, the Association deems it necessary that the community should be given greater representation, particularly in the Central Legislature under whose control are the departments in which the community is most keenly interested. It is impossible for one member to undertake all the work that has to be done, and the Council is aware that the present representative of the community in the Legislative Assembly has not always been given the opportunity to voice the views of the community on the important problems in which the community is deeply interested. The Association would recommend at least one representative for the community in the Legislative Assembly from Bengal, Bombay, Madras and the Punjab.

58. It is convenient to summarise here the recommendations which the Association desires to make.

The Council of the Association. in view of its responsibilities to its Members, has only been able to make recommendation for a larger measure of Responsible Government in the Provinces on the understanding that adequate safeguards are provided, and it will be prepared to elaborate in oral evidence the nature of the safeguards which would meet these altered conditions.

The Council trusts that you and your colleagues will, in the difficult and arduous task submitted to your care by His Majesty the King, receive the whole-hearted assistance of all those who have the true interests of India at heart, and that as the outcome of your deliberations the problem of Indian Constitutional development may be advanced a further stage towards its final goal.

Deputation from the European Association.

(The Deputation Representing the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon also present).

The deputation consisted of :—

Mr. C. B. CHARTRES (President).
Mr. T. D. EDELSTON (Vice-President).
Colonel J. D. CRAWFORD, D.S.O., M.C., M.L.A. (General Secretary).
Mr. W. H. THOMPSON, M.L.C. (representing Bengal).
SIR ALEXANDER MACDOUGALL (Madras).
Mr. T. GAVIN JONES, M.L.A. (United Provinces).
Mr. G. H. COOKE, M.L.A. (Bombay).
Mr. LANGFORD JAMES (Bihar and Orissa).
Mr. T. J. PHELPS (Trade).
Mr. T. A. CHALMERS, C.S.I., M.L.A. (Assam).

93. The Chairman : * * * Is there in this elaborate Memorandum of the European Association any special treatment of the subject of Police ?—(Mr. Chartres) : No, sir. At the time this was prepared we thought you would be hearing our branches in the provinces, and as Police is a provincial subject the council did not deal with it in detail.

94. Of course, it is a subject which affects India as a whole ?—Yes ; but I may say that since then you have told us that you were not going to hear our branches. We called a conference last month in which every province in India was represented, and we have come to a unanimous opinion on the subject.

95. This is important, gentlemen of the Conference, because it is not to be found in the print, and I am anxious to hear what it is. The reference is to page 141 of the Memorandum. We are told at the bottom of page 141 that the Council of the European Association would be prepared, subject to safeguards, to recommend the grant of full responsible government to the provinces where such is recommended by provincial committees of the Association ; and near the bottom of page 141 I read the following passage : " In those provinces in " which European opinion believes that the con- " ditions of the province require for the present the " reservation of Law and Order, this department " should be placed under the direct administration " of the Governor, the cost being a non-votable " charge." The detailed arrangements you will go into ; but when you held your provincial conference, Mr. Chartres, I would like you to tell me, because I do not know, what was the view which was taken by the different provincial organisations of the European Association ?—The view was that on account of the very great communal tension which exists in many provinces, it was felt it would be unsafe at the present time to transfer Law and Order to the administration of a minister who himself would be responsible to the House ; we preferred the administration of Law and Order to be in the hands of a member who would not be a member of the Cabinet and who would work directly under the Governor.

96. If I follow you rightly, that means, does not it, that as a result of this conference the European Association is to be understood as proposing the continuance of dyarchy ?—A modified form of dyarchy ; we are not prepared to see the transfer of Law and Order to a minister.

97. Why do you say " a modified form " ? What is the modification ?—We have transferred all the other departments, and we have not visualised a common sitting of the member and the Cabinet, which is an essential feature of dyarchy.

98. I am going to use the word " police " if you do not mind, because I think " law and order " is not a very happy expression, though it seems almost universally used. The real matters to consider are police, jails, the subordinate magistracy and the administration of justice, and they might easily be dealt with in different ways. Let us take the police. Is the proposal your Association would now put to the Conference that the money necessary in a province for the police should be voted or non-voted ?—We would prefer to see it not voted, but dealt with in a similar way to that in which money required for the Army in India is dealt with in the Legislative Assembly ; that is to say, the Governor at his discretion might throw the whole or one head of the vote open for discussion in the council.

99. I do not want to carry you too far, but it is important to see how this fits in. At present you have the Governor consulting his colleagues in a discussion where some of his colleagues will be executive councillors and some will be ministers, and they will all contribute, I suppose, to the discussion in the Governor's Cabinet even though the matter might ultimately be decided by the person in charge of the department concerned. But do you contemplate that the member who is going to remain in charge of the police will be part of such a Cabinet ?—No, we contemplate him being outside the purview of the council.

100. The Chairman : You see, one of the difficulties in practice of such dyarchy as now exists is that police are not really wanted for their own sake. People do not want police for their own sake ; they want them because from time to time it is necessary to use them for the purpose of maintaining order, or whatever it may be ; and that may easily arise in connection with a transferred subject. If you have an Education Minister who pursues an education policy which is deeply offensive to a particular community, you may have a riot.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : There is the case of excise.

101. The Chairman : There are many such examples. A very good instance is one which arose in the Punjab—religious endowments connected with the Sikhs. That produced a very serious situation. I am not sure how one would visualise a plan by which the police were not only reserved (for they are that now) but by which the member in charge of them had no contact with the ministers administering transferred departments ?—I did not mean that he should have no contact with ministers ; there must be liaison with the Cabinet, of course. I meant that he should not have a seat in the legislative council.

102. You would not put the member in the provincial council ?—No.

103. I see. You have made that quite clear to me in outline. Perhaps we might now deal with these " adequate constitutional safeguards." I wish to call the attention of the Conference to the fact that although on page 141 all you get is " (c) That " there be adequate constitutional safeguards against " legislation which discriminates * * * " and that is all you get in the summary, there is another passage of considerable importance on pages 144 and 145 which deals with this matter in a good deal more detail ; and I think we should be grateful to the Association for endeavouring to analyse the thing. May I take it that the sort of reasons which you set out in paragraphs 48 and 49 on pages 144 and 145 are the reasons which actuate you in asking for this form of safeguard ?—Yes, I think those give the conditions as fully as we can give them.

104. I had better read a sentence or two. I see on page 144 you say : " there has been a persistent " endeavour by Indians to deny its members " (that is, the members of the European community) " the " full rights of Indian citizenship," and just below you say, " The Association feels compelled to protest " against this attitude on the part of Government " and of Indians, and claims that as in England " the Indian has equality of status and legal rights " so in India the Englishman should suffer no legal " disabilities or unfair discrimination " ; and you go on to describe the " attack which has been made on " British Trade " as being very determined. In the middle of the next page you say " the expressions of " hostility by leaders of certain sections of Indian " opinion make it plain that discrimination against " Europeans either in legislation or in administration " is a possibility," and so on. Those, of course, are rather grave matters, and I think I should just put this to you : are those views the views which you have been led to form on a consideration of what has happened in the recent past ?—They emphatically are, yes.

105. I do not wish to start a controversy, but I want to know what it is all about. Can you give me an instance of the sort of thing you mean ?—Take the first point mentioned, about being considered as foreigners in this country. Quite recently, when a delegation had to be sent to represent India at the League of Nations, it was implied by speakers in the Assembly that British representatives from this country would be looked on as foreigners in such a delegation. We maintain we are citizens of India, living and working out here, and if appointed on such a delegation we are not foreigners, but citizens of India.

106. To take an instance, near the bottom of page 144 you say : " The attack which has been made on " British Trade since the institution of the Reforms " has been so determined that the Association is " forced to call the special attention of the Com- " mission " to it. The Commission, of course, has a duty to listen to you, but you do not call our attention to it simply by stating that it happens. What is it that is referred to ?—There are many instances we could quote. The Bombay Corporation, for instance, passed a resolution that no British goods were to be bought by their body.

107. By " British goods " do you mean goods made in Britain ?—Yes. I believe they went further than that ; I think " in any part of the British " Empire " was the wording of the resolution. There have been other instances which have cropped up in the debates in the legislature, and finally there is the Shipping Bill, which discriminates very strongly against British trade on the coasts of India and against British interests.

108. I will not ask more, but I wanted to call attention to that, because the expressions are strong and definite and I wanted you to have the opportunity to call our attention to matters you had in mind ? —At the present time there is a very strong cry for a boycott of British goods.

109. You do not suggest do you there could possibly be any constitutional safeguard against that ?—It is part of the agitation which is being carried on in favour of constitutional changes. (Mr. Edelston) : In the Shipping Bill they specify that all the officers and all the men must be Indians. We object to that. We say we have just as much right to be employed anywhere as an Indian.

110. On the next page (page 145) you say (and if I may say so, very truly) that you recognise " that " the restriction on constitutional powers must be " capable of clear and exact formulation." I do not know if you will allow me (not in the least to embarrass you but honestly to get all the help we can) to ask you whether you would help by doing what the Associated Chambers of Commerce said they would do. You know much better than other people what you want. Would it be possible for you. with whatever assistance you think is useful, to let us see a draft of the sort of clause you have in mind ?—(Mr. Chartres) : We have been into this matter very fully and I am advised that until we know the actual form of the Bill that is intended to govern the new Constitution, it is very difficult to frame any clause which would give safeguards.

111. * * * I agree it is very difficult, but I do not think it is difficult on that ground at all. Imagine, there are going to be legislatures in India that will have power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of British India. Now, what is the clause you gentlemen think should be put in the constitution for the purpose of limiting that general power of legislation ? That is all. It does not depend in the least, if you will excuse me for saying so, on the precise way in which a legislature is constructed, does it ?—I think it depends to a certain extent on how the powers of that legislature are defined in the Bill.

112. I think you had better assume the powers would be, in general terms and subject to anything introduced by your clause, powers to legislate for the peace, order and good government of British India. It is the ordinary thing, you know ?—Set out somewhat on the lines of the present Government of India Act ?

113. Yes, if you like. There are two clauses, one dealing with the powers of the Central Legislature and one with those of the provincial. Now, what would be the sort of suggestion you gentlemen would make if you were seeking to insert some anti-discriminatory clause ? You see ?—Yes.

116. * * * —We shall be very glad to submit a draft clause.*

117. I wish you would. Do not think that I am anxious to reduce this to logic-chopping ; but really it is no good going on talking about safeguards in general terms unless someone will think out exactly what is meant, and how it would be expressed ; do not you agree ?—I agree, as long as the principle is admitted at the present time, that possibly we might be able to send a draft which would be useful ; but it must not be understood that finally, if the Bill is greatly changed——

118. No one is seeking to pick holes in anything ; but I really need some help.—We shall be very glad to refer the matter to our lawyers and submit a draft.

119. They will want to know what you mean. Lawyers can always write things down if you will tell them what you mean. Now, there are a few practical matters which I have not quite understood. Would you mind turning to page 142. I am really not quite clear whether your Association does or does not recommend that the number of nominated seats in the Legislative Assembly should be increased. Just look how the document is framed. It begins at the middle of page 142. You first of all say you think a perusal of the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly will show that the anxieties of the authors of the Montagu Report were justified. "While "admitting these defects in the present constitution "of the Assembly, the Association is faced with the "difficulty of submitting an alternative proposal"; and they want one which would secure the strengthening of the executive. Two alternatives have been suggested; the one is the Single Chamber, and the second an increase in the number of nominated seats. "Neither alternative has adequate support "from our Association to justify our making a definite "recommendation on this point." Well, that led me to think that you did not recommend it?—No, I do not think we did recommend either.

120. Another thing I had not quite understood on page 143. I do not quite follow what you mean by saying in paragraph 35 that the Association would recommend "the delegation of such powers to the "provinces as to enable each province individually "to deal with social reform." Would you just explain that a little? I do not appreciate what is the criticism?—May I allow Colonel Crawford to reply to that?

121. Certainly.—(Colonel Crawford) We have it in the Hindu Marriage Bill. Social reform is obstructed when it comes before the Legislative Assembly from the Government benches; not only obstructed, but ultimately turned into a communal question, and in the case of the Hindu Marriage Bill the Muhammadans came in. We have had the matter examined since submitting the report, and have found that the provinces had power to undertake social reforms if they chose to do it.

124. It seems to me, Colonel Crawford, to take your instance, if the Governor-General gives leave it would be perfectly open now for a provincial legislature to legislate on the sort of subjects you have in mind?—(Colonel Crawford) Yes. I would like to see the legislatures doing it.

125. * * * Is there anything which should be altered, you think, to make it easier to do? Do you think it should be within the power of the provincial legislature without any leave, or do you think you must leave things as they are?—I think social reform is one of the things they want to get on with, and anything that would make it easier within the provinces would seem desirable. I gather from our further study of the subject that there is no objection to the provincial legislatures doing it now.

126. Yes, but they could only do it now with leave?—With leave.

127. * * * I am not quite clear to what extent your Association would recommend to us the abolition of the official bloc, either in the provincial legislature or in the Central Legislature?—(Mr. Chartres) In the provincial legislature we should like to see the official bloc done away with.

128. Altogether?—Entirely. In the Central Legislature, under the scheme that we have recommended here, I do not think it is possible to do away with it; otherwise Government could not carry any legislation whatever.

129. Sir Hari Singh Gour: * * * * You have said on page 142, paragraph (f); "It is the "general opinion that the non-official members of the "Viceroy's executive council have not always been "wise and suitable selections, particularly from the "point of view of the legislative work they are called "upon to perform. It is possible that the appointment of a member of the Legislative Assembly to "the executive council might be an additional "strength to the latter body." Is your opinion based upon experience of the members whom you return to the Legislative Assembly?—Yes.

130. Why would you suggest that the appointment of one member of the Legislative Assembly might be an additional strength? The more the better, I suppose?—(Colonel Crawford) We are not insistent on the "a." The principle is the thing.

131. At page 138, paragraph 15, sub-para. (6), you point out that "While the principles for which the "Association stands remain unchanged in its history, "its policy must be kept abreast of the times, and "in conducting the affairs of the Association, the "Council keep prominently before them the following "aims, which were adopted in their present form "by a General Meeting of the Association, held in "the year 1926 . . . (vi.) The vital necessity for "communal representation as the only practicable "method for securing the British community's "political position and a truly representative "Government." You want to introduce into this country a representative institution, not necessarily a responsible one?—Representative.

132. Yes, but not necessarily a responsible Government? * * * (Colonel Crawford) Representative government is the first step towards responsible government. Representative is all you can get at present.

135. You think it would be a "progressive realisation of responsible government" if you gave us representative government to begin with?—It would be a step in that direction.

136. * * * As regards the Bombay Corporation resolution to which reference has been made, the fact that any corporation or body of corporations or the public at large make up their minds to buy only indigenous goods and not to buy British goods,—can that be safeguarded against by any Act of the legislature?—(Mr. Chartres) I did not refer to it as a thing calling for safeguards, but as an explanation of the passage to which the Chairman referred.

137. Do not you think if any safeguards of the character you desire are incorporated, it may jeopardise the whole of British trade by the public combining to boycott British goods even more than they do now?—I do not think so.

138. You think they will fall into a happy mood by feeling you have done them a great service by preserving your rights in the face of their national sentiment?—We are asking for something which we think is fair to us and will be of advantage to India.

139. And you think they will see the fairness of it?—I think so.

140. You think so. You mentioned the Hindu marriage law, and said you thought it should be provincialised. But if it is provincialised, do not you see what will happen? A girl in Bombay cannot be married unless she has attained the age of fourteen years, say, but it will only be necessary to cross the frontier, which may be a small river or even an imaginary line, to contract a marriage. Then how is the Bombay Government's law to be enforced at all?—(Colonel Crawford) You will get cases where people will take advantage of the conditions in other provinces, but you would get a certain advance in some provinces as you have in those Indian States to-day which have taken steps in the matter, and you will make some progress; whereas by constituting all your opposition in the Central Legislature you make no progress.

141. But marriage is an international institution, and marriage in one place is marriage everywhere, and, therefore, the Indian Legislature deals with these problems of All-India social reform; if it was localised in provinces the result would be what I have explained?—In America you have it localised.

142. I do not suppose you ask India to copy America?—I suggest to an ardent social reformer like yourself that you would get on quicker if you did this.

143. If I thought that, I would ask my friends in the local legislatures to deal with the question. With regard to the official bloc, you said just now in answer to the Chairman that you would remove the official bloc in the provinces, but would retain it in the Central Legislature. You retain it in the Central Legislature because otherwise you think the Government will not be able to carry on ?—Yes.

144. Why do you remove it in the provinces ?—(Mr. Chartres) Because in our scheme we are proposing responsible government in the provinces.

145. Do not you think the presence of the official bloc takes away officials from their normal duties, and if their presence in the local legislature is an impediment to the discharge of their duties (because they are drawn from various parts of the province) is not the trouble worse when you take men, say, from Burma and Assam to Delhi or Simla, merely to be voting machines, as was pointed out by the Associated Chambers of Commerce ?—(Colonel Crawford) It may take men away from their districts, but it brings to the Central Legislature a vast store of administrative experience from the provinces which would not otherwise be available.

146. It was pointed out by the Associated Chambers of Commerce that they did not approve ?—We have nothing to do with the Associated Chambers of Commerce.

147. I am just pointing out to you that they do not approve of these officials being turned into voting machines ?—(Mr. Chartres) The remedy we have put forward is that those official representatives should be allowed to speak on the floor of the House and give their opinion on matters affecting their own province.

148. Would you give them a free vote ?—On matters affecting their own province. (Colonel Crawford) On page 142, paragraph (d), we say : " The " Association would, however, definitely recommend " that members nominated to represent provincial " governments should be free to speak and vote in " accordance with the requirements of their province."

149. Oh, yes ! In cases like the Meston award, and things like that. I am not dealing with that. I mean, are they to be the backbone of the Central Government, at their beck and call and voting with them if Government so desires ?—(Mr. Chartres) Speaking generally, they must be prepared to support the Central Government, and Government has a right to expect its nominated members to support it.

150. As regards the recommendations of the Lee Commission, I find from your summary, at page 147, that you want the recommendations of the Lee Commission with regard to the Services to be adhered to. When you wish to give the measure of autonomy you propose in your scheme to the provinces, would you give effect to the recommendations of the Lee Commission to that extent ? The recommendation of the Lee Commission was that in the transferred field the Services should be provincialised. So you are in favour of that ?—For the subjects that are transferred ; but for Law and Order, which we take to include not only the Police but the administration of justice——

151. I understand you use that loose phrase, " Law and Order," to include what the Chairman said ?—What we call the Security Services. We consider they should be Central Services.

152. So long as in your scheme Law and Order is in charge of a member directly under the Governor ? —Yes.

153. The difficulty I see in that scheme is this. Under the present law, the reserved departments of the provincial Government, though it may be responsive to the legislature, is not responsible to it, but is under the superintendence, direction, and control of the Government of India, and the Government of India is in its turn subject to the superintendence, direction and control of the Secretary of State. Would you make this member in charge of Law and Order subject to the superintendence, direction and control of the Government of India and the Secretary of State, as the case may be ?—So far as his department is concerned he is responsible to the Governor ; but the Government of India, we visualise, must retain the final control over Law and Order in the provinces.

154. And you would not allow even a discussion in the provincial legislative council on the policy of the Government regarding Law and Order, without the special leave of the Governor ?—Yes.

158. * * * The Witness : Our point is that in the Legislative Councils the voting power and responsibility should go hand in hand. We do not think that the provinces are ready yet, in view of communal tension, for the transfer of Law and Order and, therefore, we say that we would not recommend the transfer. We think the Councils will work better if the power of discussion and criticism is withheld from them on this reserved subject, while that power is retained in the case of those subjects for which the Councils have full responsibility.

159. Do you know what that will bring you to ? It will bring you to this : Supposing at the commencement of the year the Governor says, " I want one lakh of rupees for the maintenance of my Police," and subsequently there is a riot and more money is required. Because the rest of the Budget has already been voted on there cannot be any re-appropriation. How are you going to find money ?—Just as it is done at present—by a supplementary demand.

160. Supplementary estimates are put to the vote and because the amounts are votable there is re-appropriation ?—(Colonel Crawford) For instance, if a war breaks out and extra grants for military expenditure are required, they would be taken on a supplementary demand.

161. No, it will not be taken. A case like that has not arisen since you and I became members of the Assembly : the position will have to be studied. But I have studied this, that if you split your budget into two parts, take a certain sum of money for your Police and make the rest votable, and if you require during the course of the year more money for the purpose of suppressing riots, you cannot have any re-appropriation ?—You will have to provide powers for that.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : Do you then want that the Governor should have the power of dipping his hand into the votable part of the budget and to drag out as much as he wants ? In other words, you want to convert the votable item into a non-votable item ?

162. The Chairman : What is the position ? First of all, let us take the question of the raising of money. If any additional money is needed to be raised over and above what has been raised in the ordinary way, there is a vote—is not there ?—in order to carry the additional tax ?—(Mr. Chartres) Yes.

163. And there may be cases in which, on the vote, the tax is rejected, and if the circumstances were so exceptional as to warrant it, none-the-less it might be passed under the special powers of the Governor-General. Normally speaking, any extra money that is needed is all voted. What I want to know from you gentlemen is whether the money that is to be spent on the Police under your scheme will all be voted ?—That is not our recommendation.

164. I will put it in another way. Do you not contemplate that the taxes which produce the fund out of which the money will be taken will be voted ? —Yes.

165. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You are referring to additional taxes, sir. Suppose the budget shows a surplus from which this money can be provided for and the Legislative Council says, " I am not going to raise additional taxes because there is money, but I will not give you money because you are outside my jurisdiction."

Lord Burnham : So far as I understand, the Association wants to put the expenditure on the Police in the same position as the expenditure on the Army.

The Chairman: Or the High Court judges' salaries.

166. Sir Hari Singh Gour: That will do in normal times. If there is a sudden emergency and a demand for more money arises, then comes the difficulty. How would you be able to circumvent an impasse of this character? Did it occur to your Association how to get over it?—(Colonel Crawford) If a deadlock occurs, the Governor, being responsible for carrying on the province, will have to step in; he will suspend the House and call for a fresh House. As a last resort the Governor-General will step in.

167. Will the member in charge of Law and Order consult the ministers or will he act independently of the ministers?—(Mr. Chartres) For the control of his own department, no; but for the executive work of the province, yes; he must be in touch with them from day to day.

168. Supposing the ministers are of one view and he is of another, who is to criticise?—He must have the final control over his department.

169. I will give you a concrete example. The ministers say, "the excise prohibition policy upon which we have embarked requires a larger Police force." The member in charge of the Police says that because he has not got money he cannot keep more Police. Then?—The Governor and the member in charge of the Police must decide that point.

170. That is to say to that extent the member in charge of Law and Order and the Governor can overrule the ministerial side of the Government; in other words, you are going to give the member in charge of Police a hand in the transferred department while the ministers in the transferred departments have no hand at all in the reserved departments?—The position will be something like this: If the minister who wants prohibition to be enforced insists on more Police force then the member in charge of Police will go to the member in charge of Finance and say, "If I have to increase the Police force to that extent you have to give me more money." So the two ministers must agree before anything can be done.

171. But, Mr. Chartres, you cannot always think as to what will exactly happen; sometimes things may happen which you never thought of?—But you are putting only half the case; we should consider the whole case.

172. You want that the High Courts should be centralised. Will the member in charge of Law and Order have anything to do with the High Court?—No.

* * * * * * * *

175. Sir Hari Singh Gour: I think your real object in taking away the High Courts from the control of the province is to ensure their impartiality and to see that, at any rate, justice is not diluted by communal, class or local interests?—Yes.

176. While you are purifying the High Courts does it not necessarily follow that in order to purify the subordinate judiciary you should put them under the High Court as they are in Bengal?—(Colonel Crawford) Speaking personally, yes.

177. Sir Arthur Froom: I have recently received, and I have no doubt the Conference has received, a revised Memorandum* from the Punjab Branch of the European Association (E.Pun.195) setting forth some new suggestions. They say that "a special "representative for British Interests in India be "appointed by Parliament." Since this document has been issued after the European Association had sent in their Memorandum, might I ask you if this document of the Punjab Branch of the Association, which puts forward this startling suggestion, has received the concurrence of the Council of the European Association?—(Mr. Chartres) No. The matter had been discussed at a conference last year on a slightly different footing, but was turned down. Soon after we received this Punjab Memorandum we circulated it to all the members of our Council for opinion; they have all rejected the proposal. I would, therefore, ask the Conference to take it as an expression of opinion only of the Punjab branch.

* Not printed.

178. I have no doubt that you have read in the press and also heard elsewhere that the European Association has been described as a reactionary body. Would you like to tell the Conference what your position is?—I think that anyone who carefully reads our Memorandum cannot say that our Association is a reactionary body. I would like to amplify that and say that we have, as a body, loyally accepted the Declaration of 1917, and that since the Reforms were introduced our members have done their best to work them in every province, and that we, as a body, are only too anxious to see India develop on what we consider the right lines. If we appear to want to walk slower than some other parties in India, it is not because we object to the road, but it is because we want to progress steadily forward. The conditions in this country are very different from those of any other country where democratic institutions are in vogue, and we think that it is absolutely necessary to make certain of security at each step on the road before trying the experiment over the whole country.

185. Sir Arthur Froom: Have you any criticism or advice to offer on the administrative machinery of India?—The general opinion of our members is that the local self-government is certainly not operating in this country in a way which can be called satisfactory. In every province that I visited last year I found that our members had considerable faults to find with the administration of municipalities and District Boards; in fact, we have gathered a lot of information on this subject.

186. Do you think that much importance should be paid to the working of District Boards and Municipalities?—Yes; I think they are the foundation on which the whole political machinery in this country must be built. That is the school for the electorate, that is the school for the members who have to carry out self-governing duties. We look on these institutions as a very important part in the whole machinery of the government in this country.

187. Would you like to see closer co-operation between the Provincial Governments and the District Boards and Municipalities?—Certainly. There does not seem to be any power, or if there is power there is no inclination to use it, to compel these bodies to carry out their work in an efficient manner. I think that is a loophole in the present administration which ought to be closed up. On the other hand, I think that many of these boards are working under very difficult conditions because they have not got that machinery which used to exist in the days of the official chairman. The non-official chairman has come into control, but has not the same facilities, and these Boards are undoubtedly placed in a difficult position. That is why in our recommendations we suggest that there should be some service of executive officers for these bodies to help them in their work.

188. What is your experience of the handling of parliamentary business by officers who are trained mainly in the administration?—(Colonel Crawford) Not very satisfactory. I think there is a good deal of difference between a parliamentarian and an administrator.

189. Have you got suggestions to make?—I do not see why the leader of the House should not be a man with parliamentary experience in England. (Mr. Gavin Jones) I would also suggest that there should be a special Civil Service department for political purposes. Now and then we have men sent in as ministers (?members) who have no experience of parliamentary practice, and by the time they learn it they move away and somebody else comes in.

190. Sir Arthur Froom: What is your opinion on the prospects of developing government on party lines in India? For instance, do you consider that adequate stability would be secured by a Minister voted by the House?—(Mr. Chartres) In the near future I cannot visualise anything but groups of different parties in the House, and I think it is very doubtful therefore if you can get stability in a ministry formed from those groups. Our experience during the last five years has shown that it is very difficult to get stability.

191. I notice—in fact I am aware—that in this Memorandum Second Chambers are recommended. It has been suggested at times that it is doubtful whether you can get adequate material to form Second Chambers. Have you any alternative suggestion, or do you still stick to the same suggestion ?—Our opinion now, as the result of our last Conference, is that there is suitable material in each province for a Second Chamber.

192. On page 133, paragraph 13, you say, " whilst " there are individuals who consider the Indian " political problem an original one, which, owing to " the complexities shown in section 1 of this Mem- " orandum, needs original treatment, the majority " have an abiding faith in their own political " traditions." You say there are individuals who consider that. Have they put forward any concrete suggestions in that connection ?—We have had one or two very interesting suggestions. The first is a proposal for splitting up Provinces into States, and is really a copy of what was put before Mr. Montagu in Calcutta. The second is one put forward by Colonel Tandy, who was the head of the Survey of India.

The Witness : Yes. He has suggested a very interesting readjustment of the whole administration in India. The administration of this country is performed through machinery which was designed very many years ago. Great changes have occurred, work has increased enormously, and many departments of the Government of India have had to be reorganised. For instance, many of the railways have been reorganised on the group system during the last five years. But throughout the country the old system of administration is still adopted, and I am not sure if a time like this, when changes are being considered, is not a very good opportunity also to go into the question of bringing the administration of the country up to date. It certainly is not up to date, and it certainly is not satisfactory at present.

193. The Chairman : Are you speaking primarily of the areas ? I have read Colonel Tandy's book. It is largely concerned, not entirely, with the selection of suitable areas ?—Yes, and also of any one department having to be sub-divided. That is to say, instead of the local government board office in Calcutta having to supervise every local board in the whole of the province, he would group them and have better inspection of districts. That is what all the big organisations in the world do, and speaking as a man who has had some experience of reorganising business matters in this country, it is a scheme that appeals a lot to me from the point of view of increasing the efficiency of the Government.

194. Sir Arthur Froom : There is another point, a point referred to by Sir Hari Singh Gour, and that is with regard to the departments which are transferred and which have, therefore, become provincialised. In this Memorandum you lay considerable stress on the retention of the British element in the Services. Now, take, for instance, one or two departments already transferred. I put a similar question to the Associated Chambers, and I consider it of such an importance that I should like to have an expression of opinion from your body. Take, for instance, education ; we learnt not very long ago that the element of the All-India Service on the educational side has practically disappeared altogether, and I take it that in the other departments which are transferred, the transference bringing in its train the provision that recruitment must be provincial, the All-India element in those Services will equally disappear unless steps are taken to prevent it. Now, can you visualise any alteration in the Devolution Rules under the future Government of India Act, or would you recommend that there should be some alteration which would preserve a certain element of the All-India Services in the departments administered as transferred ? In referring to the All-India Services, I am not making any difference between the British and Indian element so long as they belong to the All-India Services, Indian Civil Service, or the Indian Educational Service, or the Forest Department, or the Police and so on ?—I think that one of the conditions of the transfer of autonomy to the provinces must be that they will undertake to employ a certain percentage of the All-India Services in the different transferred departments, and the Security Services must be retained as All-India Services. The Government of India must have some field for training and recruiting its own staff, and it can only get trained men from among those who are employed in the provinces at the beginning of their career. I cannot visualise how the Government of India can possibly hand over everything to the provinces without insisting that the Security Services shall be manned by All-India Government men.

195. Lord Burnham : On the basis of the Lee Commission report ?—Yes.

196. Sir Arthur Froom : We do not want to go outside the recommendations of the Lee Commission. They have been accepted in this country. I think the idea of the Association is that they do not want to go beyond them. In the statement of the policy of the European Association, one statement is to the effect that their aim is practical sympathy with the Anglo-Indians and Domiciled Community in their political aspirations. We heard, at Delhi, that the Anglo-Indian community regard their future in this country with a considerable amount of alarm ; that they have been squeezed out from some of the Services in which they worked for very many years, such as the Post Office, Customs, etc. Can you suggest a remedy for this, as part of your declared policy is to try and assist these Anglo-Indians as far as possible ?—We have dealt with this subject on page 146 of our Memorandum. I think the essential feature of the difficulty is an economic one, and the serious factor of it is that the great field for Anglo-Indian employment in the past has been the railways and one or two other large Government departments, in which they felt they had more or less a prescriptive right, and I do not think they took particular pains to keep themselves qualified for competing with other men who wanted to get into these Services. Indianisation has, undoubtedly, increased their difficulties very much in that respect. The only way in which they can be fitted to fight the economic battle is by better education, and we impressed that fact as strongly as we could on the Hartog Committee when we appeared before them. We thought that the Government of India should recognise the peculiar case of the Anglo-Indian community and provide some special facilities for their education.

197. That is your idea of the proper solution ?—Yes.

198. With regard to safeguards, would you include in the clause referring to safeguards that these safeguards should be extended to all minorities in India ?—Yes, certainly.

199. You are not claiming them exclusively for the European community ?—No, certainly not.

Sir Arthur Froom : On Law and Order, I think our Chairman pointed out that Law and Order being outside the Cabinet of ministers, there would be a certain loss of cohesion. I think the Chairman gave an illustration about education.

The Chairman : The difficulty seems to be this, and any well-devised scheme must face the difficulty. Police is not departmental in the sense that some other subjects are departmental. There is medical administration, in order that people may get medicine. But the Police seems to be more or less like a condition on which everything else may be worked smoothly. You may want the policeman to regulate an election row one day and the next day you want his help because there is a dispute about a religious matter and so on. So it is difficult to treat that as a departmental subject by itself.

200. Sir Arthur Froom: The point is this. Whether or not it would so happen, it has been suggested that there will be some difficulty in this subject being in charge of a minister. I would suggest that there is some sort of arrangement like this now. In the case of trouble you call the military. The military is not under a minister and I have never heard of the military refusing to assist. So my suggestion is that there is something already obtaining which works quite smoothly, and there need be no fear that it will not work smoothly as has been suggested ?—I think the balance of advantage lies in our scheme.

201. You suggest that Law and Order should be reserved and you have given your reasons. But is it your suggestion that in the provinces it should be reserved for all time, or do you visualise that in the future it could be transferred ?—I visualise that in the terms of the preamble of the Government of India Act the matter would be reviewed, and as the country develops and shows the possibility of efficiency and stability in the working of the Councils, the time might come quite rapidly when it could be transferred.

202. You are not dogmatic about its being a reserved subject for all time ?—Certainly not.

203. With regard to the Central Government, you state in your Memorandum that you do not propose that there should be any change in the Central Government for the present. But you state in the Memorandum, whether rightly or wrongly, that you would like to see how provincial autonomy works out in the provinces. At the same time you do not dogmatise that there should be no change in the Central Government for all time, do you ?—Certainly not. As the course of events develops in the provinces, and if it is proved that this form of democratic government is going to work in India, I see no reason why the time when an advance in the Central Government could be considered should not come fairly rapidly. But at present I would not like to name any date whatsoever for even enquiring into it.

204. Lord Burnham: You use the word, "democracy" in the real sense or in the way in which it is used here ? Do you mean a general franchise or anything of that sort ?—It means that there would be elected representatives or some franchise to the Council, with ministers responsible to the Council.

206 Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: You say, at the bottom of paragraph 2 (Memorandum by the Council of the European Association): "The British "community in India, therefore, by right of its past "labours, the constructive work it is carrying on "to-day, and the immense financial responsibilities "under its direct control, can claim the fullest "hearing on the important problems which His "Majesty has called on the Royal Commission to "study." May I take it that you do not demand any special privileges or the continuance of any which might exist now ?—No, we do not obtain any special privileges.

207. Do you not think that your community has received adequate benefit for its past labours ? You say in paragraph 2, "by right of its past labours" ? —(Colonel Crawford) We do not claim any special privileges for British trade against Indian trade or against the interests of India.

208. You had adequate benefit for your past labours, and there is nothing uncompensated now ?—(Mr. Chartres) We do not ask for compensation. We merely put it forward as a reason for being heard.

209. You speak of "the constructive work" which your community claims to be carrying out. Will you enumerate the special works you have in mind and tell us whether those could not be carried out by Indians ?—The big works that we British have carried out, such as railways, irrigation, and other things ; I do not think that India could have carried them out without British help.

210. Why ?—Because immense financial resources were needed to do that, and I do not think that India would have had the necessary credits in the world's markets, to say nothing of the technical experience required in carrying out the works after you have got the money.

211. You mention in paragraph 4 of your Memorandum about the total capital controlled by the British community in India, and you claim that the immense import and export trade of India is largely the creation of Europeans. Would it be correct to say that this large trade could not have been developed without the support of the Indians and that it has brought great benefit and profit to your community ? —I think it is quite right, that it could not have been developed without the co-operation of Indians. I think that modern India is the result of the work of British and Indians together, and I think that Indians have benefited equally with us in the development of the country.

212. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand: * * * Now, I will take paragraph 10. You ascribe there the cleavage between the Hindus and Muhammadans to (a) the political and economic dominance of the Hindu, and (b) the Reforms. As regards (a), do you agree that the relationship of the two communities may improve with the spread of education ?—I think it ought to. Yes.

213. And as regards (b), have you anything to say to the criticism that communal representation in the Legislatures under the Reforms has accentuated the tension between the two communities ?—I doubt if it has accentuated it. It existed before the Reforms were introduced.

214. Not in such an acute form ?—No. The knowledge that power is being given out under the Reforms scheme has certainly accentuated it. It has been accentuated, not by communal electorates but by the scramble for power.

215. In paragraph 12, you quote with approval from the address of the Governor-General of the Philippine Islands in a passage in which he speaks of the relationship between political and economic interests. But you must be aware that the constant complaint here has been for many years that the economic development of this country is largely associated with the political and financial handicaps under which she labours ? If it is definitely proved, Mr. Chartres, that Indian economic advancement has been retarded by her deficient political power and fiscal restrictions, would you not approve the concession of full Dominion status by progressive stages, the progress being as rapid as possible ?—I think on that hypothesis I would, yes; and with the conditions that you specify.

216. Now, I will take paragraph 15. There you demand the maintenance by all constitutional means of the rights of the British community in India. Can you mention briefly a few of the important rights of the British community to which you refer ? —The principal one to which we attach importance is the maintenance of the right of trial by jury.

217. And would you give that to the other communities, also ?—They have it at present. That is laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code at present, and we desire to have that right maintained.

218. You want that extra right now ?—We have it at present, and we want to see it maintained. If you ask me how, I should like to say that it should be made one of the safeguards in the Act. We mention this briefly on page 145 in this Memorandum, but I would like to elaborate it and see it put in Section 65 of the Government of India Act.

219. Sir Arthur Froom: In any future Government of India Act ?—Yes. It applies now.

220. But it is not statutory at present ?—No.

Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : You ask for protection of British minorities against racial or other aggression. What aggression of any nature have you observed that has been directed against British citizens in India ?—We have had quite a number of cases recently.

221. Can you quote some ?—We had the Spence case in Bengal. In Calcutta there was another case.

222. Was it simply because he was a British citizen that he got into trouble ?—(Colonel Crawford) I will give you the details. There was a motor accident resulting in the death of an Indian coolie. The car was being driven by an Indian chauffeur ; yet the coroner's jury to whom the case was taken gave a verdict of an act of negligent driving against the lady who was sitting in the car. That is the type of thing which is very frequently coming up before our Association. I only quote it as one instance.

223. In sub-clause 3, paragraph 15, you refer to the political aspirations of Anglo-Indians and the domiciled community. Can you mention the aspirations of this community that you particularly have in mind ?—(Mr. Chartres) The extent to which we are prepared to support them is, I think, set out very fully in our Memorandum, page 146.

224. What have you to say to the popular impression that the Anglo-Indians and the Domiciled Community want all the privileges of the natives of India, and in addition want all the prestige, glory, and benefit of the British people ?

225. * * * Mr. Chartres : I think you will realise that their position as a community in this country is very very difficult.

The Chairman : I do not mind saying so now, publicly, because I feel extremely about it. I think you suggested that their difficulties are largely economic and social and not constitutional, but it is really quite manifest that these people through no fault of their own tend to be regarded on the one side as not Indian and on the other side as not British, and that is a very unhappy situation, if I may say so.

226. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : In sub-clause (iv), paragraph 15, you say that there must be the assurance of a reasonable standard of efficiency in the Indian administration. May I ask whether you deem it necessary to debar Indians from their legitimate share in the administration on the ground of inefficiency ?

* * * * * * * *

227. The Witness : I think that unless Indians can give similar satisfaction as regards the same Services as Europeans there should be no discrimination made at all. (Colonel Crawford) In the districts the Indian member, though he is as good as the British member, does not get the same prestige from his own countrymen. The Indians themselves look upon the Indian members in that way. (Mr. Gavin Jones) I think it has a great deal to do with the European being impartial.

228. The Chairman : Neutral ?—Yes.

229. Neither of one community nor of the other ? —Yes.

230. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : Do you know any other country wherein the sons of the soil are not allowed fully to participate in the administration of their own land ?—(Mr. Chartres) I believe it is so in the Philippines.

231. In sub-clause (viii), paragraph 15, you stress the importance of the preservation and increase of British prestige. Does it not occur to you that this same prestige may be in danger owing to the increasing resentment of the people suffering from deterioration of their economic development ?—This is an internal aim for the members of our own Association. It is the prestige of the British character and keeping up the level of the British character of all of our members. That was what was intended by this.

232. I will now take paragraph 18. You say that at the moment there is leniency towards inefficient and corrupt administration in local self-government. Can you tell us to what extent Government are responsible for these conditions since they possess adequate powers effectively to deal with defaulting local bodies ?—I am not quite sure that I agree with you that they do possess adequate powers. They possess the power of inspection of accounts and of dissolving and suspending local bodies, but they seem to have no intermediate power for driving the executive machinery. Also, I think, the whole attitude of Government ever since the Reforms were instituted has been one of rather letting things drift, waiting for public opinion.

233. The Chairman : Surely, the subject matter of this particular paragraph is a transferred subject, and the person who is responsible for its administration is an Indian minister ?—That is so.

Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : Even then Government has power.

The Chairman : But the minister is the person primarily responsible.

234. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : Then, in paragraph 23 (page 139) you say that the " existing " system of communal electorates must continue." On this question are you prepared to allow the Commission to be guided by authoritative Indian opinion ?—(Mr. Chartres) What do you mean by " authoritative Indian opinion " ?

235. You may say, moderate Indian opinion ?—Of which class ?

236. The Commission has got to decide which class ?—Hindu or Muhammadan ?

237. Both ?—If the opinion is joint, yes.

* * * * * * * *

239. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : * * * In paragraph 24 and succeeding paragraphs it would appear that you oppose responsible Government in the Central Legislature. Do you think it probable that the people of India as a whole will rest content by anything less than full power to direct their own affairs, and are you aware of the present agitation advocating independence as the ultimate goal, and does not your recommendation really try to estrange such extremists ?—We are quite prepared and do sympathise with Indian aspiration, but we consider that advance in the Central Legislature can only be made when the provincial legislatures have proved their ability to conduct the affairs of the provinces successfully. We do not believe that there is any desire for independence amongst the majority of Indians. It is the talk of a lot of rather extreme politicians who think that they can bring pressure to bear on the British Government to give way, but I do not think that they represent very many more than themselves, and I am quite sure that if there were anything like a genuine desire for independence in this country, we should not find a man like yourself on the Conference. (Mr. Gavin Jones) You said " people as a whole." The people as a whole do not know in fact about what is going on in the country. Only a small minority knows anything about it and very few of them understand it.

240. In your opinion, then, all this talk of independence is only an attempt at publicity ?—(Mr. Chartres) That is right.

241. In paragraph 30 you say that the insistence on joint electorates is not entirely disinterested. Do you think that the insistence on communal electorates is entirely disinterested ?—No ; I do not think it is. I think it is also based on self-interest.

242. Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi : There has been a good deal of talk about representative Government and responsible Government. Do you not think that communal representation does not militate against responsible government ? You can have responsible government and at the same time popular representation, can you not ?—Certainly.

243. Then we heard something about separate electorates being responsible for accentuating communal feeling. I want to put the other side of the shield before you. Do you think that separate electorates would rather tend to lesson communal rivalry? In a general electorate it would be quite easy for people to appeal to communal passions? —Yes.

244. My next question is quite on a different point. In your summary of recommendations you say in sub-clause (e) at page 147: "That the financial "relations between the Central and Provincial "Governments be re-examined and adjusted to overcome the inequities of the Meston award." Do you really feel that the Meston award has made it difficult for the Reforms to be worked properly in Bengal, and that the Reforms could have been worked better but for the fact of the unfair distribution of funds between the Central and Provincial Governments?—I am not going to remark on the fairness of the distribution, but I may say that had financial resources been more plentiful, I think the Reforms would have worked better in Bengal.

245. And you certainly press that the financial relations between the provincial and Central Governments should be fairly and adequately revised? —I think the time has come for that.

246. You are in favour, I understand, of Indianisation of Services. Do you not think that it should be proportionate to the representatives of the different communities having regard, of course, to efficiency?—Having regard to efficiency, I would agree.

247. Mr. Travers: I have only two questions to ask, Mr. Chartres, and it is in reference, first of all, to this province. We have, of course, very great and serious communal discord in this province. Now, in regard to the transfer of Law and Order there are several of your deputation who, one might say, are in intimate touch with non-official opinion in this province. You, yourself, and Colonel Crawford and Mr. Thompson who is the Chairman of the Provincial Committee, are in a position to speak on the matter. May I ask you what proportion of the British community in this province are against the transfer of Law and Order? Can you give us any indication of that, or is it a very considerable majority?—I should think 99 per cent.

248. I would ask the same question to Mr. Gavin Jones about his province, where there is also communal tension. Is it a fact that in your province also, a very considerable majority of the British community are against the transfer of Law and Order?—(Mr. Gavin Jones) I should say the whole.

249. Then we may take it that in those provinces where there is this communal trouble the great majority of the British citizens desire that police, you may call it, and magistracy should be retained under the Governor and not be transferred?—(Mr. Chartres) Yes.

250. Maharaja Shashi Kanta: May I ask one or two questions? Do you advocate communal representation in the Councils always, or only for a certain number of years?—There, I think, we have to be guided again, just as in certain other matters, by the terms of the preamble of the Government of India Act.

251. You would not like to fix the time now?—No; I think the fixation of a date on a previous occasion has proved the undesirability of the method, and we should prefer the preamble of the Government of India Act to be adhered to.

252. Maulvi Abul Kasem: You have said in reply to a previous question that communal elections will be much improved by the spread of education in the people, and you say in your Memorandum that these communal strifes are not due so much to religious differences as to the scramble for power between the different communities?—I do not think we have said that. We have said that it has been enhanced by that.

253. And, therefore, this scramble for power, or this quarrel about power and political importance is confined to the educated community? In other words, this scramble for power by which you say these communal differences have been enhanced is confined to the educated community?—Yes.

254. Therefore, the spread of education has nothing to do with these communal differences, and do you not think that these communal differences will cease when the Hindus and the Muhammadans equally share power in the administration?—I am afraid that is a hypothetical question. I would not like to give a reply to that.

255. Well, then, I would refer you to page 141. In the very first paragraph therein you speak of the danger of building a superstructure before the foundations are secured, and you go on to illustrate it by saying that local self-government bodies, such as municipalities and district boards and panchayats have not been sufficiently developed and that they should be fostered and nursed to be more useful before you can have responsible government. May I suggest to you this. Will it not be desirable to have a system of local self-government boards to control and supervise and advise and direct these self-governing bodies and thus to improve them before you secure a responsible Government?—Without seeing actually what your Board is like, its constitution and so on, one cannot express an opinion upon it; but I think it most desirable to have some machinery for this purpose.

256. And will you entrust these local self-governing bodies with important duties about local administration as they grow up?—They have very important duties now.

257. Then you think that the Legislatures have been given powers and Reforms before the local self-governing bodies were fully developed?—There is no doubt about that. Yes.

258. Then you say that the franchise should not be lowered, but at the same time you say that a greater proportion of seats should be given to agriculture, and, as you have separately mentioned, landed and business interests. I take it that "agriculture" means the cultivating ryots?—Yes.

259. You would give them a larger share in the legislature than they have at present, but in order to give larger representation to agriculture it is necessary that franchise in the rural areas should be lowered?—I do not quite follow you, because there are a good number of rural workers who vote to-day, and they will have greater representation through their co-operative societies and bodies of that sort later.

Maulvi Abul Kasem: If you examine the franchise for rural areas you will find that it is so high at present, namely, two rupees union tax, or one rupee road cess, that it will not give votes to actual cultivators but direct tenure holders and people of that standard.

260. Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi: May I just make that point clear? You see, the qualifications for an elector to the local legislative council are either the payment of one rupee road cess or two rupees chaukidari tax, but for the union board you have got, again, the one rupee road cess, but only one rupee chaukidari tax. And what my friend asks you is whether you think that the two rupees chaukidari tax should be reduced to one rupee. The result would be that the voters in both the communities would be more or less in proportion to the state of the population, and the cultivators will have more votes. There I think you will, possibly, agree?—My point is that you are mixing up two things. You were talking about the franchise and then you go on to speak about the number of representatives. I do not think you can mix up the two together.

261. There is at present one common factor both for the union boards and legislative councils in regard to the payment of the road cess, that is one rupee, and supposing you reduce the chaukidari cess of two rupees to the legislative council by one rupee and thus make the qualification for election to the provincial council similar to what it is to the union boards, then, I think, it will confer votes on a larger number. Is that not so?—As a general principle we consider anything like adult franchise absolutely premature to-day.

262. We are not talking about adult franchise ?—I am not prepared to say anything about the difference in franchise in union boards and legislative councils. And as long as the electorate is not flooded with a large number of illiterate voters, we will agree.

Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi : It is only for making the number of voters proportional to the population strength of the various communities and at the same time giving more votes to the agricultural population about whom we are talking.

263. Maulvi Abul Kasem : By lowering the franchise your fear is that there will be an influx of illiterate voters ?—Yes.

264. And consequently there might be more corruption ?—We have not said that.

The Chairman : Corruption is not limited to voters ; I wish it were.

265. Maulvi Abul Kasem : One question about the Central Legislature. At present you do not want to make any changes in the Central Legislature, that is to say, you do not want to make the executive of the Central Government responsible to the Central Legislature ?—Yes, that is so.

266. In this connection I want to know if you would be able to tell from the experience of your representatives in the Central Legislature, whether it is not a fact that because the Central Legislature sits continuously for three or four months at Delhi, and for six or seven weeks at Simla, the Indians (business men and lawyers) cannot afford to leave their professions and go and work in the Central Legislature ?—There is difficulty, but I think Indians are not faced with greater difficulty than we are.

267. In your case the people who have retired from business are generally members ?—I think there is only one man who has retired from business who is there.

268. But the Indians find more difficulty because of the geographical position—I mean because of the distance of Delhi. It is not like the British Parliament, that sits in London ?—We realise that there is the difficulty of distance.

269. Unless the present situation is changed you are not prepared to give responsibility to the Central Legislature ?—As we have already said, we are not prepared to recommend giving responsibility at present.

* * * * * * * *

271. I wonder how you are going to get the various interests represented by election throughout India. Would you allow any provincial election if necessary ? For instance, is there an All-India organisation for landed interests ?—I think each province has an organisation in which the election could be carried out.

APPENDIX.

FROM THE COUNCIL OF THE EUROPEAN ASSOCIATION TO THE SECRETARY, THE INDIAN STATUTORY COMMISSION.

SIR,

DISCRIMINATORY LEGISLATION.

As requested by the Chairman, we enclose a draft clause, which we hope may be of assistance as formulating the kind of statutory prohibition which was asked for under Paragraph 49 of the Memorandum in addition to the continuance of the Instructions to Governors as there set out, and the right of veto as set out in Paragraph 31 (c). Although we can only speak for the European minority, there are, of course, other minorities in India, and our view is, that in the interests of India as a whole, the temptation to pass discriminatory legislation is one which should be removed by some such clause as we suggest.

In this clause we have restricted ourselves to the matters in which the Association is particularly concerned. The Association would, however, in principle support any discriminatory legislation reasonably demanded by any minority in religious, educational or other matters. The Association set out their views on this point in Paragraph 49 of their Memorandum.

May we emphasise again that we put this clause forward at this stage at the request of the Commission, but that it should not be regarded as necessarily expressing our final view. When the question is before Parliament, it may be that other matters will have been raised which might lead us to press for somewhat different safeguards. Equally, of course, we should be willing to consider any modifications suggested. We have, as will be seen, drafted the clause so as to make legislation which contravenes it valid if the assent of the Governor-General is obtained. We felt is necessary to make such a provision, as it has been found necessary in the past to pass discriminatory legislation which we recognise as desirable, e.g. The Land Alienation Act in the Punjab. It may well be that in the future discriminatory legislation may be necessary to which no reasonable minority could object, and for that reason it seemed to us that the clause ought to provide for the possibility of passing such legislation.

Assuming that such a clause is enacted, the question of machinery of prohibition is a Constitutional one. Machinery by which, in the case of bills to be introduced in the Central Legislature, the Viceroy, or in the case of bills to be introduced in Provincial Legislatures, the Governor, either by himself or after reference to the Viceroy, could rule a discriminatory bill out of order on its introduction would, we think, not only avoid litigation, but also prevent ill feeling developing.

The question what judicial machinery will be suitable for deciding matters arising under the suggested clause is bound up with the wider question of the organisation of the Courts in India, and we have accordingly refrained from putting forward our suggestions upon this point in the form of a draft clause. It appears to us that as questions upon the validity of a statute can only arise in a limited class of cases, the risk that the suggested clause may give rise to frivolous claims or defences may easily be over estimated. We venture, however, to suggest for consideration the following scheme:—

1. Where in a Court subordinate to the High Court of a Province a point is raised in a claim or a defence as to the legality of any piece of legislation, the judge shall hear argument upon the question whether or not the point is a frivolous one, and from his decision upon that question either party may appeal to the High Court of the Province, whose decision shall be final.
2. If the High Court rules that the point is a frivolous one, it shall be struck out of the claim or defence as the case may be.
3. If the High Court rules that the point is not a frivolous one, it shall direct that the question as to the legality of the legislation in question shall be argued either before a Special Court or (if it is not thought desirable to set up a Special Court) before the High Court itself, and from the decision of the Special Court or High Court there shall be a right of appeal to the Privy Council. The Advocate General and any other parties, including associations who may satisfy the Court that they are interested in the question, and ought to be heard, shall be entitled to appear and argue as to the legality of the legislation.

FOR THE COUNCIL,
ARTHUR FROOM,
HUGH G. COCKE,
T. D. EDELSTON,
T. GAVIN JONES.

DRAFT CLAUSE.

Neither the Indian Legislature, nor any Provincial Legislature, Municipality or other Local Authority shall have power, without the consent of the Governor-General, to make or sanction any law, ordinance or other measure :—

(a) which expressly or impliedly discriminates as between the races, creeds, or communities comprising His Imperial Majesty's subjects, or between corporations incorporated in any part of the British Empire as being or not being incorporated in any part of the British Empire, or as being or not being wholly or in part composed of members or directed by officers who are members of any particular race, creed or community, in relation to the exercise in India by the members of any such race, creed, or community, being subjects of His Imperial Majesty, of any profession, calling or vocation, or the carrying on in India by them or by any such corporation as aforesaid, of any trade, industry or business upon equal terms in all respects with others of such subjects and corporations.

(b) which levies any taxation, cesses, duties or other imposts, of whatever nature or kind, upon any persons being subjects of His Imperial Majesty as being or not being the members of any particular race, creed or community, or upon any Corporations incorporated in any part of the British Empire as being or not being incorporated in any particular part of the British Empire, or as being or not being wholly or in part composed of members or directed by officers who are members of any particular race, creed or community.

Memorandum submitted by the Kanchrapara Railway Workmen's Union.

(REGISTERED UNDER THE INDIAN TRADE UNIONS ACT).

India's claim to be one of the leading industrial States in the world and the position of her working-classes and their problems.

India is generally believed to be only a supplier of raw materials for manufacture abroad. Our industries are described as hardly developed enough to make adequate use of our vast agricultural, mineral and animal resources. A few facts and figures taken from official reports would serve to dispose of this argument. Indian manufactures annually exported abroad are valued at £58,000,000. Indian railways have a larger mileage than in England. Jute industry, one of the largest in the East, comprising more than eighty factories capitalised at £12,000,000 or over 16 crores of rupees, employs over 300,000 men, women and children. They produce nearly 700,000,000 bags, 1,100,000,000 yards of hessian, valued at £28,000,000 (nearly 40 crores of rupees). The number of cotton mills, by far the largest industry in India, exceeds 270, and capital invested in them is about £16,000,000 sterling, or about 22 crores. More than 90 per cent. of shareholders of cotton mills and 50 per cent. of jute mills are Indians; about 4 lacs, including 50,000 women and 24,000 children, are employed in these cotton mills, and they produce about 700,000,000 pounds of cloth. Commercial agriculture or agricultural industry employs something like 71,000,000 persons, including smallholders, farm servants, field labourers, and workers in organised plantations, viz: tea, coffee, indigo, and cinchona. The tea industry, in which more than £12,000,000 sterling (about 16 crores of rupees) is invested is the most important in India from the workers' point of view, as it employs more than 1,000,000 persons, including a very large number of women and children. Railways, however, employ very large number of hands, viz: 800,000, as many as in Great Britain and Ireland. River, road, telegraph and telephone services employ 1,000,000 Indians and Anglo-Indians. There are about 200,000 miners employed in coal mines in Bengal, Behar and elsewhere, and they produce 21,000,000 tons of coal, as against Belgium's production of 22,750,000 and Japan's 28,000,000. An Indian collier's efficiency may be judged by the fact that he wins on an average 188 tons of coal a year, whereas a Japanese miner raises only 96 tons, a Belgian, noted for his mining skill, 130 tons, a British miner 196 tons a year. Coal is worked almost everywhere on piece rate. A comparison of wages in India and abroad would be interesting. An Indian collier is paid about 1 rupee (or about eighteen-pence per ton), calculated on ten annas or a little less than a shilling per tub of coal cut and raised above ground. A Belgian is paid at least eight times, a Japanese five times, and a British miner more than twelve times. Marine transport finds employment for 141,000 Lascars, whereas Japan, Germany, Italy and France employ 137,000, 11,000, 60,000 and 44,000 marine workers, respectively. India, therefore, ranks very high so far as shipping employment goes. Metal industries, including iron and steel works, arsenal, arms factories and engineering works, employ about 170,000 hands, besides a few hundred thousand employed in chemical products, food industries, leather, building, gas and electric works. At the lowest estimate, over 12,000,000 workers are employed in organised industries in India and support a non-agricultural population of 00,000,000.*

These 12,000,000 workers—Hindus, Moslems, Sikhs, Christians, Anglo-Indians, including a large number belonging to the backward and depressed classes—earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, and a large majority of them strained their last ounce of energy to produce arms, ammunitions and goods for the successful prosecution of the last war. They have their own peculiar problems, very different from those of their compatriots clamouring for political power. It is true that they are protected to some extent by industrial legislations, viz: the Indian Factories Act, Indian Mines Act, Assam Labour Act, Workmen's Compensation Act, the Indian Trade Unions Act; but these Statutes passed recently have only conceded them their elementary rights enjoyed by workers in other civilised countries for many many years.

A vast majority of our industrial workers have been kept ignorant of letters, and their moral and material progress has been indeed very slow, on this account alone, viz: illiteracy. This Union quotes from "India's Working Classes and their Problems," written by Mr. K. C. Roy Chowdhury, Labour Member, Bengal Legislative Council, and a delegate to the Fifth International Labour Conference, by far the greatest living authority on Indian labour. Speaking of the Sonthal and Baurie Coal Miners of Bengal and Behar, drawn from the most backward classes, amongst whom (unlike other industrial workers) not even 1 in 500 is primarily educated, Mr. Roy Chowdhury says: "It is a notorious fact in the coal industry that a Sonthal or a Baurie miner and his wife work rather leisurely to earn just enough to pay for their scanty food and clothes and their favourite intoxicant, Pachwai, a kind of spirit made from rice. The drink evil is playing havoc with the energy of one of the best sections of our industrial workers of India, namely, coal miners, and is not infrequently encouraged by the mine owners, who allege that drink is an incentive to work harder and earn more money. The depravity and economic subjection of the coal workers are without a parallel in any other industries in British India, and a good deal of their degradation is due to the indifference of the Indian and European industrialists. It is not merely the low wages paid to the miners nor their bad housing, but callousness on the part of a large section of coal owners towards the welfare of their employees that brought about the sad state of affairs in the coalfields. Can anybody imagine greater depravity of human mind than the refusal of the present-day coal miner to work more than three days a week when he knows quite well that he will earn twice as much if he worked the full week of six days?" Coal mining has paid colossal profits in the past to Indian as well as British owners, and the District Boards, as well as the Mines Boards, have raised handsome cess and taxes; but no serious thought was ever given to the introduction of primary education or the elimination of the drink evil, and no one ever raised his finger against the rapid deterioration (morally, physically, and mentally) of mining labour. Destruction of home and family life due to employment of miners' wives underground has proceeded for the last three or four decades. The Government has only very recently realised its responsibility to check this by a prohibitory order.

Industrial figures given above should impress on the Commission the importance of India's working classes, and the necessity of giving them a definite share in shaping of the future administration of the country. Apart from the question of illiteracy and intemperance, housing and sanitation are of the utmost importance. Mr. Thomas Johnston, Labour M.P. for Dundee, who visited our jute mill area, said in his report: "Two-thirds of the workers in this industry, which makes 90 per cent. dividends for the shareholders, are housed in vile, filthy, disease-ridden hovels, called bustees." Mr. Arthur Purcell, Labour M.P. for Forest of Dean, accepted the invitation of our Union and visited Kanchrapara in December, 1927, and has equally and strongly condemned bad housing, overcrowding and insanitation in industrial areas.

Still another millstone round the neck of mill hands and miners—in fact, each and every wage-earner, is the scourge of Usury. Industrial and mining settlements are infested with Afghan money-lenders, who exact a minimum interest of 150 per cent. on small loans, and squeeze the life's-blood of workers if they fail to repay. This Union knows of several cases where twenty to thirty rupees were realised on unpaid principal of ten rupees. At the lowest estimate, 300,000 jute mill operatives pay at least 5 lacs of rupees (about £40,000 sterling) in interest alone. It is perfectly true that we have a wonderful co-operative credit organisation in Bengal with over ten thousand societies and 500,000 members and six crores (about £4,000,000 sterling) as working capital. These are mostly agricultural societies and do not in the least benefit industrial workers. There is hardly a single co-operative society for distribution of foodstuffs or clothes in the industrial area of Bengal. Workers are fleeced right and left by grocers who supply bad foodstuffs, give short-weights and charge high prices. No serious thought was given, either by the Co-operative Department of the Government or the Employers or the Mill Municipalities or any public bodies to help the helpless workers who produce the wealth of the country, to start credit societies, co-operative stores or co-operative housing.

Industrial workers excepting on Government and Railway Services hardly participate in any provident or benefit funds, or insurance schemes. There is no such thing in this country as death or sick benefit and unemployment benefit or any kind of dividing funds. The result is that if a bread-winner of a family falls ill for a few weeks, the trinkets and pans and pots of that family go to the pawnshops and if he dies the widow and children swell the ranks of India's wonderful beggar battalions. These schemes of benefits and insurance are no doubt within the scope of labour unions, but unfortunately these unions are very slow in coming, and those that exist with some exceptions are more or less innocent of all constructive plans. The predominating idea among educated organisers of trade unions, with some honourable exceptions, is strife or fight with employers on any excuse and to disturb in the language of the Montagu Report "the placid contentment of workers." What has taken more than three-fourths of a century for the British trade unionists to achieve, namely political power, through the British Labour Party, our Indian Trade Union Congress, founded by prominent politicians in 1920 with not even fifty strong Unions at its back, and a membership of 100,000 out of several million workers, wants ec dum or at once. Destructive politics has become the cry of the bosses of these unions, and all sorts of people from an aristocrat to a school master are competing to capture this baby congress and to use it as a tool to grind political axes. Take, for example, the fantastic resolution passed at the Cawnpore sitting of the All-India Trade Union Congress in November, 1927, viz., Boycott of the Statutory Commission at the instance of prominent politicians having little or nothing to do with labour. This union assures every member of the Commission that not even one out of 100,000 industrial workers knows anything about this resolution or its purport. Royal Commission is absolutely Dutch to them. In fact when the vice-president of this union mentioned Simon Commission to members of Barabazar Labour Union, of which he is the secretary, a prominent worker stood up and inquired, "What summons is this?" He thought it was a summons from a court. He could not with best efforts explain to his comrades what this Simon Commission was, excepting to half a dozen semi-literate members. Such is the unfortunate ignorance of our workers in whose name and on whose behalf the mysterious resolution of the Labour Congress was passed. All over the world Trade Union Congress or Federation does not precede but follows growth of unions, but unfortunately in this country the cart was and is often placed before the horse, and the Congress was ushered in before the advent of many unions. The Congress, besides helping Labour M.P.'s and foreign communists to go about studying labour conditions in India and passing fancy resolutions, functions as a splendid agency for a trip or delegation of many of its patrons to Switzerland to attend Labour Conferences at Geneva. The Government of India, prior to 1924, ignored all recommendations of this body and chose best labour delegates for Geneva, e.g., Messrs. Joshi and Roy Chowdhury and others in agreement with most representative labour organisations, but found itself in a tight corner in 1924, and was obliged to recognise the agency and to accept its recommendations in selecting delegates and advisors, partly on political grounds. The result was that since 1924, political barristers and pleaders, including our late lamented leader Lala Lajpat Rai, were nominated delegates. This Union believes that if the Government withdraws its recognition of this agency the Congress will collapse.

The Trade Union Congress at a special sitting considered representation of labour in legislatures, and prepared a scheme that the Congress should be treated as a special constituency like the Chamber of Commerce and allowed to return 12 members to the Legislative Assembly, and its Provincial Committees, or Federations, should be likewise treated as special constituencies for Provincial Councils and return 12 members for Bengal, Bombay and Madras each, 8 for Behar and Orissa, United Provinces, the Punjab and Burma, and 6 for Central Provinces and Assam, and its claims are based on the ground that employers have 20 seats in the Central Legislatures and 15 seats in Bengal Council, viz., Bengal Chamber of Commerce 6, Indian Jute Mills Association 2, Indian Tea Association 1, Indian Mining Association 1, Calcutta Trades Association 1, Bengal National Chamber of Commerce 2, Bengal Marwari Association, Bengal Mahajan (Merchants) Sabha 1. The Union agrees with the principle that Labour should no longer be represented by nominated seats either at Delhi or in Provinces, although it is admitted on all hands that Government nominees, like Mr. K. C. Roy Chowdhury in the Bengal Legislative Council, have rendered unique services to the cause of labour; but times are fast changing and Government nominees in spite of their brilliant record of services inside the Council Chambers, as well as among workers, are looked upon with a certain amount of disfavour by political leaders, who use the procedure of appointment by Government as a handle to decry and disparage Government nominees on the belief that the nominees must always vote with the Government. This belief is ill-founded, for Mr. N. M. Joshi, the Government nominee, has voted against Government on a score of divisions, and Mr. K. C. Roy Chowdhury, in Bengal, defeated the Government on several occasions and carried his labour resolutions in the teeth of Government opposition.

Indian workers with their multifarious problems of education, housing, sanitation, cheap credit facilities, insurance, minimum wages, old age pension, training or apprenticeship, shorter working hours, and better wages are deeply interested in self-government, but the present political cry among educated classes who are far outnumbered by the working classes, viz., substitution of the white bureaucracy by the brown bureaucracy, does not appeal to them. We all know that protection of Indian masses is one of the main justifications of the British rule in India, and unless and until our political leaders, who often speak in the name of the common people, justify their claim to stand by the millions of workers, who are hitherto treated and described as chotolokes (humble folks), coolies (mean labourers) by members of middle and upper classes, we must demand and secure our own political protection. History often repeats itself. In 1931,

India is to have a revised constitution. In 1831, wealthy Whigs in Britain, who made money out of great industrial development, agitated for the Reform Bill, and workers were assured that the reform would ensure self-government for them. The Bill was passed with the help of common people, but the common people had to wait more than 50 years to get real self-government. We want to benefit by that experience, and avoid the mistake of trusting influential politicians. Nothing short of adult suffrage would really enfranchise the working classes, but, unfortunately, their illiteracy and hopeless economic position and indebtedness, as well as their subjection to landlords in their village homes and employers in towns and up country, will not afford them a fair chance to exercise their franchise freely in their own real interest. In short, employers, landlords and professional politicians and money-lenders will exploit them and for several years to come will dictate to them for whom to vote. Therefore, adult suffrage is unthinkable in face of widespread illiteracy and vastness of population (60,000,000 would be eligible to vote as against about 6,000,000 voters on the electoral roll.)

Recommendations. (a) Local self-governing bodies being the initial training ground for responsible government, and as these bodies are responsible for sanitation, housing and pure foodstuffs the Union strongly recommends that franchise be lowered to a minimum in municipalities, in mill and industrial areas, where elections are held, or in the alternative special electorates for representation of workers where there is no election and adequate number of seats be earmarked for labour representatives. It is perfectly scandalous that there is no such thing as election of Commissioners or Councillors in most of our jute mill municipalities, and they are appointed by the Government. Take, for example, the municipality of Bhatpara, 22 miles from Calcutta on the river recently visited by His Excellency Sir Stanley Jackson, on the invitation of Kankinara Labour Union—number of jute mills within the municipal area, 12; with 8,825 looms employing about 50,000 mill hands who receive about Rs. 10 lakhs as wages every month; total population about 67,000; income from taxes, etc., Rs. 1,25,000, of which Rs. 50,000 is paid by mill hands as house and latrine tax. There are 19 seats on the municipality. The Government have appointed 10 European mill managers, 8 educated Rai Bahadurs, doctors and landlords and only one Moslem connected with a jute mill, and have forgotten the claims of workers. Bhatpara, being the origin of the factory labour movement of Bengal, was visited by Socialist members of Parliament who came to India, including Messrs. (now Sir) Oswald Mosley, Pethick Lawrence, Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, T. Mardy Jones, Tom Johnston and Arthur Purcell. They have unanimously condemned the insanitary condition of the municipal area. Mr. Tom Johnston, M.P., who visited Bhatpara in November, 1925, described the workers' dwellings known as bustees as "vile, filthy, disease-ridden dung heaps" in his report to Dundee Textile Workers Union.

(b) As the growth of a sense of responsibility is dependent on the spread of primary education, the municipalities in industrial areas should be empowered to levy a special levy on employers for education of workers' children. The principle of taxing employers for the benefit of employees is justified in India on the ground that, with some honourable exceptions, industrialists reap rich harvests owing to cheap labour (the shareholders of jute mills have received on an average 80% dividends for the last 10 or 12 years) and are reluctant to spend any money in industrial welfare work as they do in America, Britain and elsewhere. Secondly, Indian industrialists often complain of want of efficiency on the part of workers, and do not realise that illiteracy is the main cause of inefficiency, and they must bear a portion of cost of education of their employees' children.

Provincial Legislatures. (a) The Union does not urge any extension of the present franchise, as a fair trial has not been given to many thousands of the existing illiterate and semi-literate voters to acquire political education or appraise the value of the vote.

(b) The Union is not convinced of the necessity of scrapping communal electorates, but recommends the formation of additional special constituencies for working and depressed classes, who are practically in the same boat as political privileges go. Protection of workers' interest in the present state of affairs will be secured if at least six seats are allotted to representatives of labour in Bengal Legislative Council, representing a special labour electorate to consist of members on the Register of Trade Unions registered in Bengal under the Indian Trade Unions Act passed in 1926, with almost unanimous approval of trade unions in India. The Trade Union Congress according to its resolutions wants to be recognised as a special constituency on the same ground as Bengal Chamber of Commerce is made a special electorate for Industry and Commerce. However, the history of the two different institutions differs. One is over 75 years old and is still going strong, and inspires the confidence of not only the mercantile community but the general public as well for straight dealings and strong fight on behalf of its constituents. This cannot be said of the new-born Trade Union Congress, which is financially very poor (Statement of Account for 1927 shows a receipt of Rs570, as affiliation fees, and a credit balance of Rs55/12/6). It handles Moscow money for legal defence of Communist agents in India. It directs political action (demand for release of political prisoners, boycott of Simon Commission, approval of the movement of workers and peasants of China for political emancipation, election of Pandit Jahwarlal Nehru, promoter of Independence League as President of the Trade Union Congress at Jheria sitting, affiliation of the Congress with the League against Imperialism, adoption of the resolution, viz., Socialistic Republic for India), without consulting constituents whose interest in high politics is very remote indeed. Mahatma Gandhi, who roused mass consciousness in India, is almost worshipped by workers throughout the country, withheld his permission to affiliate the Textile Workers' Unions of Ahmedabad (by far the best organised and most prosperous labour organisation in India) to the All-India Trade Union Congress. The Congress affiliates any union (real or nominal) on receipt of Rs10/-. Apart from its political aspects the constitution of this Congress is such that a few designing persons, creating a score of paper unions in the course of a day or a week, can capture the Congress lock, barrel and stock, and declare in the name of Labour that all Indian workers favour Communism and broadcast its declaration all over the world. Registered Trade Unions are normally treated as bona-fide unions, for the Act provides that no union shall be registered unless it has a written constitution in accordance with the provisions of the Act, viz., the objects of the union—purpose for which funds shall be applied—maintenance of a list of members and facilities for the inspection of books and registers, audit of accounts, and admission of ordinary members who shall be actual workers, plus a modicum of honorary members who may be outsiders, but the most wholesome section of the Act to avoid political exploitation of labour is section 22, viz., that no less than one half of the total number of the officers of every registered Trade Union shall be persons actually engaged or employed in an industry with which the Trade Union is connected. There is no such rule of the Trade Union Congress which has in its present Executive Committee a president, all the vice-presidents, the general secretary, and practically ninety per cent. of its members are outsiders and not connected with any industry.

Central Legislatures. The Union recommends the abolition of direct election to the Legislative Assembly, and favours indirect election by provincial Legislatures and recognised public bodies representing land-holders, depressed classes, labour, capital and other interests. Labour in the opinion of this Union should continue to be a central subject, and all laws affecting it should be acts of the Central Legislature where labour should be adequately represented. The Union recommends that at least four seats to be alloted to representatives of Bengal Labour in the Assembly, and one in the Council of State. The electorate should be a special one and should consist of office bearers of all registered trade unions. Some device should be made so that each of these five representatives is associated with labour in the principal industries of Bengal, viz., jute, coal, shipping, railways, and tea.

Provincial Government. The Union favours grant of full responsible Government to the Provinces without any reservation of Law and Order. In fact past activities of police during many strikes and lockouts have created strong suspicions in workers' minds that the members of the police force took sides with employers and their actions were not often bona-fide. Hence the necessity of keeping police under the control of a responsible minister. The Union favours the establishment of Second Chambers in the Provinces.

Central Govcrnment. The Union does not favour any change. It urges, however, strengthening of Viceroy's Executive Council which should include at least three elected members of the Assembly. Grant of responsibility in the Central Government will not be conducive to the welfare of the labouring classes as long as the present system of social inequity continues. Men of leading and light are still very slow in appreciating dignity of manual labour which is not only treated as merchandise but considered as not worthy of its hire. Our social system is such that manual workers or producers of national wealth are ranked as members of lower order of human beings. Until and unless this old order changeth, the Indian workers feel very strongly that any large transfer of power from British bureaucracy to brown oligarchy will only strengthen the hold of classes over masses.

CALCUTTA.

24th January, 1929.

PRESENT :

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION (EXCEPT SIR JOHN SIMON), OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT SARDAR SHIVDEV SINGH UBEROI) AND OF THE BENGAL PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the Kanchrapara Railway Workmen's Union.

The deputation consisted of :—

Mr. B. C. MANDAL (Vice-President).
Mr. LATAFAT HOSSAIN, M.L.C. (Vice-President).
Mr. SINGESWAR P. SHA, Member, Executive Committee.
Mr. P. B. SUR (Secretary).
Mr. G. N. KURMI (General Secretary).

105. The Chairman (Lord Burnham) : You represent the Kanchrapara Railway Workmen's Union, which is registered under the Trades Unions Act, and which was founded in 1927 ?—(Mr. Mandal) Yes.

106. And its object is the betterment of the conditions of the employees of the railway carriage and wagon shops at Kanchrapara ?—Yes.

* * * * * * * *

107. Mr. Hartshorn : I would like first of all to ascertain what is the membership of the organisation which you represent here to-day ?—It is 1,600. This is only the Kanchrapara Railway Workmen's Union.

108. That union has a membership of 1,600 ?—Yes.

109. Yes ?—But we have got members from other unions also.

110. I gather from your memorandum that you hold the view there are bona fide trade unions in India, and there are also bogus trade unions ?—Yes.

111. I should like to know whether there are other unions you can mention which you regard as bona fide ?—Yes. I can give you the names. There is the Bengal Mariners' Union——

112. And there is a union for the jute mills ?—Yes, and it is called Kankinara Labour Union.

113. What is the membership of that organisation ?—5,000.

114. Is there a Clerks' Union in Calcutta ?—Yes.

115. How many members have they ?—About 1,000. I am a member of that union also.

116. Is there a printing trade organisation ?—Yes.

117. It is called the Press Employees' Union, I think ?—Yes.

118. What is the membership of that ?—I have not the figure for that.

119. What about the Bengal Mariners' Union ?—Yes, that is a proper union.

120. What is the membership of that ?—About 2,000.

121. Have the Corporation workers a union ?—Yes. They have got about 1,500 members.

122. They have a union with a membership of about 1,500 ?—Yes.

123. What about the Calcutta Tramwaymen's Union ? What is the membership of that ?—That is also a good, registered union, but I cannot tell you the exact number of members. It may be about 1,000.

124. But you do not know ? Have the Registration Office employees got a union ?—Yes. That is also a good union.

125. Do you know the membership of that ?—Yes, about 500.

126. Have the scavengers got a union ?—Yes.

127. What is the membership of that organisation ?—That is a big union, with about 3,000 members.

128. Now, would you say of all these unions that they are bona fide trade unions ?—Yes.

129. The whole of those that have been mentioned ? —Yes.

130. Sir Arthur Froom : Are they all registered ? —All those are not registered ; only nine are registered.

131. Mr. Hartshorn : I will come to that in a minute or two, but first of all I should like to know whether the Memorandum which you have submitted to the Commission has been submitted to the membership of your union ?—It was explained to the members. The Memorandum was drafted beforehand, and at a meeting it was explained to the members in Hindi, Bengali and Urdu.

132. And they agreed that this Memorandum represented their views ?—Yes.

133. I should like to ask a few questions on the Memorandum. I notice in the first place you emphasise the importance of the great industries and public services in India ?—Yes.

134. You say the Indian railways have a larger mileage than the railways in England ?—Yes.

135. And that about 800,000 workpeople are employed on them ?—Yes.

136. You say the jute industry has about eighty factories with twelve millions of capital, and employs about 300,000 workpeople ?—Yes.

137. And that the cotton mills are more than 270 in number, that the capital invested in them is about sixteen millions, and that they employ, I think, about 400,000 people—4 lakhs ?—Yes.

138. Then you deal with the tea industry, and you say that in that industry about a million workpeople are employed ?—Yes.

139. You say about 200,000 are employed in the mines, about a million in river, road, telegraph and telephone services, about 141,000 in marine transport, and so on ?—Yes.

140. Having emphasised the importance and magnitude of these great undertakings, you say the millions of workers employed in these great undertakings have their own peculiar problems, very different from those of their compatriots who are clamouring for political power ?—Yes.

141. And you suggest that these workers, organised in their trade unions, should be treated separately and apart from such political organisations as have been built up in India ?—Yes.

142. That is your general contention, is not it ?—Yes.

143. I am very interested in what you say about the Trade Union Congress in India. I notice you say the Indian Trade Union Congress was founded by prominent politicians in 1920, with not even twenty strong unions at their back, with a membership of 100,000 of several million workers, and that they want the millennium ek dum, which, I think, means at once ?—Yes.

144. They want everything at once ?—Yes.

145. Then you go on to say that destructive politics has become the cry of the bosses of these unions, and all sorts of people, from an aristocrat to a schoolmaster, are competing to capture this baby congress to use it as a tool to grind their political axes. You give as an example the " fantastic resolution " passed at Cawnpore at the Indian Trade Union Congress in November, the resolution for the boycott of the Simon Commission. You say that this was passed at the instance of prominent politicians having little or nothing to do with labour, and that your union assures every member of the Commission that not even one out of the hundred thousand industrial workers knows anything about the resolution or its purport ?—Yes, that is quite true.

146. That is your idea of the contract of the political heads of the Trade Union Congress. Then you go on to point out that under the Trade Union Act, which was passed, I think, in 1926 and came into operation, I believe, in June, 1927, only bona fide trade unions which have submitted their rules to the registrar and which have been approved by the registrar can be registered at all ?—Yes.

147. And that the Act provides that all such bona fide registered trade unions shall set forth the objects for which they have been formed, the purpose for which they have collected funds and the purposes to which those funds are to be applied, and that the registrar is to have facilities for examining the books and accounts of the trade unions, and that in each case the union must render to the registrar a return of the membership and of the officials connected with the organisation ?—Yes.

148. The Trade Union Act, I think, lays it down, as you point out in your Memorandum, that the officials of a registered trade union must consist of at least fifty per cent. workers employed in the trade ?—Yes.

149. You say that in the Trade Union Congress no such rule or regulation applies ?—That is the fact.

150. That is what you say, and when you urge that the trade unions should be used as a separate electorate for the purposes of securing representation for organised workers, you say it is the registered trade unions which should be accepted as the unit ? —Yes.

151. And not the Trade Union Congress ?—That is so.

152. I notice you say on page 160 that a special sitting of the Trade Union Congress considered the representation of labour in the legislature and prepared a scheme by which the Congress would be treated as a special constituency ? —Yes.

153. Like the Chamber of Commerce ?—Yes.

154. And that they should elect 12 members to the Legislative Assembly, and that the provincial committees or federations should likewise be treated as special constituencies for the provincial councils, and should return 12 members in Bengal, Bombay and Madras, 8 in Bihar and Orissa, the United Provinces, the Punjab and Burma, and 6 in the Central Provinces and Assam, these claims being based on the fact that the employers have 20 seats in the Central Legislature and 15, for example, in the Bengal council ; and you enumerate the employers organisations which have those seats ?—Yes.

155. While you seem to agree it is right that labour should have representation as such, just as the employers through their organisations are directly represented, you think the proper way to get that representation is not through the Trade Union Congress, but in each of the provinces through the registered trade union organisations. I think that is the position you are putting up, is not it ?—Yes.

156. Coming to your recommendations, you deal first of all with local self-governing bodies ?—Yes.

157. You regard them as a training ground for responsible government ?—Yes.

158. You say they deal with sanitation, housing, pure foodstuffs, etc., and you say that for municipalities, you strongly urge that there should be a lowering of the franchise qualification ?—Yes.

159. Or if the franchise is not so lowered as to ensure the return of a number of labour members, then you say you ought to have some representation by nomination. I think that is what you are asking for in the case of municipalities, is it not ?—Yes, but we do not want nomination ; we say that the franchise should be lowered, and that in municipal areas where election is not practicable members of unions should be nominated if such union exists, or in any case representatives of labour should be appointed.

160. Let me just read it: " . . . the union " strongly recommends that franchise be lowered " to a minimum in municipalities, in mill and " industrial areas, where elections are held or in the " alternative special electorates for representation " of workers where there is no election and adequate " number of seats be earmarked for labour representa- " tives." Then you point out that on some of these municipal boards the whole of the seats are given to the employers, and no consideration is given at all to the working classes and no representation is given to them and you think that is very unfair and ought to be altered ?—Yes.

161. When you come to the provincial legislature you suggest that at least six seats should be alloted to representatives of labour in the Bengal legislative council, and that those should be elected by a special electorate consisting of members on the register of trade unions registered in Bengal under the Indian Trade Unions Act. So that what you are asking in local self-government is that the franchise should be reduced substantially and such arrangements shall be made as will ensure labour representation on the municipal boards. In the provincial council you say that you should have the right to elect by a special electorate at least six members ?—Yes.

162. I would just like to ask you what you say about the Trade Union Congress. You say that "It handles Moscow money for legal defence of "Communist agents in India." What foundation have you in making that statement ?—Yes, it has been the fact. It was done in defending Mr. Spratt in Bombay Court. We have also seen, when there was a strike, some of the Communist strike leaders here asking the Moscow people to send money.

163. But have you seen in any official document emanating from the Trade Union Congress that they have received cash from Moscow ?—Yes, sir. It is published in their statement of accounts for 1927.

164. What documents have you seen that in ?—Will it be proper, sir, to mention the name of the gentlemen who received the money ?

145. No, I do not want you to mention the name. I only want to know whether this statement is well-founded ?—Yes. During the labour strike in the district of Howrah which continued for about six months or so, the strike leader asked the Moscow people to send money and the money was actually sent and received by him. The Government is aware of this fact, and also of course the bank which received instruction for the payment of money and paid the money.

166. You make some remarkable statements here about the manner in which some of these organisations have been built up within a few days; they get together people who have nothing at all to do with the working classes ?—Quite so, in some cases. People who have nothing to do with the working classes become leaders of labour movements in order to earn cheap notoriety. There are some lawyers and pleaders who actually do not get many clients and want to get their names advertised. It is very easy to catch hold of labourers and to foment strikes and thus get the fomenters' names advertised. There is another class of people in India who foment strikes for political purposes. In short, the labourers are being exploited here by three classes of people, namely, the politician, the lawyer and the Geneva-going class, by which I mean that some think that by associating with labour movements and Trade Union Congress they will have the chance of being recommended by the Congress and selected as a delegate for the International Labour Conference at Geneva. This means a trip to Europe at Government cost and excellent personal advertisement for the delegate. This, in my opinion, is the chief attraction of the Congress and objective of many who patronise the Congress.

167. You say somewhere in your Memorandum that some of these organisations spring up like mushrooms in the night, and having formed a nominal trade union they then affiliate to the Congress and apply to the Government through the Trade Union Congress to nominate a man to represent them at the Geneva Conference ?—Yes, sir. For instance when it was decided to start the Trade Union Congress, the organisers sent letters to different parts of India, asking their friends to start labour unions with different names. It is very easy to start these unions because they do not require any registration under the Trade Unions Act. In your tour throughout the length and breadth of the country you will find out that the labourers are quite ignorant people, they do not understand what politics is and they do not clamour for political power. What they want is good housing, good sanitation, better wages and death and other benefits.

168. That is to say the workers are less concerned about the questions of high politics than they are about their own social conditions ?—Yes.

169. And you say that the politicians who use the labour movement are not dealing with the social conditions of the workers as they should, and therefore you suggest in your Memorandum that there should be set up bona fide trade unions throughout the country, consisting of men drawn from the ranks of the workers themselves and registered on the basis of the Trade Unions Act, and that when you have such a genuine representation of labour those organisations ought to be used as an electorate for sending labour representatives to the provincial council and to the municipal boards ?—Yes. Exactly so.

170. When we come to the Central Legislature you suggest that these labour unions should be allowed to send four members to the Legislative Assembly and one to the Council of State ?—Yes.

171. I think the Act only came into operation about eighteen months ago and I think it is true—is it not ?—that a number of unions have applied for affiliation, but because their rules do not comply with the requirements of the Act time has been taken to bring them into harmony with those provisions ?—Yes.

172. And that a number of these unions that you have mentioned which have not yet become registered are taking the necessary steps to become registered organisations and comply with the requirements of the 1926 Act ?—Yes.

173. On the constitutional issue I notice you say that because you recommend the setting up of a special electorate for labour you do not suggest the lowering of the franchise for the purpose of election to the provincial council ?—Yes.

174. And in the case of the Central Government you suggest that things should be left as they are, except that the Viceroy's council should contain three members drawn from the elected members of the Assembly ?—Yes.

175. Lord Strathcona: In your Memorandum, under the subject of Law and Order, you say that you are against reservation of Law and Order and remark that the activities of the police "have "created strong suspicions in workers' minds that "the members of the police force took sides with "employers . . ." I wish you just to explain what you mean when you say that the police took sides with employers ?—For example, during the Lilloah strike and the Bowrea jute mill strike, it has been found that the police took sides with the capitalists and took instructions from them in shooting workers.

176. Why should the police take sides ? All they have to do is to ensure the proper keeping of law and order ?—It is the general conviction of the labourers as a whole that the police took sides with the capitalists and did injustice to the cause of the labourers by illegal arrest and harassing prosecution of strikers.

177. Can you give me an instance how they did injustice ? I do not see how the police can take sides ?—Instead of trying to restore peace and order they all of a sudden gave orders for firing in Bamangachi during the strike of railway workmen at Lilloah six months ago.

178. Presumably there was some reason for doing that. The job of the police is to keep law and order.—It is expected that the police should take such measures as would ensure peace during strikes and as would settle the disputes, but instead of doing so it is believed by labourers as a whole that the police took side with the capitalists and did such things which were not expected of them.

179. I do not like to press it. In England it is always assumed that the job of the police in labour disputes is merely to preserve law and order. If people are destroying houses or shops the police come forward; otherwise they have nothing to do with industrial disputes. What I want to know is how you think you can guard against this danger by keeping the police under the control of a responsible minister?—If the department of Law and Order were under a minister, we might easily approach him and tell him "Well, sir, if your police harass or "terrorise the labourers in their difficulty we will "pass a vote of censure against you."

180. Major Atlee: Are you workers very much in the hands of the moneylenders?—Yes, sir, we are. The ordinary rate of interest is as much as two annas per rupee per month. The Afghan moneylenders come here and exploit our labourers.

181. Have you tried to start co-operative societies at all among yourselves?—We are trying to organise a co-operative credit society within the area of our union.

182. Since when?—We do not get any backing from the Government.

183. Why do you want any backing from Government? It is a co-operative body and you yourselves can organise it. I do not quite see why your workers should be in the hands of the moneylenders?—Because they are not educated, and besides that they are getting small wages. The amount they get as their wages is very small and they can hardly afford to educate their children, and that is why they are compelled to live in a very bad condition. As regards labourers working in mines, they are very ignorant and the capitalists treat them in such a way that they are given to drinking.

184. There are jute workers there?—Yes.

185. They do as a matter of fact somehow save money and send the savings home. There must be some who save money. Why can you not manage to run a co-operative society?—These people are illiterate and the idea of co-operative society is not fully developed in India.

186. You are trying to get them?—We shall try to do it. Unless some education is given to the labourers, it is difficult to convince them of anything new.

187. But the farmers are managing it. Co-operative societies are spread very largely in the rural areas among the agriculturalists?—But the condition of agriculturalists is somewhat better than that of the labourers.

188. I should think that where you have got people in a mass you could get these things more easily than when you have got people spread in villages?

Sir Sankaran Nair: The agriculturalists are given greater facilities.

189. Lord Burnham: Do you know any industry except agriculture where there has been any co-operative society?—No, I am not aware of it excepting in isolated cases.

Sir Arthur Froom: There are some in the railway; for instance, the Great Indian Peninsula Railway.

190. Lord Burnham: In Bengal?—No, not in Bengal excepting perhaps a railway.

191. Major Atlee: How often does your union meet?—It meets almost every month.

192. You have discussions and so on?—Yes. We regularly convene meetings, where discussions take place and we also keep records of the proceedings.

193. Do your members take any intelligent interest in the affairs of the union?—Yes.

194. Do you think they will be intelligent enough to use the vote if they get it?—Under the present circumstances the union does not think it possible that, even if the franchise be extended, the members will be able to use their franchise properly and with caution in respect of the provincial council and the Central Legislature.

195. But you suggest the formation of special labour constituencies so that the labour representatives on the council should no longer be nominated to represent the trade unions. Do you not mean that the representative should be elected by the members of the union?—Yes.

196. Nominated by Government?—No. What we have suggested is that the representatives should be elected by the office bearers of the unions. The office bearers of all the unions registered under the Trades Union Act will form a constituency and they will elect the candidates for the Assembly.

197. That is a very restricted franchise?—Yes. The unions will elect members to the provincial council and members of the executive committee of the unions and those office bearers will in their turn elect four members to the Assembly and one to the Council of State. That is what we have stated.

198. How is the office bearer of the union chosen?—The office bearers are elected in the general annual meeting.

199. Where does it take place?—A public announcement is made one month before. Sometimes it is declared by notification and sometimes by beat of drums. The meeting is held and the president and other office bearers are elected.

200. How? It is by show of hands?—Yes.

201. Your suggestion is that there should be a primary election by show of hands of the office bearers of the union and these officers have to choose their representatives?—Yes.

202. You have only nine registered trade unions?—Yes.

203. How many office bearers are there in each union?—About ten.

204. That will give a constituency of 90. It is very small?—Yes.

205. It is putting very much power in the hands of these people, is it not?—I think there are at present nine unions. Later on if you say that all the registered trade unions will have right to vote and elect their own men to the council, then there will be 100 unions registered under the Act.

206. I want to know whether you are putting forward a sound proposition. A union with ten members will be in the same position as a union with 1,000 members with regard to the vote?—Yes. The ordinary members have got vague ideas of politics and things of that sort. The office bearers have got some sort of education. That is why we recommend that the office bearers should exercise the vote for election of members of Central Legislatures.

207. Sir Arthur Froom: How many members are there in your union?—1,600.

208. What is the subscription?—One rupee per annum per head.

209. Do they all pay?—Yes.

210. So your income is Rs1,600 a year?—Yes.

211. Supposing a member does not pay. Have you had any instance of your members not paying?—No. They never refuse to pay excepting in very special cases.

212. What position do you hold in the railway?—I work in a commercial body in Calcutta.

213. You are a clerk in Calcutta?—Yes. I am the vice-president of the union.

214. And the rest of the gentlemen?—Messrs. Sur and Kurmi are carpenters in the railway workshop. Mr. Sur is the secretary of the union. Mr. Latafat Hossain, M.L.C., is also a vice-president. He is a babu in a jute mill, that is the assistant in charge of the labourers.

215. Is there any other union in the Eastern Bengal Railway?—There is the Eastern Bengal Railway Employees' Association. Our union represents the workers in the workshop and the other represents the clerks of the Eastern Bengal Railway. In our union we have got two outsiders, namely myself and our president, Mr. Roy Chaudhuri. The others are all actual workers.

216. Do you know whether there is any union in the East Indian Railway?—No. I am not aware. I think there is a union at Lilloah.

217. Do you know the size of that union ?—No.

218. Sir Abdelkerim Ghuznavi : You referred to the Kabul and Afghan moneylenders. Are the local moneylenders so bad as the others ? Do they charge high interest ?—The Afghan moneylenders take more interest than the local moneylenders.

219. What is the rate of interest generally ?—Two annas per month per rupee.

220. Mr. Travers : Do the remarks of yours in this Memorandum refer to other workers besides your own union, the general remarks about the condition of workers ?—Yes.

221. You say in your Memorandum, " There is no " such thing in this country as death or sick benefit " ? —Yes, there is no such thing.

222. Would you be surprised to hear that all labourers of a tea garden get full pay when they are ill ?—I am not aware of it.

223. They do, and they also get free medical attendance and a paid attendant ?—I am not aware of it.

224. Do you know on a tea garden advances are made by the manager to the labourer for marriage, for purchase of cattle and so on, free of any interest ? You are not aware of this ?—We have not heard anything like that.

225. Therefore the statement that you say that no such thing exists in this country is not quite true ? On the tea garden it is so ; they get the sick pay ?—We do not know that. There is no labour union in the tea gardens to keep us informed about these benefits.

226. Now, one remark about your labour representative. Would you be prepared, where there are no labour unions, to accept nomination for labour representatives on the Bengal Legislative Council ? For instance, in the tea industry there are no labour unions and the only method of representing them would be by nomination. Are you prepared to accept that ?—No, sir.

Memorandum submitted by the Country League.

The Country League. The Country League was initiated eighteen months ago and formally issued its Manifesto (copy of which is attached*) in June, 1928. It consists of 100 members, drawn from the Landed Aristocracy, and prominent Industrialists. It is non-sectarian and non-racial, and is an All-India body with provincial branches. Its membership for the present is strictly limited. It has been formed with the object (1) of placing the views of these classes on the political development of India before your Commission and (2) of securing for these classes greater political representation. The complete objects of the League are below. There have been in existence for many years Provincial Associations representing the Landed Classes, but there has been no All-India connection between such Associations, nor have they been able to adjust themselves to changed political conditions.

* * * * * * * *

Objects :—

(1) To safeguard the interests of its members, in the betterment and protection of their Landed, Commercial, Industrial and Agricultural possessions.

(2) To ventilate and focus the opinion of the League :—
By representation to Government, both Central and Provincial,
By representation in the legislatures,
By propaganda in the press, and by other means,

(3) To assist the Political Progress of India, by working constitutionally for such changes as may be necessary, and for the advancement of India to the goal of self-government within the British Empire.

(4) To select, train and assist Political Candidates, and party Agents.

(5) To support approved Associations.

(6) To promote the formation of Rural and District Associations.

(7) In safeguarding Minorities and promoting the welfare of the People, to work for the replacement of communal mistrust—by mutual confidence and communal goodwill.

(8) To assist fulfilment of the need for a Common Language and Common Script for the whole of India—without which " A Nation " cannot be formed.

India's Final Goal. Our members are in complete accord that the final goal of Indian Political Development is the realisation of Self-Government as an integral part of the British Commonwealth of Nations. We can visualise no future for India that does not maintain a close connection with the British Empire, and that does not make provision for a Federation of Indian States and British India. In so far as British India is concerned we do not, however, commit ourselves at this stage to the definite assertion that Self-Government in India must necessarily be of the responsible type of the British Constitution, and it is more than probable that the eventual Constitution evolved for India will vary considerably from the British model. There is, however, no denying the fact that the past close relations between Great Britain and India has implanted in Indians a desire for a Constitution based on British traditions, and that this should be of a responsible character. That being the case, we agree that this form of Government should, in the first instance, be given the fullest possible trial.

Local Self-Government. The training ground for the electorates as well as for the individual is primarily to be found in the work of Local Self-Governing bodies. The liberal powers which have, under the Reforms, been granted to these bodies should be continued and extended, and the franchise for them should be enlarged. It will be necessary for some time to come that the activities and work of these bodies should be watched over and controlled by higher authorities, which might well take the form of Local Self-Government Boards. These boards should have adequate powers to take over these bodies, should maladministration necessitate such action. There will always be necessity for the careful auditing of funds in their charge, and steps should be taken to bring home to the members of such bodies their financial responsibilities, by the introduction of a system of surcharge based on the British model.

Provincial Legislatures. Subject to the views of our members in each province, who have a particular knowledge of the conditions peculiar to their province, and whose views will be put forward in oral evidence, we favour a grant of full responsible Government to the provinces. We are, however, anxious that the undoubted risks accompanying such transfer of power should be minimised in so far as is, in our opinion, practical, and consider that, for the present, it would be wise to place the vital portion of Law and Order, that is, the maintenance of Armed (or Military) Police, the Criminal Investigation Department, and Dacoity Department, under the Central Government. We also think it necessary to make such provisions as may be required to give contentment to the British element, which, we believe, must be maintained, under the changes in Government hereby proposed. We therefore propose, should the transfer of power herein recommended be agreed to, that it should be made subject to the following safeguards :

(1) The Establishment of Second Chambers ;

(2) All Bills passed by the Provincial Legislatures shall require the assent of the Governor-General in Council ;

(3) That existing instructions to the Governor-General and Governors regarding legislation discriminating against any particular section or interest should be continued, and supplemented by Statutory safeguards.

Ministry. The Executive Council should be abolished, and replaced by a Ministry chosen from elected representatives. The power which a Governor now has to administer Transferred Subjects in the event of failure to form a Ministry, would need to be retained.

Franchise. We do not at present recommend any widening of the franchise. The Education of the existing electorate in our opinion requires further time before any increase is justifiable. We, however, recommend a complete examination of the composition of Legislative Councils, and Council of State, with a view to ensuring adequate proportionate representation for the various interests in the province. We are strongly of the opinion that Landed Interests and Commerce and Industry should be given increased representation. To-day the representation of these Interests in the various Legislatures is :—

We further strongly recommend a larger proportionate representation for Agricultural, Ex-Military, and Labour interests, and the Depressed Classes.

Central Legislature. We are generally of opinion that it is difficult to make any great advance in the Central Government until we are assured that the further transfer of power in the provinces has justified itself. We are of opinion that the Legislative Assembly was wrongly constituted in the first instance, and that the existing system of direct election has not ensured that sense of responsibility between a member and his constituents. This is in the main due to physical difficulties which could not be overcome without unduly enlarging the membership of the Central Legislature, which we cannot recommend at the present stage of development. We therefore favour a system of indirect election by Provincial Legislatures, and duly formed and accredited Associations representing different sectional interests.

The Viceroy's Executive Council. We are of opinion that no change in the Viceroy's Executive Council is desirable at the moment, but it appears to us that the system of selecting the Indian members of the Council justifies examination. For instance, the existing members of the Viceroy's Council to-day does not include any member of the Indian Aristocracy, and we have known instances when of late certain individuals were quite unfit for such a responsible position. In all cases we contend that such appointments should be made from the best material available of any race or creed.

General Considerations. If India's political development is to progress along sound lines, without undue risk of breakdown, we are strongly of the opinion that whatever changes are made in the Indian Constitution, it is essential to provide for the continuity of tradition and authority. The old order and the new must be reasonably blended, and we particularly direct the attention of your Commission to this point. It must be remembered that a large number of those individuals who have been in the past natural leaders have, for reasons which we need not enter into here, failed to adjust themselves to the changed system of Government and they should be given every opportunity to take that share in Government which their contemporaries have in England.

Minorities. All those who desire to see and encourage India's political development must regret communal and sectarian dissensions which are such an obstacle to rapid progress. We are convinced that these dissensions are largely due to the fear of minorities that their interests will not be adequately safeguarded under a democratic form of Government. It is the primary duty of all Governments to see that the legitimate interests of minorities are not trampled underfoot, and we trust that a purely Indian Government would be no less careful of minority interests than any other national Government. As far as we are concerned, we strongly recommend the provision of Statutory safeguards for all such interests, and we have no objection to these taking such form as minorities themselves may desire, provided always that the interests of the majority are not impinged upon, and that the national interests are not unduly subordinated.

Control of the British Parliament. The Government of India Act already allows scope for the relaxation of the powers of the Secretary of State for India, and evidence of such relaxation is forthcoming in the convention which has been established regarding fiscal matters. Further conventions on similar lines might be built up, but otherwise we do not, for the moment, suggest any alterations to the existing Act, other than those necessitated by the grant of Responsible Government to the Provinces.

Education. In our opinion the immediate need of the moment is a progressive policy in the training of Indians to fit them for the public service of India, and for training for the defence forces of India. We consider immediate steps should be taken to improve and increase educational facilities for this purpose.

Further, we are of opinion that much greater attention must be paid to Commercial and Technical Training. At the moment the very fact that a University Degree is required before entrance into the Government service, has led to the University literary degree being considered as the goal of all education. This particular qualification for Government service should be done away with, and the Government Examination should be made a sufficiently high standard without this.

The obstacles which have to be surmounted in the introduction of a satisfactory system of primary education are considerable. The provision of teachers, even on the totally inadequate salary now paid, is beyond the resources of Provincial Revenues. Steps must, however, be taken to surmount this obstacle, even at the cost of increased taxation. Our experience leads us to believe that a more rapid growth of primary education can only be secured by compulsion, and this will have to be carried out area by area. We fully realise, however, that the conservative customs of the country will make the task of School Inspectors called upon to inquire about the absence of children one of extreme delicacy.

Finally, we think it is convenient to summarise our recommendations.

SUMMARY.

1. Responsible Self-Government as an integral part of the British Commonwealth of Nations, should be given the fullest possible trial.

2. Powers already granted to Local Self-Governing Bodies should be continued and extended, and the franchise for them should be enlarged. Higher control by Local Self-Government Boards: and financial safeguards, e.g., a system of surcharge based on the British model should be introduced.

3. Full Responsible Government should be granted to the Provinces, except the vital portions of Law and Order, with these safeguards:—

(1) The Establishment of Second Chambers.
(2) Governor-General in Council's assent to all Bills passed by Provincial Legislatures.
(3) Existing safeguards against Legislation discriminating against any particular section or interest, should be supplemented by Statutory safeguards.

4. The Executive Council should be abolished, and should be replaced by a Ministry chosen from elected representatives. The existing power of a Governor to administer Transferred Subjects in the event of failure to form a Ministry should be retained.

5. A complete examination of the composition of Legislative Councils and Council of State should be made with the object of ensuring adequate representation for the various interests of the country, and the Landed Interests, Commerce and Industry, Agriculture, Ex-Military, Labour, and Depressed Classes should be given increased representation. In place of existing direct election of members to the Legislative Assembly, there should be a system of indirect election by Provincial Legislatures, and accredited Associations representing different sectional interests.

6. Appointments to the H.E. The Viceroy's Executive Council should be made from the best material available of any race or creed.

7. There should be a reasonable blending of the old order of Indian Ruling authority and tradition with the new order which has been brought into being by the changes in the political constitution.

8. It is the primary duty of all Governments to see that the legitimate interests of Minorities are not trampled under foot, and Statutory safeguards should be provided for the interests of Minorities, in such form as the Minorities themselves may desire, subject to the non-subordination of the majority and the national interests.

9. Further conventions on similar lines to the relaxation of the powers of the Secretary of State regarding fiscal matters, should be built up.

10. There should be no alterations to the Government of India Act, other than those necessitated by the grant of Responsible Government to the Provinces.

11. A progressive policy in the training of Indians to fit them for the public Service of India, should be carried out by means of improved and increased educational facilities for Technical and Commercial training.

12. In order to avoid the results of a University Degree being considered the goal of all education, this particular qualification for Government Service should be abolished, and the Government Entrance Examination of a sufficiently high standard should be maintained.

13. The obstacles in the way of the introduction of a satisfactory system of primary education must be surmounted, and rapid growth of primary education should be secured by compulsion, area by area.

Oral Evidence. The names of those Founders or Members who will be prepared to give oral Evidence on Provincial and All-India questions, on behalf of the League, will be notified on the arrival of the Commission at Bombay. We trust that as a result of the labours of the Commission, India will advance creditably and prosperously along the political highway towards the final goal of Self-Government within British Commonwealth of Nations.

Memorandum submitted by the Marwari Association.

The Marwari Association which is the oldest and the premier representative organisation of the Marwari community, representing all the various interests, political, commercial, economic, social, etc., of that community, and is recognised by Government as such, begs to submit the following memorandum for the consideration of the Indian Statutory Commission. The Association counts among its members almost all the leading mercantile firms of the Marwari community in Calcutta, and as these firms have branches in various parts of the country, the Association may be regarded as an All-India organisation. The Association is a special commerce and industry constituency of the Bengal Legislative Council and, as such, returns one member to that body. It also returns one member to the Legislative Assembly in rotation with two other Indian public bodies.

The Association has always held the view that the best form of Government for India from the point of view of her safety from external aggression as well as from that of her progress and development in all directions will be the form that obtains in the British Dominions and Dominion status ought therefore to be her final goal of constitutional development. The Association welcomed the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform Scheme as a step towards raising India to that status, and, having watched with care and interest the working of the scheme, has come to the conclusion that another step forward ought to be taken without delay. The Association does not think that India is in a position to undertake the duties and responsibilities of equal partnership in the British Commonwealth immediately. She must attain to that position by gradual stages of development. In dealing with the subjects mentioned in the note issued by the Secretaries to the Commission, the Association has endeavoured to keep this principle in view.

1. (a) Basis of Franchise.—Should remain as at present, but in view of the opinion expressed in answer to 1 (b) that communal electorates should be abolished, the difference in the qualifications of Hindu and Muhammadan voters, wherever it exists, should be done away with. The Association is also of the opinion that punishment for any offence not involving moral turpitude should not be a disqualification.

In this connection the Association also desires to state that greater care should be taken to prepare the electoral rolls to enable every person qualified to vote to exercise his franchise. So far as the Association is aware, rolls are at present prepared on the basis of official records showing the amount of taxes and cesses paid by each person in a constituency. But such records of the Income Tax Department being confidential and unavailable, income tax payers qualified to vote are expected to apply for the enrolment of their names with a certificate from the Income Tax authorities bearing testimony to their qualification. The general public has not yet learnt to take such keen interest in the elections as to take the trouble of going up to the Income Tax authorities for such a certificate. Moreover, there are many among the income tax payers who neither know English nor anything of the electoral rules and regulations, and even those among them who would fain have their names enrolled in the electoral rolls, cannot apply in consequence. The result is that the electoral rolls are always incomplete. In the opinion of the Association the Income Tax Department should be required to supply Government with separate lists of names of income tax payers qualified to vote at the elections of the Council of State, the Legislative Assembly and the provincial legislatures without mentioning the amount of tax paid by each individual, and the lists should be forwarded by Government to the officials charged with the duty of preparing the rolls with instructions to enrol the names as electors.

It should also be the duty of these officials to invite each joint Hindu family firm whose name appears in any list to nominate an elector on its behalf and on receipt of the nomination, to include the name in the roll, as is done by the Returning Officers of special commerce and industry constituencies when preparing their rolls. The Association believes it will serve as an encouragement to electors to take an increasing interest in the elections.

(b) Methods of election.—The existing method of direct election should be allowed to remain unaltered, but the class or communal electorates should be abolished in favour of mixed or joint electorates. The system of representation by class or community is bad in principle, and injurious to the best interests of the country, as it hinders the growth of the spirit of nationalism and leads to communal narrowness and troubles.

(c) Methods whereby particular interests may obtain adequate representation.—As regards the representation of communal interests, the Association is not aware that there are communities whose interests cannot be represented through the general mixed electorates and require or deserve representation through separate communal electorates. There are, however, important minorities which cannot be expected to obtain representation through the general constituencies and require therefore to be specially dealt with. In plural member constituencies seats should be earmarked for such minorities, and single member constituencies containing this element should be converted into plural member constituencies for the purpose. By way of instance, the case of the Marwari community may be cited. The Marwaris are a commercial people having a very large portion of the trade of the country, both inland and foreign, in their hands. They have also invested their capital very largely in industries and landed and house properties, and own jute mills, cotton mills, flour mills, oil mills, jute presses, cotton ginning factories, coal mines, mica mines, etc., in all parts of the country. They also hold a large percentage of the shares in industrial concerns both under European and Indian management. In short, they have very large stakes in the country, but being scattered all over the country, they are in a minority everywhere and, in the absence of any special provision, labour under the disadvantages of non-representation or inadequate representation on the legislatures and local self-governing bodies. Their traditions, their customs and their methods of business being not identical with those of the other communities, their interests and their needs and requirements cannot be understood, much less represented, by members of other communities and as a special provision to give them representation, seats should be earmarked for them both in the Central and Provincial legislatures and in other local self-governing and representative bodies. The Marwaris in Bengal should have at least two seats on the Legislative Assembly and four on the Legislative Council of Bengal.

The provision that has been made under the existing law for the representation of the economic interests of the country is extremely inadequate. The system of securing the representation of Indian commercial interests through some important public bodies representing such interests is undoubtedly good and should be allowed to continue, but the measure of representation which economic interests obtain thereby is meagre and far less than commensurate with their needs and importance. Under the existing system, this Association is allowed to return only one member to the Bengal Legislative Council and is bracketed together with two other public bodies to return one member to the Legislative Assembly in rotation. It is unnecessary to stress the fact that this representation is quite inadequate.

The Association ought to be allowed to elect at least two members to the Bengal Legislative Council and one to the Assembly at every general election.

As regards social interests, the Association is of opinion that instead of providing for the representation thereof, it should be expressly laid down that the legislatures shall not discuss, legislate upon or otherwise interfere with the social or religious customs, practices or rites of any community. Social interests should always be left to take care of themselves. The increasing tendency on the part of the Central legislature to undertake social legislation is unfortunate. Such legislation is often passed by means of the votes of men who belong to social groups of different types and whose votes are therefore not always prompted by a sympathetic understanding of the supposed abuses which the legislation is intended to correct. Besides, this inevitably results in the weakening of initiative in the social group concerned.

(d) The relationship between the representatives and constituents should be very close and friendly, but it is not so at present, because in the interior of the country, the constituencies are mostly very large in area which often makes it impossible for candidates or representatives to come in contact with the electors. In order that candidates may meet and address their constituents and the latter may exercise their votes intelligently, the constituencies should be reduced in size. There should also be a convention for representatives to meet and address their constituents after each session of the legislatures to render an account of their work and enlighten the electors on the future needs of the country. This will not only make the relationship between the representatives and electors as close and friendly as it ought to be, but will also help towards the growth of parties and informed public opinion. But it will necessarily result in an increase in the numerical strength of the legislatures and involve larger expenditure on account of payments made to members. But the Association is not in favour of increasing such expenditure and would suggest a reduction in the present scale of allowances.

(e) The growth of parties. Parties should grow on definite principles in the Central and Provincial legislative bodies. In local self-governing bodies on the other hand, formation of parties on political lines should be avoided. Rival plans of local improvement might provide opposed platforms.

(g) Nomination.—Elected bodies should have a clear majority of elected members. The object of nomination of officials should be only to give the elected members the benefit of official experience and the number of nominated officials should therefore be as small as possible. As regards non-officials, the object of their nomination should only be to secure the representation of interests which may have failed to obtain representation by election. But in forming constituencies, care should be taken to avoid the possibility of any interest failing to obtain representation by election. This can be possible only if it is ascertained beforehand how many interests there are in the country that require representation and the numerical strength of the elected bodies is fixed accordingly.

2. (a) and (b) Suitability of existing areas.—The Association does not think that in size the existing areas are unsuitable for the growth of representative institutions, either local self-governing or provincial. Though it believes that smaller areas would be more suitable for legislative and administrative purposes and helpful to the growth of self-governing institutions and to the extension of education in citizenship, the Association fears that smaller areas for administrative purposes will involve large expenditure and does not therefore recommend any reduction in the size of the existing areas. As regards the division of the existing Provinces, the Association considers that for obvious reasons it should be made on linguistic basis.

3. (a) (b) (c) (d) and (e) Local self-governing bodies.—The constitution and functions of District Boards, Municipalities, Local Boards and Village Unions should remain as they are. They have elected majority and elected non-official Chairmen. Officials of the Provincial Government should not have any power of interference, but as a safeguard against mismanagement of affairs, there must be some power of control in the Ministry of Local Self-Government. As regards finance, the law should lay down a maximum rate of local rates and taxes, but the levying and altering thereof should not be subject to Government approval unless it is proposed to exceed the maximum. Within that limit the local bodies should have a free hand over their budgets, though indeed Government should have the right to interfere in cases of grave neglect of duty or mismanagement of affairs. In regard to the appointment of their officers, the local self-governing bodies should be wholly independent of the Government.

4. (a) and (b) Provincial Governments.—Dyarchy has failed partly because of the inherent defects of the system and partly because of the unfavourable atmosphere in which it had to be worked. The increased strength of the Governor's Cabinet has meant increased expenditure also. On the other hand, the two halves of the Cabinet have not in the various provinces worked with that amount of co-operation which would either justify the extra expenditure or secure public confidence in the constitution. Circumstances have often arisen which cast strong doubts on the reality of the status of Ministers as equals of Executive Councillors. The unsatisfactory allocation of funds to the transferred departments has been widely criticised. There is a deeply rooted belief that ministers have not received the proper amount of co-operation from their European subordinates.

The powers given to the Secretaries of departments are considered to be so large as to take away from the position and prestige of the Ministers. The practical obligation on the part of Ministers to support Government measures to which the elected members of the Council might be opposed adds to the unpopularity of the institution. The Minister's responsibility to the legislature is constantly overshadowed by his responsibility to the Government. Above all, the institution of the Reforms has not meant a visible rise in the happiness and welfare of the people. The first and strongest impression it leaves upon the public is that it has the disadvantages of an expensive machinery without any corresponding advantages. For these reasons the Association considers that dyarchy should be replaced by provincial autonomy. The Executive Councils should be abolished and all the departments of administration except Law and Order should be placed in charge of Ministers, the leader of the party in power in the Council being appointed by the Governor as Chief Minister with power to choose his colleagues from amongst the elected members and form the Ministry. The non-official Ministers should work on the principle of joint responsibility.

As regards Law and Order, the Association is of opinion that it should be placed in charge of an official to be nominated by the Governor as a Minister who will not be removable by the legislature. The Association considers that there should be a continuity of policy in the Administration of this department; but this will not be possible under a Minister removable by the legislature. The question of the desirability or otherwise of retaining the Governor's present powers of certification is also worthy of serious consideration in this connection. In view of the suggestion made by it in answer to 4 (i) for the establishment of Second Chambers in the provinces, the Association thinks that the Governor's power of certification should be curtailed to the extent that he will only certify measures refused by the lower House after they have been carried in the upper House. He may also certify measures for introduction in the upper House in case their introduction is refused in the lower House. These changes in the constitution, the Association believes, will knock the bottom off the present policy of obstruction and will help forward the growth of a Party of Opposition on the lines of His Majesty's Opposition in the House of Commons ready to carry on the Government, if called upon to do so.

(c) (d) (e) Answer to 4 (a) and (b) covers these points.

(f) Growth of party system in the Provincial Councils. Party system should be encouraged in the Provincial Councils, but a distinction should always be made between a party and a group. The tendency to form loose groups should be discouraged.

(h) Classification into reserved and transferred subjects. Holding the view that dyarchy should be abolished, the Association does not think it necessary to deal with this question.

(i) Desirability of Second Chambers. If dyarchy is abolished and all the departments are placed in charge of Ministers, as suggested in answer to 4 (a) and (b), the Association would support the establishment of Second Chambers in the provinces to provide a safeguard against all possibilities of obstruction and a check over any hasty actions of the popular representatives in the Legislative Councils. The relationship between the two Chambers should be on lines similar to the relationship existing between the Council of State and the Assembly.

(j) Provincial Autonomy. The Association is of the opinion that the next step ought to be the grant of Provincial Autonomy to the extent suggested in answer to 4 (a) and (b).

(k) Finances of Provincial Government and Financial Control. The Association considers the principle of leaving certain sources of revenue to the Provincial Governments to be a sound one and a necessary step in the direction of giving the Provinces complete financial independence of the Government of India. But a great deal depends upon the proper division of resources between the Central and the Provincial Governments. Under the existing arrangement, the Provincial Governments, specially the Government of Bengal, find it difficult to undertake any new schemes of development. The Provincial Governments should have unfettered authority to borrow money on the security of their revenue. The previous permission of the Governor-General and Secretary of State should not be required in such transactions. The Provincial contributions to the Government of India should be permanently wiped out. The sources of Provincial revenue should be increased. The revenue accruing from jute export duty should be restored to Bengal. The Provincial share in the revenue from income tax should be more equitable.

(l) Financial relation between reserved and transferred sides. Having regard to answer to 4 (a) and (b), it is unnecessary to deal with this question.

5. (a) The Central Government. The constitution of the Central Government remains almost as it was in the pre-Reform days. The Reforms Act of 1919 has altered it only to the extent that the Indian element in the Viceroy's Executive Council has been increased, the old Legislative Council has been enlarged with a majority of elected members and a Second Chamber has been created with practically an official majority. In the opinion of the Association the time has come when some measure of responsibility ought to be introduced in the Central Government also in the same way as it has been introduced in the provinces. Among the Central subjects there are questions which concern the internal administration of India only, and these ought to be transferred to the charge of Ministers responsible to the legislature. As the provincial Governments are not entirely independent of the Government of India, responsible Government in the provinces cannot be real unless it is introduced in the Central Government also. Whatever justification there might have been for the non-introduction of such reform in the Central Government in the Act of 1919, it should not be deferred any longer, but a beginning should be made now for the progressive realisation of responsible Government. Although dyarchy has failed in the provinces, the Association suggests its introduction in the Central Government in the absence of a better alternative.

If the constitution of the Central Government is changed as suggested above to make it responsible to the legislature in some respects, then adequate financial provision should also be made to enable the Ministers to administer their departments satisfactorily. Experience of the working of dyarchy in the provinces has shown that Ministers cannot meet the requirements of the departments in their charge, much less undertake any new schemes of improvement for want of funds. Steps should be taken to guard against their being confronted with such difficulties in the Central Government.

6. Relations between the Central Government and Provincial Government. (a) The answer to this question would be partially found in 4 (j) and (k). So long as the provinces are not made autonomous, the Central Government should have some power of superintendence, direction and control over the Provincial Governments. The existing law fully provides for that and in many matters of legislation, the previous sanction or subsequent assent of the Governor-General is indispensably necessary. But consistently with the principle of helping forward the growth of responsible government in the provinces, the Government of India's power of superintendence, direction and control should be gradually relaxed, except in matters in which the Provincial Governments act only as the agents of the Government of India. The Provincial Governments should not be interfered with even in cases of mistakes, unless the mistakes are of a serious nature, but should be allowed to profit by their mistakes. Nor in cases of disputes arising between two or more provinces, should the Government of India interfere unless, failing to arrive at an amicable settlement, the Provincial Governments themselves approach the Government of India for a decision. The Central Government should, of course, keep a watch over the provinces and help them with advice, but should not interfere directly except in cases of utter mismanagement of affairs.

(b) Classification of subjects. The present classification of subjects as Central and Provincial is not unsatisfactory on the whole. But it should still be possible to add to the list of the Provincial subjects.

(c) Financial relationship between the Central and Provincial Governments and Meston Settlement. The answer to this question will be found in 4 (k). As regards the Meston Settlement, the Association has no hesitation in saying that great injustice has been done to Bengal. The Meston Committee failed to realise the peculiar difficulties of Bengal. Her sources of revenue are absolutely inelastic in nature. Her land is permanently settled. Her forests are undeveloped and irrigation, which is one of the most paying sources of revenue in other provinces, is a losing concern here. She has taxed herself to the utmost limit and the Government also has effected large retrenchments but still her finances are far from satisfactory and the transferred departments, on the satisfactory working of which the success of the Reforms primarily depended, have suffered badly.

In fact, compared to other Provinces, the position of Bengal is the worst in the transferred departments. She has not been able to spend enough either for health and sanitation or for education, and has been compelled to abandon projects for agricultural improvement for want of funds. The justice of her claim for readjustment of the financial relationship has been admitted on all hands, but nothing has yet been done. As has been stated in 4 (k), the revenue from the jute export duty should be restored to Bengal as jute is a monopoly of Bengal and she suffers not a little in matters of sanitation in raising it. There is no reason why she should be deprived of the benefit of this revenue. The provincial share in the revenue from income tax should also be made more equitable.

7. Courts and the Judiciary. Under the existing system both the Executive and Judicial functions are vested in one and the same officer. The necessity of separating the functions has long been felt by the people and admitted by Government, but it has not yet been effected. No further delay should be made in carrying out this reform to ensure the proper administration of justice. The judiciary should be wholly independent of Executive control. The practice of appointing members or ex-members of the judiciary to executive posts should be discontinued.

8. The Constitutional problem in relation to :—(a) Law and Order. Law and Order may perhaps without exaggeration be said to be the foundation stone on which the whole edifice of Government stands. Government is impossible in an atmosphere of lawlessness and disorder. It is therefore one of the first essential duties of every Government to maintain law and order, and it is for this reason that the constitution of every country provides its Government with authority to take even extraordinary powers to maintain law and order in cases of emergency. But the best means of maintaining law and order is to anticipate and prevent the causes likely to threaten law and order from arising and to remove them if and when they do actually arise. Governments generally pin their faith in suppression, which also is undoubtedly necessary for the immediate restoration of law and order, but history does not show that suppression has ever proved a sure or permanent remedy anywhere. It proves effective only for a short period, but at the same time it drives discontent underground, with the result that lawlessness and disorder appear again in a more virulent form than before. Eradication is therefore what ought to be aimed at and steps ought to be taken for the purpose in consultation with the people themselves. The Association believes that the present unrest in the country is due to a large extent to economic causes. Political privileges alone will not succeed in allaying this discontent. The remedy lies in the adoption of really effective measures for the amelioration of the economic condition of the people.

(b) Justice in British India. This, in the opinion of the Association, is a more important question than even the maintenance of law and order. The impartial administration of justice as between man and man, irrespective of race, creed or colour, should be the motto of every Government and political or other considerations should not be allowed to enter the administration of justice. But judges being human, they cannot be expected to be able to rise above such considerations if they have to work under the Executive Government, and this is what makes it essential that they should be placed under the High Courts. An important qualification which a judge should possess is a good knowledge of the language of the people over whom he sits in judgment and of their customs and habits of life to be able to understand and appreciate their feelings.

(c) Defence of India. The Association is of opinion that the army in India should be nationalised at a more rapid rate. Self-Government will not be attained merely by constitutional advancement; that advancement must be supported by the increased fitness of India to defend herself. The Association regrets that the steps so far taken towards Indianisation of the Army are disappointing. That Indians are not able to defend themselves is a source of weakness not only to India, but also to the British Empire. The military expenditure of India is 42 per cent. of the total revenue of the Government of India. It need hardly be mentioned that it is disproportionately high and no other country furnishes a parallel to it. The expenditure on such lines can never lead to India's development. Indianisation of the army will facilitate reduction of the military expenditure and make money available for other important purposes.

(d) Social Progress. It depends greatly upon political, economic and educational progress. But as has been stated elsewhere social questions of the Hindus are indissolubly linked up with their religion and should not, therefore, be allowed to form part of the business of the Legislatures, but should be left to the people themselves.

(e) Federation. India being a large country with a heterogeneous population of different races and creeds, who speak different languages, the question of the establishment of a federal system of Government on the lines of Canada and Australia is worthy of serious consideration. This, in the opinion of the Association, should be the ultimate goal.

(f) The status and position of India in the British Empire. The present status and position of India in the British Empire are those of a mere dependency of Britain. In the self-governing parts of the Empire, Indians are not, therefore, regarded as equal subjects, but as an inferior race of mankind in spite of their culture, education, business ability, etc., and labour under many disabilities which are galling to the national self respect of India. Britain herself is unable to prevent Indians being so treated in those countries. But in strange contrast to this it may be stated that the doors of India are wide open for the nationals of those countries, and they can come and hold any position under the Government and invest their capital in business and land without any restriction.

Considering the value of India in the Empire, this state of things should not be allowed to continue. The remedy lies in raising India to the status and position of a self-governing dominion.

9. Relationship between the Central Government, the Secretary of State and the British Parliament. The Secretary of State's control over the Central Government is still too extensive to be consistent with the ideal of a self-governing India. The financial powers of the Secretary of State are too many and too wide. India's fiscal autonomy granted in theory is hardly yet a fact on account of these powers. The Government of India must be made more and more the supreme authority in India, and the Secretary of State should be reduced to the position which the Secretary of State for the Colonies holds. The Council of the Secretary of State should be abolished.

10. The Position of the Services. (a) Indian Civil Service. Under the present system, recruitment for and appointment to the covenanted Services are made under rules laid down by the Secretary of State and, so far as the Association is aware, all matters concerning the pay, pension, allowances, etc., of members of these Services are also regulated by rules made by the Secretary of State. This state of things is not compatible with Responsible Government and all these functions of the Secretary of State should gradually be transferred to the Government of India.

(c) Provincial Services. As regards the Provincial Services, the Association considers that recruitment should be made by competitive examination, and merit should be the only test. There is an agitation oing on for recruitment on communal basis. There ; no just reason behind it, as the Services are not ıtended to provide employment for any class of ıen, but to carry on the administration of the ountry. If appointments are made on the basis f the race or creed of the entrants, it will be impossible to maintain the purity of administration.

(e) Indianisation. The present rate of Indianisation in the Imperial Services is, in spite of recent improvements, still inadequate. The Association is of opinion that Indianisation of the Services has a great bearing upon constitutional advance.

A Statement for the Statutory Commission by Mr. W. L. TRAVERS, C.I.E., C.B.E., M.L.C. (Bengal), Leader of the British non-official Group in the Bengal Legislative Council, previously for many years a Member of the Jalpaiguri District Board, and Chairman of the Dooars Planters' Association. Member, Bengal Legislative Council, 1920 until now. Chairman, Dooars Branch, European Association.

Note.—The Dooars Tea Industry contains 148 tea estates, employing 250,000 labourers. A considerable majority of the estates are under British control, with British capital, with a rough valuation of six to seven million pounds. The Dooars is situated under the mountains, a long strip on the North of the Jalpaiguri District of North Bengal. The country was opened up and the industry was commenced almost entirely by British pioneers as in Assam. Of recent years Indians have entered into the industry, and there are now 47 Indian gardens, while this number is increasing every year.

The labourers are chiefly from the aboriginal races of Chota Nagpur and the Santhal Pargannas, brought here by the planter. Many thousands have settled upon the land outside the tea garden area. At present the tea garden labourer is content to live under the supervision of the tea estate manager, whose business it is to look well to the health and happiness of his labourers, who are free to go and come as they will.

It may be noted here that the British Member for this constituency is also in reality the Member for these labourers, who—at present at least—show no desire for the Labour Union, or Labour Member as such, being well paid and well looked after.

1. (a) As conditions are at present up country, the present franchise appears to be suitable, speaking both for the Indian and for the Britisher. Of the latter every man and woman who pays income tax has a vote. And every Indian ryot of any substance at all is qualified. There is no demand from the people themselves for an extension, though indeed the senior employees upon tea estates, both those from the Bhadra Bengalee race and the head men amongst the labourers, ought to have the vote. A ryot with a few acres of land has it, but a tea garden employee (Indian) with a pay of Rs100/- a month has not.

1. (b) An election to the Legislative Council strains the resources of the District Executive to the utmost to obtain the necessary supervision. It is a tribute to the District Magistrate that those elections have been run with so few scandals. If there were indeed any large extension of the franchise, it would be very difficult to arrange an election for a whole district on the same day in a district like this, where there are scarcely any large landowners or people of position outside the tea garden area and the district and the sub-divisional headquarters. Education is very backward, and the election supervision falls upon the subordinate officials almost entirely.

1. (c) This is a section of great importance for the British planter and resident up country.

For the Legislative Council there is a constituency for the whole of the Division, for the representation of the British resident. That is satisfactory enough, although if the Darjeeling District—at present a frontier district without representation on the Legislative Council—were brought under the jurisdiction of the Council another new constituency should be added to the two which the up country British residents now possess. But representation upon District and Local Boards is of great importance for the tea planter, whose industry is so dependent upon roads and other subjects which are administered by the District and Local Boards.

At the present time Local Self-Government is controlled by an Act, and Rules, which were in force before the Reforms commenced. A new Bill to modernize was placed before the Legislative Council and later in this statement I describe the real reasons which led the Council to reject it. But sooner or later, a new Bill will come forward, and the question of British representation upon a District Board like that of Jalpaiguri will arise. It is estimated that the British planting industry pays more than one third of the revenue of the district. In any "Popular Representation" Bill the industry would be swamped unless there be just and fair nomination membership. It must be remembered that such a Bill would pass through the Legislative Council. At the present time the British non-Official group is in such a position that by its influence and action it would probably obtain that nomination. But in another Council, under perhaps another constitution, at a time when racial feeling might dominate, that might not be the case.

It is therefore a matter of urgent importance for the future of British industry and British residents in this country that sufficient and just representation should be secured. The Southborough Committee, before which I gave evidence, gave us representation upon the Legislative Council—representation which, although not excessive, has sufficed for the safeguarding of the great British capital interests in the Province.

I do not know what procedure will be followed by this Commission, but I do urge most vehemently that in some way—preferably in the new Bill to come—British representation will be preserved and secured. And that not only upon the various legislative bodies, but upon those which appertain to Local Self-Government also.

If there are to be steps forward, towards responsible Self-Government, it is unlikely that those will satisfy the extreme Swarajist or Nationalist. If on the one hand he obtains more power, and on the other he is still dissatisfied, he would have an opportunity of venting his wrath upon the Britisher, if he be able to prevent or to decrease the latter's "say" upon local self-governing institutions. Suppose a Swarajist Ministry with a Local Self-Government Bill before the Council. It is extremely probable that that Ministry would insist upon treating the British resident in this district as an individual only, eliminating the fact that that resident stands for a large capital and thousands of workers who have no vote. It is for these reasons that I bring this point so strongly before the Commission.

Communal representation is, in my opinion, a necessity. In the present state of communal hatred in Bengal it is not practical politics at all to even consider any other method that may be suggested. And, in my opinion, that holds good throughout for local institutions as well as for the legislatures. Any measures or methods such as "joint electorates." which sound so well in theory as leading to the elimination of the communal electorate as such, would be futile. Either they would not operate at all or they would allow the Hindu, with his larger share of wealth, education and ability, to completely dominate the political situation. The Muhammadan knows that fact well, and the introduction of any such proposals would, I believe, bring revolution much nearer than it has been since the Mutiny.

1 (d) A number of members of the Legislative Councils go but little amongst their constituents, except when an election is drawing near. But those that do, either because their own residence is in the constituency or because they desire to know and to understand those who have elected them, retain their influence.

In other words, the education of the elector has commenced. He is beginning to learn what to expect from his member, and "personality" will, I think, count in India even more than in the West. That is the great advantage of direct election, and I think that the relationship between a member and his constituents will expand in this way. In Bengal the ryot may be uneducated so far even as the three "R's" are concerned, but he is very shrewd in regard to his own personal local interests, and he will begin to insist upon some sort of acquaintance with his member.

1 (e)—See below 4 (f).

1. (f) There is a distinct and large growth of interest in public affairs, and a proportion can be called informed public opinion. A proof—to an old up country resident—is in the spread of the newspaper. Journeying in the early morning to the North from Calcutta one sees the rapid consumption of the papers at each stop—a new development in India.

There are some phases which may be of interest. The "follow-my-leader" movement is quicker than at home—i.e., some one makes a statement or gives an opinion upon some affair of importance; it is accepted and repeated ad. lib. without examination, and becomes very quickly a stock phrase. Although Indian brains are quick and nimble, yet there is less independence of thought. Again, a popular leader is surrounded by a halo of adulation—for a time (it does not last, especially if he dares to take a responsible position)—and it is almost sacrilege to criticise him, even his politics. Even political opponents are afraid to do so.

There is another interesting aspect—in regard to events that excite the imagination of the Indian. Agitation begins, then it increases to a blaze and to its height far more quickly than in the West. Again the flame dies down fast in the same way. Suddenly, it seems, an agitation or a political wave has finished. It was so with non-Co-operation, and it seems as if the Commission may have an exhibit, in the agitation for boycott. The flame of that agitation is certainly lessening in this Province.

1. (g) I consider the nomination of officials to the Legislative Council essential for the conduct of business and it will remain so for long—until the Indian Leader and Minister learn far more of administration, and has real and lengthy experience. A Minister, too, has too many important departments and he cannot learn much of even outstanding detail, in this Province. The official should continue to have the vote too. With the want of responsibility which is so common in the Indian Leader, the Government block of officials—generally but not always added to by the non-official British group—is one of the few factors which lend some stability, even if there be a change of the Constitution. I believe in the nomination, with the vote, of the official.

The Government of Bengal continues to appoint its Secretaries entirely from the point of view of their administrative ability. The fact that an official has the gift of speech or the Parliamentary "sense" inherent is apparently no recommendation for appointment. Government may be right, but I doubt it—so often have we seen the failure to present a case in the best light. Secretaries should also be given more opportunity to learn to speak by being detailed to present subjects of less importance. That happens in the Assembly, but Provincial Governments have much to learn in this respect.

Non-official members are required by nomination to represent labour. I can see no method by which election would be possible as yet, at any rate in this Province. Although the Labour Unions and so on are in existence in the towns they are not yet organized on anything approaching the Home level. Few labourers can have the vote as yet. Even if they had, I think the bradra candidate would win; the labourers in any constituency would not combine to elect their own man.

I think, however, that the time has come to increase the nominated representatives of labour from two to (say) six. Some of these, too, should be mofussil representatives. The depressed classes and some other minorities and races should continue to have nominated members and there should be an extension of the number.

3 (a) I have already said that the whole machinery of Local Self-Government requires modernisation—to be brought into line with that of the Legislatures above. For education and experience of administration this is of vast importance. Some of the most valuable members of the Bengal Legislative Council are Chairman and Vice-Chairman of District Boards. They have learnt what is wanted for the improvement of health and so on, and concentrate on practical detail, instead of just indulging themselves in political matter. The Corporation of Calcutta has been remade by an Act (almost the only measure, of first-class legislation which the Bengal Council has made)—the work of Sir Surendra Nath Banerji and his secretariat. Now, in my opinion, many of the District Boards are doing very valuable work. Health, water supply and vital and essential needs of the people are progressing. But that progress is very slow. One reason is that the finance is entirely inadequate for further development. Under the present law the District Board has no power to increase taxation. With the power, I believe, that some would use it and use it wisely.

There are many men working on the executive of District Boards who are doing excellent work. I wish there were more of the class upon the Legislative Council. There are, as I have said, some. But professional or business reasons prevent others. Some of the most valuable too, refuse to take part in politics realizing that, as things are at present, they can do more real work for the people locally.

Speaking generally, I think that the District Board in Bengal achieves much more—that it is a much more useful institution than is the Municipality, in this Province. The members of the District Board drawn from a larger area, with a smaller proportion of the lawyer element (though some of these lawyers are most valuable workers) seem to have a broader outlook upon the affairs of their district. Then they are not responsible (as is the Member and Executive of the Municipality), for the collection of the taxes which compose the income of the Board. That work is done for the Board by Government. Members of the District Board are influenced to a less degree, again, by communal friction, and the nominated element of officials (very valuable in this way as professionally) help to smooth over such trouble. Where there is the non-official British Member, he too does good service in this way, by acting as a medium between the communities, and by lending the practical common-sense outlook of his race to public business.

In regard to the Municipalities, I refer the Commission to the last administrative report by the Local Self-Government Department of this Province. There are a few bright exceptions, but many or most of the smaller municipalities are stagnant, non-effective bodies, with apparently little ambition.

It would seem to me that the best line of improvement would be for the Minister to have a small local Government Board, with powers to insist on some measure of efficiency, and further powers to appoint a paid executive under the Board where efforts to obtain that efficiency are of no avail. The Minister, being a politician, would find the Board of much use as a buffer, so to speak, besides in the administration itself.

4. (a) Before drafting my remarks upon this section of the Appendix—a section upon which I can claim to have some experience, having been a member of the Legislative Councils since before the Reforms, and in active co-operation and consultation with Government upon many items of local and provincial importance—I read a little of the Act of 1919 and the Preamble. The sentences which occur to me as being of infinite importance are those which speak of "the progressive realization of responsible Government," "Progress by successive stages," "The Commission to be guided by the co-operation received from those on whom new opportunities for service have been conferred, and by the extent to which it is found that confidence can be reposed in their sense of responsibility."

The whole basis of the Act appears to be this gradual progression towards full responsible Self-Government, and an observer like myself, nearly thirty years in Bengal, cannot help wondering whether the Report of the Commission, and afterwards Parliament by the Act which it will enact, will, indeed, retain this basical idea, in spite of the great and rising tide of agitation and nationalism which must be so obvious to the members of the Commission itself.

I love this country and its people, and I desire to serve it and them, so long as health remains. But because of that, or in spite of that, I do see so clearly the mountain of danger which any advance, too hasty or too far, is bound to bring to India. The difficulties—and thereby the danger—which confront the path of Self-Government are so huge that they seem to be insurmountable. Leaving aside those two great difficulties—the position and status of the Great Native States, and the question of the Army and Defence, both externally and internally—what one sees in Bengal and in Assam, which I visit for some months in the year, are those two equally important difficulties—communal hatred first, and the situation in which the semi-civilised races and tribes will be, in any Government approaching full responsible Government—secondly.

For communal hatred—that huge chasm between the followers of the two great religions—is still there, and it is still bitter and as extensive as ever, although for the time being it seems to slumber. And supposing or presuming any great advance in this Province, such as autonomy or fully responsible Government, with the removal of the ex parte, so to speak, British Executive and of its long arm to stop riot and fight and the anarchy of a whole district which would follow, what will happen ?

And a similar question arises when one considers Assam, the province with so many hill districts, where a British Magistrate governs, in fact and in deed, thousands and thousands of people hardly semi-civilized. The British Sahib at the District Headquarters represents to those people, still fond of war and head-hunting (if they dared to try their ancestral amusement), all authority and law and order.

An Indian Magistrate at such a station, even though a picked and carefully chosen man, would be an experiment which would certainly lead to a wave of unrest, if nothing more. I have seen some of those districts and their peoples, and I know. So the question there is : In what relation will these districts stand to an Indian or Assamese Ministry ?

It is my profound conviction, based on long experience and upon very lengthy consideration of the subject that, at this stage, full responsible Government in Bengal or in Assam would be so very dangerous an experiment that it should not be made. The proposals have been made by Indians who, naturally enough, desire power and the government of their own country, and who either cannot see the dangers, or who refuse to do so. And they have been made by British residents, too ; men who have no real or inner knowledge of the people or of the countryside. They are people who live in Calcutta or in a city, under the immediate eye, so to speak, of the administration or of a District Magistrate.

Has, indeed, any real use been made of the opportunities which the Act speaks of ? And has there been any real co-operation in this Province since the Reforms began ? The answers are obvious. For if it had not been for the British element in the Bengal Council, Dyarchy would not have functioned at all ; and, as it is, even with that and since the Extremists entered the Council it has had but a very precarious existence.

The dangers which confront full responsible Government are in two directions. First, there is the danger to the people of the Province themselves, divided as they are by communal hatred. Imagine, an untried and inexperienced Ministry confronted by a communal outbreak—interference maybe with the action of the British Magistrate and the Police—perhaps even a Hindu or Moslem Magistrate, indeed, further to inflame, for at such a time a Hindu trusts no Muhammadan ; and the reverse. Another wholesale series of resignations of the British Officials would follow. In what position would be the Province within a few, a very few years ? I say that there must be, on these grounds alone, another go-between period of trial.

The other danger is to the British citizen and to the great British industries with their millions of capital. It must not be forgotten that the Extremist wing of the Left or Swarajist Party in Bengal hate the British people with a very bitter hatred. They hate the Government ; they hate the official, and they hate the business man. "The latter has exploited and is exploiting the country. The Indian should evict the British employer and business man, and take over the billets for the bhadra log of Bengal." Subash C. Bose and his brother Sarat make no secret at all of their feelings and of their intentions, if they have the power. Then it cannot be doubted that they, followed by so large a number of the educated and semi-educated of young Bengal, will try to do us active harm. Suppose that Parliament does give full responsible Government in the Province, but that there is but little change in the Central Government. That will not satisfy the Swarajist. He will be as full of hatred as before. And he may be in power in Bengal with the administration in his hands—the means to harm the British citizen and his capital. I have left out of my discussion the fight that there would be between the Hindu and the Muhammadan for the places in the Ministry. For it might be possible to overcome that difficulty, by defining the numbers, or in some other way.

I have many Indian friends, men of education and position, men whom I like and respect in every way. I am perfectly aware that taken individually many of these, in equipment and in ability, would be able to administer successfully as Ministers of the Crown in Bengal. But, unhappily, one has to take the problem as a whole, with consideration of the history of the past eight years and the refusal to co-operate by so large a slice of the intelligentsia. So many of the leaders appear to lack that responsibility to which the Act refers. Then there is the want of education, the education in democracy itself especially, and the want of that practical spirit of affairs, to make the best of the situation as it is, with hope and trial for further progress in the future.

My proposals for the next step are :—

(1) The elimination of the Executive Council as such.

(2) The transfer of more departments to an Indian Ministry.

(3) Two British nominated Ministers to administer the Departments of Police, Appointments, and Land Revenue, and to advise the Governor. They should have special powers in regard to the protection of British interests, and the Governor should have the power of vetoing any detrimental legislation, or even administrative action where proved to be racial.

(4) A Divided Revenue or Separate Purse. A fixed percentage to each side, and either a separate or semi-divided Financial Department.

I am in favour of more responsibility, but I am not in favour of full responsible Government. Dyarchy should be improved, and as many of its defects removed as is possible.

(4*b*) It is the fashion to say that Dyarchy has been a failure. Such a repetition is one of the stock phrases which I have mentioned above.

I do not agree. I think that, had there been a reasonably sufficient amount of money for development of the transferred departments, had there been the will to work the system with Ministers in power with a stable majority, Dyarchy might have been very successful. At any rate, I have never been able to extract from any critic proposals defining any alternate form of Constitution which could have brought more success. Dyarchy does give Ministers the Power to achieve much for the progress of Social Reform.

During the first three years of the Reforms, the new Constitution—Dyarchy—functioned fairly well in this Province. Sir Surendra Banerji, Sir Provas Mitter and the Nawab Ali Choudhury, with the exception of the Act which brought into being the Calcutta Corporation, were able to do but little except administer their departments, because the Meston Settlement deprived Bengal of the means to progress at all. Every department had to be cut to the bone. The want of money killed Dyarchy's chance of success in Bengal. It has harmed Bengal much more than that. But had the Ministers been able to do something for the betterment of the people—and how urgent that is the Commission cannot comprehend, unless they visit the real mofussil—there would not have been the landslide with the Swarajist victory in 1924.

Dyarchy's defects are fairly obvious. The divided responsibility, each Minister directly appointed by the Governor, the verdict of the Council being given in the Budget vote or with a vote of no confidence. No Ministry as such, working together as a ministry with a policy. Whether it will even be possible to find such a Ministry, unless and until the communal difficulty be removed, is a moot question. Then, the period is too short, especially for a country where Democratic Government is new. A Minister only begins to learn his job and to get hold of the strings in three years. If it were five years, then there would be more hope of real achievement.

The Ministers are too few and each has too many departments, especially since the number has been only two. As soon as he takes office, he is overwhelmed with files and administrative detail. Heads of department ask for orders and instructions on this and that, and the Minister is involved in a perfect maze. He cannot find time to study the real problems of any department, and to evolve a real policy.

Again, he is badgered and worried by a host of applications from political supporters and others for jobs and billets for relations and friends. The communal question intensifies the difficulties here very much, and a Muhammadan suffers the most, because there are considerably fewer of his co-religionists in subordinate office, and the community thinks—and rightly thinks—that there should be a more just division. No Britisher from Home can possibly imagine the amount of worry—and work of a kind—that comes to a Minister in this way. And when that Minister is not sure of his majority, and does not want to lose one supporter in the Council, his difficulties are, indeed, very trying.

There has been considerable criticism of Dyarchy from ex-Ministers, and especially from those not long in office. The fact that it is so hard to rise above the maze of administrative detail to concentrate upon the real work of his office accounts for part of this criticism. But there is another reason for this criticism and this is the Indian uneducated idea of a Minister's position and powers. Many, apparently, think that a Minister should be in power like a small Mussolini, with unlimited money and vast power. As yet, the Indian—or so it seems to me—does not comprehend the fact that a Ministry must hammer out its general policy as a Ministry, with distribution of what funds there are, in accordance with that policy. Indians take but little account of the commitments of Government before their time for schemes and projects already under weigh.

Now, of these defects that I have mentioned, some are due to the non-experience of the Indian and to the fact that he has yet to learn not only to administer, but even the ordinary outline of democratic government itself. Some defects are due to the fact that a Minister, an untrained administrator usually, is treated by his Secretariat much as is the Member of Council. The British Member has twenty years of administrative training, while the Indian has not the political equation to bother them. Other defects are inherent in the present constitution.

But my point is that Dyarchy can be improved, and upon its basis a new constitution can be evolved, giving more responsibility and more of that experience and trial of the art of government which I believe to be essential before full responsibility be granted in the Provinces.

(4*f*) There is one most important point, which must be constantly remembered by every student of Indian affairs, when he attempts to grasp the position and growth of Parties, both in the Assembly or in the Bengal Council. A Member of the Council may have joined the Swarajist Party, or the Liberal or the Union—the name does not matter—but if and when certain questions arise all that fades like a cinema picture, and the Indian Member becomes at once just Hindu and Muhammadan. Constantly and frequently the communal question alters a situation, and asides of it, so to speak, crop up in the most unlikely places. I will give an instance, an illustration which may be more interesting than my personal observations.

In the 1924-6 Legislative Council the Government of Bengal brought forward a Bill for the Reform of Local Self-Government. The object of the Bill was to democratise the whole system, bringing it into line with the Constitution. Now, all parties and every member recognized that such a Bill was desirable, and, on the whole, the provisions and proposals in the Bill were approved. The Bill did not go far enough to satisfy the Swarajists and Radical Members. In spite of that, however, on the merits of the Bill itself, there would have been a majority in favour of about 20. Then there arose this curious situation. The Swaraj Party at that time contained 13 Muhammadan Members. Mr. C. R. Das was dead, and there were signs already of the decline of Swarajist influence. The one idea of the Swarajists, then, was to keep the Party together. But if this Bill was even presented for a first reading, at once the question of communal representation would arise in full cry. The Swarajist Muhammadans would vote solid Muhammadan, and the majority of the Swarajist Hindus would actively oppose—it might indeed break the Swarajist Party altogether. Its leaders took hurried counsel—they made the matter a Hindu question without informing the Swarajist Muhammadans, and by combining with the Moderate Liberal Hindus on the other side, the combined Hindus prevented the introduction of the Bill, on the grounds that it was a reactionary measure, much to the amusement of the Government Member in charge of the Bill, for he had heard nothing of the subterranean intrigue.

The Swarajist Party is the only one which is organized with any efficiency. It captured the Congress organization and used that. The victory that it won in 1924 was due partly to this organization, with no opposition of the same nature, with the younger vocal element to assist. The Swarajist victory left but the remnant of the Liberal Party, and with the Swarajists was a nearly allied group calling itself the Independents. Besides that the party actually attracted quite a number of Muhammadan Members—a remarkable achievement, for the Swaraj or Congress Party is in reality the Extreme Hindu Party.

The Party was organized and made by Mr. C. R. Das, a remarkable and talented individual whom Bengal could ill afford to lose, and who had the respect and regard, for his sincerity and patriotism, of his political opponents, who only regretted that his talents were not devoted to constructional work. Since Mr. Das's death the Party has been slowly declining in numbers and influence, though it has retained its place as the main anti-Government Party by its appeal to the Nationalism of the Bengalee people, by specially identifying itself with the cause of the Political detenus, and by the sway that these have over the younger and more impressionable generation.

But leaving the Swaraj Party aside—and even there several times discipline has nearly broken—what has struck one most during the life of the last two Bengal Councils has been the influence of what one may call "personalities," Personal feeling, personal like and dislike, feuds or quarrels between leaders or would-be leaders—time and again these have prevailed over Party ties and election pledges. More than once ex-Ministers have been seen voting with the Swarajists in attempts to defeat other Ministers. In the second Bengal Legislative Council there was a small majority for Dyarchy—to give the Constitution a chance. But Mr. C. R. Das's influence together with, and taking advantage of, this tendency towards personalities was able just to defeat Government and the pro-Constitution groups.

The years 1924, 1925 and 1926 saw the gradual increase of the acute inter-communal hate and discord, and at the election at the end of 1926 only one Muhammadan was returned as a Swarajist. It seemed for a while as though a United Moslem Party might dominate the situation. But then again came into play this matter of personality, with a split into two of the Party. One group followed Mr. Ghuznavi and another Sir Abdur Rahim. To begin with there appeared to be no political differences between these leaders, but their differences were accentuated by the fact that Lord Lytton nominated Sir Abdur as a Minister, and he found it impossible, on account of his acutely pro-Muhammadan opinions as expressed in his famous Aligarh speech, to find a Hindu colleague to work with him. Many of us thought that it would have been wiser, and better for the Province, if Lord Lytton had offered a Ministership to both of the Muhammadan leaders, when probably at least one Hindu of influence could have been found to work with them. But the opportunity was lost, Mr. Ghuznavi succeeded where Sir Abdur failed, and Mr. Chakravarti joined the former as a Minister. Sir Abdur Rahim went into active opposition, and with the Swarajists and with deserters turned out that Ministry in August, 1927. Then after a period of investigation, Sir Stanley Jackson appointed Sir Provas Mitter and the Nawab Musharruf Hossain. They have survived, in spite of the intrigue of the defeated Ghuznavi Group, and more remarkable, in spite of the fact that Sir Abdur Rahim has again endeavoured to evict the Muhammadan Minister. The Nawab Musharruf Hossain was Sir Abdur's lieutenant and nominee. But later there was one of the quarrels which are so frequent, and they too are now at enmity.

I have given this account in the attempt to show the dominance of this feature—personal feeling—prevailing.

The tendency therefore is for the formation of small groups under leaders and would be-leaders.

Another feature of the situation is the very considerable number of members of the Council who are candidates for the office of Minister. It would astonish the Commission if they could actually see how many there are—gentlemen who cannot understand why they have not been selected. Often these would-be Ministers have no following, or hardly any followers, and they often also appear, at any rate, to have no outstanding ability or recommendation in themselves for office.

The whole position lacks stability. Groups and little parties shift and change like the sands, and it is difficult to foresee what will happen a month or two ahead.

The British Group of 16 members has, of course, since the initiation of the Reforms, fought consistently and steadfastly to give the Constitution and the Law the chance to function. The Group is organized and works as one, and it has been the one factor in aid of steadiness and stability. In the absence of outstanding speakers or debators on the Government benches, the British non-Official has generally led the debate pro Dyarchy. But there has been so much intrigue, and so much by-play, amongst the Muhammadan and Liberal Groups—during these past two years—that the British Group has been led to the determination, that, should the present Ministers be defeated, it will stand aside and support no more.

Since 1924 the Council has wasted its time in this constant intrigue and faction fight. The majority in favour of the Constitution, as voted in the last Budget motion of Ministers' salaries, was 80–40. And yet a stable Ministry cannot be formed. On the other hand, the condition of the people is one crying for amelioration. There is a huge field awaiting Reform—health and water supply, agriculture and education. There is now a little money—not much it is true—but sufficient for the commencement of progress. Nothing, or very little, is being done, because the representatives in the Council follow the example of their leaders, who quarrel amongst themselves as to who should be Ministers. They cannot sink their differences for the sake of their constituents, who need so much and receive so little of all that makes life worth living.

I say, therefore, that the proposals which I have made are the limit that can be safely given, until there has been more education—education in the duties of leaders, and of representatives to their constituents, with less thought of themselves, and what they personally hope to gain from their position as Members of the Council.

4. (c) (d) and (e) I have made my proposals, because I think that there must indeed be some attempt at the collective responsibility of a Ministry, and the elimination, if it can be done, of the individual Minister effect. It is the communal chasm, so I have said, which makes the solution so difficult. The Muhammadans although they have lately lent themselves to Hindu and Swarajist intrigue, for the special purpose of defeat of a Minister, yet do not trust the Hindu. They know that educationally they are backward in re the Hindu; they know that they have fewer leaders of ability—the numbers at the Bar and in the law and professions prove that—they know, moreover, that Hindu wealth dominates theirs; that there are five Hindu landowners to one Muhammadan. Hence they fear the rule of a Hindu oligarchy and they do not desire the departure of the British official and the British connection. They desire, of course, more power and position for themselves, and they will often speak in public of the Utopia with the Hindu and Muhammadan hand in hand governing their own country.

But they know that that cannot be yet, and I foresee, when the Constitution does permit a Ministry as such, a communal battle even more bitter than any yet.

A Governor's position in this Province is difficult indeed. And yet for the future, if there is to be safety, he must surely be provided with more veto and more power. There must be power to veto any unfair racial or communal treatment. There must be power to step in and govern if a Province reaches an absolute cul-de-sac in its Ministry Government, or in the Legislative Council. Even of more importance than the powers of a Governor is his personality and ability for the task—a Governor with no experience of administration, a man who believes that the people must govern themselves, leaving aside the conditions, might do infinite harm. It is to be hoped that the Commission will lay the greatest stress upon the importance of selection. Governors should surely be selected for their fitness for the task and ability alone, leaving aside all British political consideration.

4. (i) My opinion is that a Second Chamber is not desirable, or advisable, unless and until there is full responsible Government in a Province. Then it will be one of the safeguards against rash or precipitate legislation, or against communal fight, always provided that the Second Chamber is elected upon so restricted a franchise that it does indeed represent those who have a real stake in the country. If it but delays it would be of value, for, as I have said, in the beginnings and rapid rise of a popular movement in India there is comparatively little real thought and consideration of the consequences.

5. I have attempted—though very inefficiently, I know—in this statement, to inform the Commission, and to make suggestions, upon aspects of their task with which I am really conversant. I know but little about the working and constitution and difficulties of the Central Government, and I shall not write platitudes drawn from one's study of the newspapers. All that I stress (and it is the hope and prayer of every British resident, and of every responsible Indian) is that the Central Government should remain strong and predominantly British, unless, and until at any rate, the three greatest difficulties which stand on the road to full responsible government are in way of settlement. They are, of course—(1) the Communal difficulty, (2) the question of the Army and its development towards Indianization, which surely to be safe, must be slow and gradual, and (3) the position and status of the great Native States.

6. The consideration of the Meston Settlement should not be limited to its influence upon Dyarchy, although indeed it has done much to destroy the chances which that had of success in Bengal. Far more important, in my opinion, is the standstill to which has been brought all efforts to improve the condition of the people: 10¾ crores of rupees for a population of 47½ millions—then the aftermath of the war, with the necessity of raising the pay of all the Services and of all the employees of Government. The result: hardly anything left even with the only increase in taxation that the Province would stand. The state of the water supply in many districts, the improvement of the health of the people—these two essentials cry for improvement, besides so many others. And nothing can be done.

I doubt even now if the Central Government, far away and out of touch with Bengal, conceives at all the harm that has been brought by this poverty of the Government of Bengal.

It is not a question of the success or failure of certain forms of Government, but rather of the hate that has been born, and the growth after birth of that hate, for the British Government. On the one hand you have a continuous campaign of vilification against the Government and everything that is British; agitation that goes on all the time, and that has gone on for a dozen years. On the other, scarcely any betterment for the millions of the poor who exist in the country side. Thousands of discontented educated young bhadra log out of a job, spread all over the country to tell the people what ought to be done; and nothing to counter. Communal agitation to some extent is a symptom, as is all the unrest and agitation which has plagued this Province for so many years. The problem is largely economic. The Central Government immersed in its own difficulties has had no time to spare for any consideration of what is the basis of the finance of all India. A finance member from Home, what can he know of the necessity for the aid of the poor in this Province, hit so hard by this iniquitous financial arrangement, with no expansion of revenue, no hope indeed of expansion, and yet crores and crores of rupees from the income tax of industrial Calcutta, and from the customs of that city, going to pay not only for the All-India administration of this Province, but of others as well. That is the way in which we who live in Bengal regard the Meston Settlement.

All that need be said now is that no future Constitution, or change in the form of Government, can be successful unless there is a revenue reasonably adequate for necessities and for some progress in Social Reform.

Of the remainder of the subjects mentioned in the Appendix, an individual who is a busy business man cannot write, important as they are.

I have written upon these of which I have real personal knowledge from my association in public life.

Memorandum on the Working of the Dyarchical System and Suggestions for further Reforms, prepared by ALHADJ SIR ABDELKERIM GHUZNAVI, Kt., M.L.C.

INTRODUCTION.

In accepting the invitation of the Indian Statutory Commission to submit to them a Memorandum on the subjects falling within the limits of the enquiry which they are about to undertake, I have deemed it desirable to record in the following pages the result of my personal experience of the working of the present system. I have been intimately associated with the working of the Reforms, beginning with the Minto-Morley Scheme down to the present times. In considering what our future constitution should be, I am inclined to think that it would be more helpful if I were to confine myself more or less to probing to the very depths the inner workings of the present dyarchical system, and pointing out the glaring defects, pitfalls, anomalies, the various shortcomings and so forth, which have made themselves manifest to all those who, like myself, have held under their charge important departments of Government during the course of the last eight or nine years, than if I were merely to give my own ideas as to what should be the next step in our political evolution.

Forewarned is forearmed, and unless these defects, that revealed themselves in the course of working the system, are taken note of, vividly visualised, and an exhaustive diagnosis made, it may not be possible for us to avoid those very pitfalls on this occasion too when we are embarking on a new constitution. It is with that object that I have gone into details in showing up the cankers that have been eating away the very vitals of our public life. I have, therefore, thought it desirable to deal exhaustively with these evils rather than merely record my suggestions and recommendations of what form the future constitution should take.

Nothing is easier than to write our suggestion for a new constitution for India from the various constitutional text-books of the West. If it desired merely to implant an orthodox democracy in this country on the European model, the same can be found in plenty in the text-books of constitutional history of the various modern democratic countries. Anyone who has had experience of European countries which have gone on flourishing under their particular democratic constitution, would be inclined to draw his ideas and ideals from the forms of the constitution in vogue there. But so far as India is concerned, a country which is peopled by hundreds of heterogeneous races, which is a conglomeration of communities, tribes and sects, anyone engaged in constitution making for India will have to place himself in the position of an Indian whose political outlook is more or less circumscribed by his inborn loyalty to his religion and his community. We must clearly realise that the political, economic, social and educational condition of India are fundamentally distinct from those of European countries and require special consideration other than those which merely point to an ideal democratic institution. I would even go further than that, and say that while the acquisition say of the moon may be a substantial gain, the cry for it would be a mere foolish ideal. Facts have got to be looked in the face. The difficulties and the dangers of the steep climb to the top of the hill of Swaraj or real self-government have got to be taken into consideration, and our pace must necessarily be regulated accordingly. If I were sure that at one stride we would get to the summit of that hill, I would fain join in the chorus of benediction that is being poured forth on the Nehru Report.

Since the compilation of the following pages, both the Draft Constitution as set out by the Associated British Chambers of Commerce as well as that produced by the Nehru Committee have been published. As regards the former, I must frankly express my surprise at the liberality of the recommendations that have been made. As regards the latter, I can only describe it for the present as an idealistic fantasy. It is an ill-disguised attempt to perpetuate the domination of the major community over all the minor communities in India. When one of the recommendations in the report is to do away with the fundamental safeguard, which the Moslems of India from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin are agreed in thinking should be embodied in the constitution itself, viz., our separate Communal Electorates, I have not the least hesitation in saying that proposals such as these can never be acceptable to the Moslem community at the present moment. The Moslems of the Punjab and Bengal particularly are not prepared to barter away their legitimate rights as was done at the time of the so-called Lucknow Pact, nor are they prepared to bow to the decision of the Standing Committee of the Jinnah Wing of the All-Indian Moslem League who, it is reported, have decided " to accept the Nehru Report with minor modifications." Neither are they likely to be cajoled into accepting the self-sufficient views of the Members of that Standing Committee even when that Committee glistens with the shining lights of the Congress. The Nehru Report has, on the Moslem side, been signed by Sir Ali Imam and Mr. S. Queraishi. We are all aware of the views that have been promulgated by Sir Ali Imam since the beginning of the imbroglio over the Simon Commission. But few, perhaps, now remember the views to which Sir Ali Imam gave utterance even in recent times. This is what he said :—

> " . . . But this I will say, that apart from ethical aspects of loyalty to the British Crown, the best sense of the country recognizes the fact that the progress of India rests on the maintenance of order and internal peace, and that order and internal peace in view of the conditions obtaining in our country at present, and for a very long time to come, an immeasurably long time to come, spell British occupation. British occupation not in the thin and diluted form in which Canada, Australia and South Africa stand in relation to England, but British occupation in the sense in which our country has enjoyed internal peace during the last fifty years. Believe me that as long as we have not learnt to overcome sectarian aggressiveness, to rise above prejudices based on diversity of races, religions and languages, and to alter the alarming conditions of violent intellectual disparity among the peoples of India, so long British occupation is the principal element in the progress of the country."

We shall, perhaps, be told that he has every right to alter his opinion, but I am afraid since the time when he uttered those words there has been no meteoric change in India's political outlook to warrant such a diametrically opposed change of front. As regards Mr. S. Queraishi most people are aware that he is a Liege-Lieutenant of the Ali Brothers. Thus neither the seal of approbation of these two gentlemen can be said to carry with it the tacit approval of the millions of Moslem population, nor is the camouflage of publishing to the world, that the Nehru draft constitution is the outcome of the deliberations of a conference of all the political parties in India, likely to mislead those who know the value that attaches to such a bombastic declaration. The conference is scarcely entitled to be called an All-Parties' Conference, considering that it was not at all representative, and was composed more or less of the same luminaries who were responsible for the " Independence Resolution " of the last Congress.

Dominion Status was laid down as India's ultimate goal in the memorable Montford announcement of August 1917, and it is the goal which we all desire to attain. The only question is whether Dominion Status should be the next immediate step or whether there should be another short intermediary stage between Dyarchy and full-fledged self-government. Full representative government can only be attained by a process of evolution and cannot be begotten in a day. If the Provinces are granted more or less autonomy and the proposals adumbrated by the Associated British Chambers of Commerce are given effect to, they will be as near full self-government in the Provinces as can be desirable in the interest of good and efficient government. But the all too sudden cataclysmic change in the system of the Central Government as advocated in the Nehru Report can scarcely be suited to the conditions still obtaining in India. The attempt to browbeat England, which is the fashion nowadays, by passing "Independence Resolutions" or by suggesting that there will be internal upheaval leading to revolution if the sum total of the demands made by the vociferous section of politically-minded India is not granted, need not be taken seriously. Let us be frank to ourselves and be frank to the world outside and say that, while our legitimate desire must be recognized as full self-government, we should so shape our pace that in the process of reaching it we may not trip and fall into pitfalls of chaos and anarchy.

In the following pages, while laying bare the glaring defects and shortcomings of the present contution, I have endeavoured to put forward suggestions for a short intermediary stage before we are fit for full Dominion Status.

I have also made it perfectly plain that the Moslems as a whole are not prepared to accept any further Reforms or even tolerate the present Reforms, unless essential and fundamental safeguards for the protection of the legitimate rights and privileges of the important Minorities are embodied by Statute in the Constitution itself.

There are certain other matters which strictly speaking do not perhaps come within the terms of reference under which the Commission is acting. One such is Usury which affects vastly the economic condition of the people and indirectly interferes with freedom of voting, inasmuch as the money-lending class can exercise undue influence over the indebted voters. For this reason I have deemed it necessary to deal with this as well as another matter, viz., the question of Public Holidays which will be found in the Appendix.

PREAMBLE.

Since the announcement of the appointment of the Indian Statutory Commission, politically minded India has been split up into two camps, one for opposing and the other for assisting the Commission. Those who have settled down with the idea of co-operating with the Commission in order to assist in leading India onward in the path of ordered progress, have in view the goal of a self-governing India with Dominion Status conferred on her by the British Parliament. Those who, from honest convictions and not for the mere delight of causing obstruction, are out to oppose and non-co-operate must evidently be urged thereto by the same belief which animated their gifted leader, Pundit Motilal Nehru, when he bluntly said before the Assembly the other day that "it was puerile for anybody to think that the British Government seriously intends at any time either in the remote or in the near future really to give responsible Government to India."

It seems therefore that at the root of the present raging and tearing imbroglios, controversies, and maelstroms lies the question whether England is really honest and sincere in her intentions and professions of holding up the goal of Dominion Status before the gaze of India. If as is believed by that eminent leader, Mr. Nehru, and a large number of his following it is all bluff, pure and simple, on the part of British statesmen, then the ground under the feet of the co-operators will be at once cut away and they may as well cry halt and take fresh stock of the situation. If, on the other hand, the contrary were the case then there can be no raison d'être on the part of the non-co-operators to continue their obstruction.

The crux therefore of the whole position lies in frankly and fearlessly answering the straight question "Is England Honest?" It is no answer merely to say that those in authority from His Majesty the King-Emperor downwards to many eminent statesmen including past Viceroys and our present noble-minded and high-souled Viceroy, H. E. Lord Irwin, have taken every available opportunity of nailing the colours to the mast, nor would it be sufficiently convincing to add that the charge of insincerity levelled by the Pundits cannot stand because by implication it would fasten total incompetence and obtuseness on these stalwarts. The initial misconception of the Pundit seems to have been in thinking that Dominion Status involved the right of separation. To my mind therefore the only method of dispelling these clouds of doubts, misgivings and suspicions is, firstly, to consider whether (a) Dominion Status does or does not involve the right of separation, and (b) whether England can confer Dominion Status or in other words self-government to India purely in her own material interest.

Now Dominion Status per se is not any particular mode of government. It merely involves the relaxation by the British Parliament of the control which it directly exercises through the Secretary of State. A study of past history would at once reveal the fact that Dominion Status can never contemplate the right of separation. True, the United States of America tore herself away from the Empire, but she did so purely owing to the bungling and blundering of Lord North who paid no heed to the cry of "no taxation without representation," and seems to have been obsessed with the idea that America was colonised with all nondescripts, including gangs of criminals, who had to be coerced and tied to the apron strings of the Empire by chains of iron. If, however, on that memorable occasion, Pitt's liberal policy had only been followed and this very Dominion Status granted, America would still have remained, for all we know, within the British Commonwealth.

Next as to (b), the plain answer is that if it really were to the material interest and benefit of England to keep all her Dominions in direct possession, control and tutelage in the same manner as she is holding India to-day, then there could never have been any reason for her relaxing her control from any part of her Dominions and there would have been no cause for her bestowing self-government on any portion of her colonies and conquered territories. But he who runs can very well read that for a "nation of shop-keepers and traders" their material and genuine interest can only lie in their obtaining trade facilities and securing as much as possible the markets of the world. So long as these very material and fundamental objects are secured, no nation which has only these for its main aims would be inclined to shoulder the additional burden or incur the unnecessary worry of the governance of a country simply for the fun of governing it in the interest or otherwise of the governed. But England can never relieve herself from that worry or lay down that burden with respect to any part of her territories which cannot stand on its own legs and is not fit to govern itself. Thus it is opposed to all canons of commonsense and business instinct that she should saddle herself with the additional and thankless task of the direct governance of countries where her trade facilities are secured and where, at the same time, the people are fit to govern themselves. Is it, therefore, not reasonable to conclude that as soon as the people of this country are really fit for self-government England in her own interest would be only too glad to relieve herself of her thankless task of directly governing this country ? The United States of America are at present engaged in the very same problem with regard to the Philippine Islands where, though the Commission appointed by the States reported unfavourably, yet a further trial is being given. England would have long ago washed her hands of the direct governance of this country if India were really a nation. Unfortunately she is not so yet and not only does this sub-continent of ours contain millions of unlettered men, but it is composed of large assortments of races and creeds hereditarily antipathetic to one another, which so far have not been able, unaided, to form a joint government acceptable to all the different peoples that go to make India. With the march of time, conditions, however, have greatly improved and the course set by the Reforms was chosen in the confident hope that India could settle down as one great happy family, self-governing yet still remaining within the British Empire. We Indians also share that hope, and it is for that reason that patriotic men of all schools of thought are united in demanding a further stage in the onward march.

Future Constitution must contain Statutory Safeguards for Minorities. But here it is my duty as a Moslem and as one who has been in public life for over thirty years and studied the past and present conditions prevailing in his community, who feels their pulse, and who shares their aspirations and misgivings, to utter a word of caution.

Moslems of India, if anything, are more interested than other communities in the general question of the extension of the Reforms and the grant of larger and more fundamental and permanent powers of self-government. They are equally interested in the general political progress of this great country, to which they have given their own glorious traditions of organised government and of the generous treatment of minorities and even of aliens ; but whatever future constitution may be evolved, that Constitution must contain Statutory safeguards for the just and legitimate rights and privileges of the minor communities, particularly the most important minor community, viz., the Moslems of India. Without these safeguards embodied in the Constitution itself, Moslems of India are not only opposed to further extension of the Reforms, but even to their present continuance, as they fear that in such eventuality the net result would be the extinction of Moslem political existence and influence in India.

These fears are equally shared by the sixty millions of the Depressed Classes. Rao Bahadur M. C. Raja, M.L.A. representing the Depressed Classes emphatically stated that " they (the Depressed Classes) would tell the Commission that they could not but view with fear and anxiety the decreasing power of the British element and the increasing power of the caste-bound oligarchy and that the Commission should on no account sacrifice the interests of the Minority Communities out of deference to the wishes and sentiments of the Majority Community. He would tell them that the politically-minded class form but a microscopic minority who were now nervous of being exposed about their real attitude towards the Depressed Classes and were therefore afraid of facing the Commission."

Thus it is a sine qua non with the Moslems of India that adequate and indefeasible safeguards for the due maintenance of their just and legitimate rights and privileges should be made a part and parcel of the future Constitution itself.

As in all the Memoranda submitted by the various Moslem Associations throughout India including the Central National Muhammadan Association, of which I have the honour to be the President, as also by various prominent Moslem public men, these points have been stressed, I need only refer to them without enlarging upon them here myself. I shall briefly enumerate those safeguards later on in the course of this Memorandum and say no more about them here. I therefore assume that these safeguards shall be duly incorporated by statute in the new Constitution which will be the outcome of the labours of the Indian Statutory Commission.

INTERMEDIARY STAGE.

Assuming then that Statutory safeguards will be provided for the protection of minorities, the next question to consider will be whether we are fit at the present moment for receiving full power of self-government with Dominion Status straight away, without an intermediate period, however short. The Montagu-Chelmsford Reform Scheme contemplated gradual constitutional development in this country and, as a preliminary step, introduced Dyarchy for a period of ten years. Though Dyarchy has been tried and found wanting in its various aspects, yet having regard to hard and plain facts, which are stubborn things, it seems that there should be an intermediate stage, albeit with the grant of Provincial Autonomy, between Dyarchy and Dominion Status.

I realise that there is an intensive feeling among a section of our advanced politicians that full-fledged self-governing powers should be conferred on India to-morrow. If I sincerely felt that we were ready at the present moment to assimilate such powers, no one would have been more emphatic in his demand than myself for the immediate grant of the same. But looking calmly and soberly around us and realising that even jarring communal and racial interests yet remain unadjusted, that the political sense of our electors is not yet appreciably developed, that the question of illiteracy is not yet sufficiently tackled, nor the necessity for taking a dispassionate view of all conflicting questions, the supreme duty of placing nationhood above community or self yet fully understood, I for one think that it will be wiser in the best interests of our country itself not to rush headlong, but to accelerate the pace towards Dominion Status and go through a short intermediary stage.

Before indicating briefly how that intermediate stage should be shaped, having had the advantage of working the Reforms and Dyarchy throughout this period, during which twice I acted as a Minister, I should like first of all to point out some inherent and flagrant defects of the dyarchical system.

DYARCHY.

Those who have worked the Reforms, and even eminent English statesmen, are agreed that Dyarchy is not workable. Speaking in the House of Lords, some time back, the present Secretary of State for India is reported to have said, " I myself was always very distrustful of the dyarchical principles. It seems to me to savour of a kind of pedantic and hide-bound Constitution to which the Anglo-Saxon Communities have not generally responded, and which, in my anticipation, was unlikely to make a successful appeal to a community whose political ideals were so largely derived from Anglo-Saxon Models." The late Lord Curzon, too, expressed himself as follows in an earlier debate in the House of Lords :—" I abominate the system of Dyarchy, but when the Committee of your Lordships' House decided to recommend it, because they said they could not find another alternative, I bowed my head and acquiesced." Even Sir William Marris recorded his opinion as follows :—" Dyarchy is obviously a cumbrous, complex, confused system, having no logical basis, rooted in compromise, and defensible only as a transitional experiment." Lord Lytton, in his swan-song, gave expression to his views about the present Constitution in the following words :—" The existence of an Executive which cannot be removed by the Legislature and of a Legislature which cannot be removed by the Executive is not calculated to produce harmony between the two, and without harmony between the Legislature and the Executive, efficient government is impossible. To ensure harmony an elected Legislature requires an Executive responsible to it and removable by it, and an irremovable Executive requires a nominated Legislature."

The first and foremost reform that I am impelled to press before the Members of the Commission is to remove the anomaly where half the Government have got to depend on the vote for their salary, nay, for their existence, whereas the other half have not. Independence of action must be restored to the entire Executive or the whole Executive must sail in the same boat. History teaches us that where the Executive has been strong, the State has been efficiently governed and, therefore, prosperous and powerful and vice versa. This has been true in autocracies and monarchies as well as in democracies.

The democratic system of government prevails in England where, however, it is the Executive that controls the Legislature, a fact not sufficiently realised in this country. In the United States of America and Switzerland, the Executive can always count on remaining in office for several years and thereby combines responsibility and power for its acts. Therefore, without an Executive irremovable for a certain period, no efficient government is at all possible. In England, as has been stated already, the Executive which controls the Legislature is, however, responsible to the Legislature. If there is an adverse vote it is the whole Executive that goes out of office and another Executive formed out of another party takes its place and likewise controls the Legislature. This is due to the admirable party system prevailing in England where the Executive is only formed from the party that is in a majority, or a coalition Executive is formed which also controls the majority. That feature being absent in this country, the Executive must be formed with members having absolutely equal status, equal powers, and equal independence of action, and they must be sure of a certain uninterrupted period of office if they are expected to do any substantial work, and not merely look to their own existence.

The evils of the dyarchical system of Executive are manifold. A single instance will suffice to prove its innate and inherent unsuitability. It is a matter of common knowledge in Bengal, as well as, outside, that the last Ministry which was composed of myself and Mr. B. C. Chakravarty, was wrecked by foul means; by intrigue and worse, or, putting it plainly, by bribery and corruption. As regards the latter evil, I intend to devote a whole section to it later on. Here I merely desire to point out that even the failure of the Bengal National Bank, with which the Hindu Minister was connected, together with bribery and corruption would not have wrecked the last Ministry. It was wrecked owing to the want of harmony between the Reserved half and the Transferred half of the Government. The difficulties of the Transferred half, particularly in Bengal, have been mainly due to financial stringency. If a Minister worth his salt desired to achieve some material good for his country and countrymen by carrying out policies which, again, depended on the amount of money he could secure from the Finance Member, it would be only natural that occasions might arise when for this very reason he would be constantly at loggerheads with the Finance Member. That is what actually happened during the last Ministry when the Finance Member also happened to be the Vice-President and Leader of the House. During a ministerial crisis, as well as on other occasions, the Government Whip was always made to consider it his business not only to whip up the official members, but also the nominated non-officials and approach even the elected members. When a ministerial crisis arose during the last ministry, the Leader of the House, who happened to be the Finance Member, without the knowledge and far less with the concurrence of the Governor, out of a dislike of the then Ministers, or at least one of them, who was constantly pestering him for money and often successfully getting it out of him is spite of his opposition, chiefly thanks to the absolutely fair-minded support of the Governor, deliberately instructed the then Government Whip (Mr. G. S. Dutt) to tell the nominated non-official members that they were free to vote as they liked. Mr. Dutt made this statement before me and he will, if necessary, verify it. The nominated members, who on every other previous occasion were accustomed to receive the mandate that they had to vote for the Ministers, on this occasion, receiving a different mandate, interpreted it to mean that the Government, or at least the Reserved side, as represented by the Leader of the House, did not look upon the Ministry with favour and as these nominated members depended for their seats in the Council on the favour of Government, they naturally knew how to trim their sails. Thus several of them abstained from voting and one actually voted against one of the Ministers. Hence, but for this contretemps the Ministry could not have been wrecked, with all the exertions on the part of the Constitution Wreckers even in unholy alliance with other mandate breakers.

Whatever may have been the practice in the Legislative Assembly with regard to the nominated members, in Bengal, at least, during the time of Lord Lytton if not before, there has always been an unwritten convention that the nominated members were always expected to vote with the Government.

For a further elucidation of the incidents narrated above I would respectfully invite the Members of the Commission to a perusal of my speech on that occasion and a subsequent speech shortly after, which will be found in the Appendix.

Thus if both the halves of the Executive Government had been sailing in the same boat, in other words, had been equally dependent on the vote for their existence, a contretemps of this description would never have taken place. To my mind this alone damns the dyarchical system. I therefore repeat with all the emphasis at my command that the first and foremost reform the Commission will have to recommend, so far as the Executives in the Provinces are concerned, is to remove this anomaly and in its place give us an Executive either of the type obtaining in England, Switzerland, the U.S.A. or Sweden; in other words there should be either all Members forming the Executive or all Ministers with an assured definite period of office. All knowledge and experience point conclusively to the fact that a Government worthy of the name, whether Autocratic, or Democratic and Responsible, must always be one Organic Entity.

TRANSFERRED DEPARTMENTS.

"The Transferred Departments are in the hands of the Ministers who are supposed to be responsible to the House, but while all the appearance of democracy is there, it is a shell without the kernel. The Minister has to run his departments, but he must have a permanent Secretary over whom he has no sufficient control. If the Minister wants anything to be done, the Secretary can go over his head to the Governor and the latter can overrule the Minister. The result is that although the Minister is said to be responsible to the House, he has to carry out the orders of the Governor."[1] Such are the words uttered by a late member of the Viceroy's Executive Council regarding his knowledge of the working of the Transferred Departments. Another member of a Provincial Executive Council who has many years' experience of the working of the Dyarchy said, "The Minister has no individuality of his own nor is he really responsible to the Legislature, he is really a mandatory of the Governor. The Ministers occupy in popular estimation a distinctly inferior status as members of the Government; they are not servants of the Crown like the members of the Executive Council, but are the nominees of the Governor. The members of the Executive Council take official precedence over the Ministers. The newest Executive Councillor is thus senior to the oldest Minister. The Ministers are precluded under the law from being nominated by the Governor as Vice-President and so are not qualified to succeed him as temporary Governor during the periods of vacancy arising suddenly or by the Governor's going on leave. . . . These restrictions and limitations have stamped the Ministry in the opinion of the general public of India as the inferior half of the Provincial Government. . . ." I shall now quote from a despatch of the Government of Bombay who, writing in 1918, said, " Practically all proposals of importance put forward by the Minister in charge of any of the Departments will involve a reference to the authorities in charge of the Reserved Departments. There are few, if any, subjects on which functions of two sections of the Government would not overlap; secondly, it will be seldom possible in the case of a transferred subject for a Minister to dispense with reference to the departments concerned with the Reserved subjects." This, therefore, means that under the dyarchical arrangement Government comes to be split up vertically into so many parts, each part being responsible to a different sovereign authority.

Finance.—I shall now proceed to illustrate this point by showing the relation of the Transferred Subjects with the Finance Department, and in doing so I shall quote from my previous Memorandum on the working of the India Act of 1919 and the Rules thereunder in Bengal, dated 8th October, 1924.

" (a) Under Rule 37 (g) (3), it is the duty of the Finance Department in connection with the budget and supplementary estimates to examine and advise on all schemes of new expenditure for which it is proposed to make provision in the estimates, and they are authorised to decline to provide in the estimates for any schemes which have not been so examined. Presumably, the intention in framing this Rule was that waste of money through the adoption of immature and unsound schemes was to be avoided, and the Finance Department was considered to be in a position to guard against such waste through its power of examination and of declining to provide for any schemes for new expenditure not examined by them. On the other hand, the whole intention of the Government of India Act is that Ministers should be left free to pursue a definite policy of their own, for which they are to be responsible to the Legislative Council. In practice, it has been found that the Devolution Rule referred to above has had the effect of vesting excessive powers in the Finance Department. The financial examination of schemes is regarded as implying a minute and meticulous scrutiny by the Finance Department of the smallest technical details of each project which would be better left to the discretion of the administrative department. In fact, the Finance Department have practically placed themselves in the position of experts in every department, instead of confining themselves to the more general aspects of each scheme in its financial bearings, which appears to have been the intention of the framers of the Government of India Act. The result is that Ministers are only too often unable to carry through their schemes in the form approved by them and in which they are put by the heads of departments and other expert officers, who alone are in a position to judge as to the soundness or otherwise of such schemes. The rules should be changed so as to limit the powers of the Finance Department.

" Under the present procedure, which is explained in Section 294 of the Secretariat Instructions, even after a scheme has been sanctioned with the approval of the Finance Department and money provided in the budget, no expenditure of a recurring nature can be incurred without the consent of the Finance Department, which should have no power to interfere with the discretion of the administrative department to incur expenditure within the limit of the budget grant. The administrative department should also be given power to make re-appropriation within its budget allotment from one minor head to another without reference to the Finance Department. The absurd position at present is obvious from the fact that the Minister in charge of a department has not the power to transfer even one rupee from one minor head to another without submitting the case to the Finance Department for their approval.

" (b) In order to allow the Ministers the necessary discretion in the matter of formulating their policies and carrying them out, it must be ensured that sufficient funds are placed at their disposal. The practice at present in vogue is that the purse being common, both sides sit together and settle the budget. In this connection a reference is invited to the report of the Joint Select Committee on clause 1 of the Government of India Bill of 1919 where they recommended that the Governor should allocate a definite portion of revenue to the transferred subjects and also a definite portion of the balance. I am of opinion that Ministers should be given an adequate separate purse for the transferred subjects under their charge. Certain sources of revenue may be set apart for this purpose. A special Financial Secretary as provided by Devolution Rule 36 should be appointed to look after the finance of the transferred departments. If this were done, the friction which is found to exist between the Finance Department and the transferred departments in various provinces would tend to disappear, and the Ministers would have a fair chance of carrying out their responsibility to the Legislative Council by formulating their schemes and putting them into action."

The above is what I said in 1924. I adhere to it with the following necessary modifications, as the time has now come to proceed to a further stage in our political evolution. The classification of the Transferred and Reserved subjects should be revised and, since it has become necessary to have a homogeneous Executive, it has therefore become unnecessary to have any so-called Transferred Subjects. All subjects should be administered by the new Executive except Law and Order, which may be placed under the direct charge of the Governor.

If it is deemed desirable to transfer Law and Order also, I would then suggest an alternative proposal. The Minister holding the portfolio of Law and Order should have a Board to assist him in administering that department, consisting of three members, one Hindu, one Moslem, and one European, appointed by the Governor; the Governor retaining the power of vetoing any measure which he considered necessary in the interest of public safety and also initiating any measure, which he considered necessary for the maintenance of public safety.

POSITION OF MINISTERS IN RELATION TO THE GOVERNOR.

This to my mind has depended, during the present transition period, on the personality of the Ministers and the personality of the Governors. So far as Bengal is concerned, I conceive it to be my duty to testify publicly that my relations as Minister both with Lord Lytton and His Excellency Sir Stanley Jackson have always been most cordial. As I have said alsewhere, this matter solely depends not only on the personality of the Minister who must be worth his salt, but also on the personality of the Governor, who is there to listen to his advice, to give his advice, who is there to guide him and be guided by him. I have to acknowledge publicly my indebtedness to H. E. Sir Stanley Jackson, who always supported me in all the policies that it was my privilege to initiate, sometimes even in the face of opposition on the part of members on the Reserved side, and who never failed to give me the benefit of his advice nor was ever chary of accepting my advice.

All this has been more or less personal, but the inherent defects of the dyarchical system with respect to the relation between the Governor and his Minister, as revealed in other provinces, should be remedied and the position properly defined, so as to remove the possibility of any hitch or difficulty as pointed out in the extracts already quoted from the dicta of several distinguished persons, some of whom have held high position as members of the Executive Council of the Viceroy and others had personal experience in working the dyarchical system as members of the Provincial Executive Councils and also as Ministers. In this connection I would recommend to the Members of the Commission a perusal of a book entitled "The Working of Dyarchy in India," published by Taraporevala Sons and Co., Bombay, particularly chap. IV, pp. 42—60 on Dyarchy in the Provinces.

CORRUPT PRACTICES UNDER DYARCHY.

(a) In the Council.
(b) In the Electorates.

With regard to this I shall confine my remarks to (a) only. I shall deal with (b) under Franchise and Electoral Rules. With the inauguration of Dyarchy in Bengal a formidable canker has been introduced into our public life, which is eating up its very vitals. I have no experience regarding this evil in other Provinces, so my remarks under this head will be confined to this Province only.

In the Electoral Rules provision that has been made is scarcely sufficient against corrupt practices during elections, but there seems to be no provision against such practices in the Councils. If there are representatives of the people who can stoop so low as to sacrifice their principles and convictions for a consideration, the Commission would be lacking in their duty if they did not recommend an adequate and effective provision being made against such delinquencies in the Councils.

It has been my privilege to act as Minister twice in two different terms of the Reformed Council, and I regret to have to say that on both occasions my ministry has suffered from these evil practices. I shall first take the case in 1924 when Mr. Fazl ul Huq was my colleague. At that time the late Mr. C. R. Das had ushered in his Swarajya Party, a well-trained, compact and disciplined body who were out to non-co-operate from within, with the avowed object of wrecking the Constitution by means fair or foul on the plausible adage proudly vaunted that "nothing was too mean to achieve the end." While I was in office in 1924 three successive onslaughts were made against us. The first was in February when a Motion of No Confidence was brought up only to be rejected by the House, proving that we did enjoy its confidence. On this the first occasion the sinister weapon was not yet employed. Thereafter in March our salaries were refused by a snap majority of one. I characterise it as a snap majority because though the evil practices were for the first time then started, there was also the accident of certain members amongst our supporters having been unavoidably absent at the time of the voting. Anyhow corruption in the Council began from this date, viz., March, 1924. On this particular occasion as far as is known only one or two members were bought over. Thereafter when the salaries were refused for the second time on the 26th August, 1924, a larger number of members succumbed to temptation. Threat, intimidation, pressure of an unwarranted kind were used with regard to some and the votes of certain others were actually purchased. Matters like these are almost always difficult to prove in a Court of Law, but all circumstantial evidence obtained at the time left no doubt that such was the case. Many members of Government, including the Governor himself, came to know of it at the time, and then the President of the Council would equally bear out what I have stated. Corruption anywhere is bad enough, but practised inside our Council can only tend to make our public life stink in the nostrils of all honest men. These evil practices, far from abating, have gone on increasing from that time onwards.

Later on in 1927 when another ministry came into being in Bengal, that ministry, too, was wrecked by methods such as these, but on that particular occasion there was an additional cause which has been already fully dealt with above.

During the General Elections in 1926 the Central Moslem Council Party under my lead set up a large number of candidates in the various Moslem constituencies. Out of a total number of 39 Moslem seats some 17 or 18 were captured by our party, 8 or 9 members came under the ægis of Sir Abdur Rahim and amongst the balance 2 were Swarajists and the rest, belonging to no party, were returned on no ticket except their own. In January 1927 the strength of the Central Moslem Council Party was amply demonstrated by the fact that amongst the candidates who stood for election to the Vice-Presidentship of the Council, the Central Moslem Council Party's candidate defeated the others by a fair majority and was duly elected. When forming his ministry, in spite of this fact, Lord Lytton, the then Governor, was persuaded to send for Sir Abdur Rahim and he asked him to form a ministry and secure a Hindu colleague. For reasons into which it is unnecessary to enter Sir Abdur Rahim had succeeded in making himself particularly odious to the Hindus, with the result that he could not find any Hindu co-operating member who would agree to be his colleague in the ministry. A few days thereafter Lord Lytton had to ask for his resignation and thereafter the ministry was simultaneously offered to Mr. B. C. Chakravarti and myself. The partisans of Sir Abdur Rahim forthwith launched an active propaganda against me, raising the obviously false plea that I had insulted the Moslem Community by agreeing to work with a Hindu and far more so with Mr. Chakravarti, who it was alleged had refused to work with Sir Abdur Rahim—a statement which had no foundation in fact. But for this faux pas that ministry could never have been wrecked. The failure of Sir Abdur Rahim generated personal hatred and jealousies with the result that the Swarajists, who during this term of the Council had not come in sufficient numbers, found ready allies in Sir Abdur Rahim and his following, and combined they decided to throw out the salaries of the Ministers in March 1927. On this occasion when a total refusal of the salaries would have meant a breakdown in the Constitution itself, men who had come with a mandate from their constituencies to work the Constitution, and who had hitherto supported the Constitution, were seen to go to the opposite lobby. Some were impelled thereto by personal feeling, but there were others whose voting power was actually purchased; but as the Moslem wing of the ministry had the support of a large following who, as already stated, were returned during the elections with the help of the Central Moslem Council Party and its funds, a few who seceded from the party owing to temptation did not make any appreciable difference, with the result that the motion for the refusal of the salaries was defeated by a majority of 13 or 14. Thereafter a fresh attempt was made in the following August when a vote of "No Confidence" was moved on flimsy or rather on no public ground whatsoever but merely with the deliberate object of wrecking the ministry. Advantage was taken of the failure at this juncture of the Bengal National Bank with which Mr. B. Chakravarti, one of the Ministers, was intimately connected, and a motion was tabled soon after the said financial crisis. On this occasion corruption played a very large part, and it was so flagrant and conducted in such a brazen manner that the incidents of that occasion were more or less known to most people who took interest in politics in Bengal. The exact incidents of that occasion were set out in a confidential Note prepared at the time, copy of which with enclosures will be found in the confidential Appendix. This Note will give all the available details, most of which were known at the time to the C.I. Department of the Government of Bengal. The evil practices were so flagrant and so shameless that I felt constrained to exclaim at the end of my speech opposing the motion in the parodied words of the poet :—

"Oh what a rarity
"Of honour and charity
"Under the Sun!"

vide Council Proceedings, Vol. xxvi, p. 252.

By a strange irony of Fate and for reasons into which I need not enter, Sir Abdur Rahim has now turned against the principal actor in that drama with the remnant of his following. He has again joined the Swarajists and a motion of "No Confidence" was brought up recently in March last against the present Ministers. On this occasion, so far as has been ascertained, corrupt practices were indulged in on both sides as confidential enquiries amongst members of the Council will easily show. Incidentally the ministry was not overthrown on this occasion. This was due, however, chiefly to the over-zealous support lent to it on the part of the then Leader of the House, a Member on the Reserved side, which was much talked about at that time and reports of which appeared in many of the dailies. This shows up the other side of the picture where a Member on the Reserved side, when it suits him, can take the Ministry under his fostering wing and overstep the bounds of legitimate assistance, which is expected from him by the Ministers, by even holding out threats to an elected Member of the Council within the Council Chamber itself. A copy of the report of the incident, as was published in one of the Journals, will be found in the Appendix.

It is nauseating to dilate on conditions such as these, and I take it that more than a sufficient case has been made out for the adoption of the most stringent measures against corrupt practices in our Councils. It will be one of the most serious problems which the Commission will have to solve in the interest of the purity of public life in Bengal.

FRANCHISE.

In the Montagu-Chelmsford report we read :—"The much larger electorates that will now be set up, though still a mere fraction of the population, will be devoid of political experience. The habit of considering political issues to be decided by a man's own judgment, or realising the value of the proper use of a vote and of judging candidates with regard to their fitness to represent the electors' views, have all to be acquired. These difficulties will be increased by the general lack of education." I have to confess with regret that the misgivings expressed by the framers of the Montford report have been more than fulfilled, and general education has not since spread at any appreciable rate to justify any further enlargement of the present franchise. General education of the masses still progresses at a snail's speed, and during these ten years, the value of the proper use of a vote has scarcely been realised by the ordinary elector.

I fear my views on franchise will scarcely coincide with the chorus of voices from this and other provinces demanding further enlargement. On the other hand I am constrained to say that those advocating further enlargement could not have given this matter their very serious and careful consideration. Nor have they frankly and fearlessly stated what has been or might have been their experience had they directly participated in any electioneering campaign. If they have, then I am all the more surprised that they could have at all urged further enlargement after the experience which they must have obtained.

Education has spread less among the Moslems than amongst the Hindus. Thus the political sense of the average Hindu voter is somewhat above that of his Moslem confrère. Further the Hindu elector possesses an innate collective sense, and whatever may be his own individual opinion he follows the lead of the majority of the Hindu intelligentsia who are responsible for forming majority Hindu opinion. The Hindu elector automatically takes his cue from the Congress-cum-Swarajist coterie. Thus more than 80 per cent. of the politically-minded Hindus and the Hindu voters are controlled by this coterie. A so-called Moderate or Liberal Hindu seeking election purely on such a ticket finds himself nowhere, unless he can supplement his efforts by the length of his purse or unless he has uncommon local influence. With the Moslem elector, the case is entirely otherwise. There are no well-organised Moslem parties nor a homogeneous Moslem intelligentsia to control the mass of Moslem electors. During the first General Election which took place immediately after the inauguration of the Reforms, a small percentage only of the electorate went to the polling booth, and they were swayed in their choice mainly by the personal influence which the several candidates could exercise. Thereafter corrupt practices in the Council began to filter down to the electorates, with the result that at every successive General Election corrupt practices have been increasing in geometrical progression. Hitherto in our rural areas we have had to contend with many evils, and there was a crying need for many a social reform. With the introduction of the Reforms, a greater evil has penetrated into our rural areas, simply because an edged toy has been placed in the hands of an infant, a seed has been sown in unprepared soil, an illiterate or half-literate elector has been given the power of voting, tantamount to placing the cart before the horse. Having realised vaguely that the franchise has conferred some sort of power on him, the elector, instead of using that power for the proper selection according to merit of a candidate seeking election, finds in it a ready instrument to turn to his profit. If only an authentic and real return of the election expenses of candidates could be obtained, it would be a staggering revelation as to what expenses a candidate had to incur by way of corruption. The electors being enriched in the process, and the successful candidate having secured his election by a heavy outlay, he is naturally prone to recoup himself from the well-filled purses of the popular Ministers who have to seek his vote, or from the Swarajist caucus who are out to destroy the Constitution by methods "however mean." Thus woe to the unfortunate Minister who, out of his sense of integrity and honour, refuses to unloosen his purse-strings and pander to the whims and caprices of the blacklegs, for he is foredoomed to fall ; and it matters not a scrap what ability he may possess or what past services he may have rendered to his country or how conscientiously he may have been discharging the onerous duties of his office. If he wishes to retain his seat on the ministerial guddee, he must have abundant patronage, by way of vendor's licenses or otherwise, to bestow and long purse-strings to unloosen, and bow down to the caprices and whims of all the blacklegs that have in their turn been fleeced in the process of their own election to the Council. Thus a merry-go-round of profit and loss and loss and profit has been installed, with the electors and their representatives moving in a vicious circle and whirling round the Ministers. Such is the sad and sickening picture of the inner workings of the present system. There is a silver lining to every cloud and, in the midst of this nauseating cesspool, be it said to the credit and glory of Bengal that there are many honourable exceptions, both amongst the electors and their representatives in the Council.

The body physical requires a true and faithful diagnosis to discover a cancer or a tumour for operation at the hands of the surgeon. The body politic likewise requires a truthful narration of the evils that beset it, if remedy is sought at the hands of the political surgeons, namely, the members of the Commission. This alone has impelled me to place the actual facts that have come under my observation, though I confess I had to do it with a pang of shame for my own countrymen. But the sting is taken away when I recollect that political life in England too, and in other democratic countries has had to emerge from such cesspools and quagmires. In their case it was possible to purge public life, only because there were men who did not shrink from probing the ills to their very depths, and we have to follow their example if we at all desire to see that our political life should be equally purged of such rank evils. Now with these hard facts before us, can we conscientiously advocate any further enlargement of the franchise before a much greater advance has taken place in the general education and political sense of the masses of the electorates? If anything, one would be inclined rather to advocate that the franchise qualifications should be sufficiently raised in order to secure a better class of electors, and one would be more inclined to take this view, having regard to another important fact, namely, the poor percentage even of the present electors that has actually gone to the polls, though it is true that at successive elections the numbers have been increasing.

If however the present qualifications are retained then I would respectfully offer a few suggestions.

(a) That the Corrupt Practices Schedule be thoroughly revised and means adopted to ensure the reduction of corrupt practices to their lowest possible level. There are on the other hand matters which under the present Corrupt Practices Schedule should be removed from that category, as there is nothing wrong in them nor is any moral turpitude involved thereby. I shall illustrate my meaning by giving one instance. Rule 5 of Part II in Schedule V of the Bengal Electorate Rules forbids "The hiring, employment, borrowing or using for the purpose of the election any boat, vehicle, or animal usually kept for letting on hire or for the conveyance of passengers by hire." Now the conditions that prevail in our rural areas as regard communications, as also the habits, inclination and mode of life of the electors, are such that it is next to impossible to get them to go to the polling booths unless the terms of this rule are contravened. As a matter of fact, they are contravened, and honest men are compelled to use subterfuges to avoid the implications of this rule. I therefore suggest the enactment of a Corrupt Practices Act which would carefully go into all and sundry matters and be instrumental in eradicating the main evil, and at the same time not place undue hindrance before honest men.

(b) My next suggestion is the formation of electoral colleges for every sub-division, which will alone be competent to send an allotted number of representatives to the Council. These Colleges will be formed in the following manner :—

Each Union Board, where it exists and each Chowkidari Union where there is no Union Board, should be taken as the primary unit and one or more representatives from each Union Board, or from each Chowkidari Union should be elected as the Secondary Electors of the Electoral College. All Electoral Colleges will contain more or less an equal number of members. In Sub-divisional areas where Moslems predominate, each Union will return a certain number of members to the Electoral College, and the Members so elected will form the Electoral College of that particular Sub-division, for returning a Moslem Member to the Council; whereas in the case of a Hindu or non-Muhammadan Electoral College, the Union Boards of that Sub-division along with the Union Boards of the adjacent Sub-division combined, will elect more or less the same number of members to form the Non-Muhammadan or Hindu Electoral College. In other words, if the constituencies remain just as now, i.e. where Moslem population predominates, a single Sub-division returns a Moslem Member, but two adjacent Sub-divisions, together return a Hindu Member, then Electoral Colleges will also be composed of Members elected from each Union of a Sub-division where Moslem population predominates, but the Unions of two adjacent Sub-divisions will elect Members for a non-Moslem or Hindu Electoral College, and vice versa.

Each of such secondary electors forming the Electoral College is to be elected by all the adult males who pay the chowkidari tax. This system will thus confer practically Universal adult male suffrage, and will be the means of educating the masses in the rudiments of democracy. The elections will be at their doors, and the men so elected will be those who will have the greatest influence in the various Unions, and will command confidence.

The members of the Electoral Colleges so formed will be less liable to corruption and will be more likely eventually to cast their votes in favour of really suitable candidates. Inconveniences, dangers and difficulties that are now experienced owing to the immensely large number of voters, most of whom are illiterate, untrained, and without any political sense, will be considerably minimised. Candidates elected by the Electoral Colleges to the Councils will then have a fair chance of keeping themselves in touch with their constituencies through the members of the Electoral Colleges, who will be in this scheme the secondary electors to the Legislative Councils.

ELECTORAL RULES.

(a) In the present Electoral Rules it is laid down that an illiterate voter is to whisper to the polling officer the name of a particular candidate or candidates for whom he wishes to vote. Having regard to the large number of polling officers that have to be employed, it often becomes necessary to employ Sub-Registrars and even Marriage Registrars to perform the function of polling officers. It is common knowledge that in many instances in the last elections, some of these officers were guilty of improper conduct, inasmuch as they sided with one or other of the candidates, and put cross marks against the names of candidates other than those for whom the particular voters desired to vote. The balloting agency should be radically improved, and some other system of recording should be introduced which will render such malpractices difficult.

(b) In many instances, polling is timed to begin at 10 o'clock, and all voters are required to be within the polling enclosure by 3 p.m. The habit in the mofussil for villagers is to take their day meal at one o'clock, and in cases where voters have to come to the polling booths from a distance of 10 or 12 miles, they often reach there after 4 o'clock, with the result that their votes cannot be recorded. I would, therefore, suggest that the polling hours should be extended to at least 6 p.m.

(c) Moslem voters are particular in saying their Namaz. The Asr prayers have to be said between the hours of 3 to 5 p.m., and Maghrib (evening) prayers in winter at about 5 p.m., and in summer at about 7 p.m. Provision should be made in the case of those electors, who have once entered the polling station, that they may be allowed to say their prayers, and when they have finished they may again be allowed to enter the polling enclosure and record their votes. It has often been brought to my notice that for want of these facilities during the last elections, thousands of Moslem voters who had entered the polling enclosures, and had thereafter gone out to say their prayers, were not allowed to re-enter the enclosures, with the result that their votes were not recorded.

CONSTITUENCIES.

My remarks under this head will be more or less confined to Bengal. In the local Council, at present, there are 114 elected members of whom (a) 39 are returned from Moslem Constituencies.

(b) 46 from non-Muhammadan or rather Hindu Constituencies.
(c) 5 from the landholders from the 5 divisions.
(d) 2 from the two Universities of Dacca and Calcutta.
(e) 4 from the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, the Marwari Association, and the Bengal Mahajan Sabha.
(f) 16 non-official Europeans, and
(g) 2 Anglo-Indians.

There are besides 26 members consisting of officials and nominated non-officials. Now members from (c), (d) and (e) Constituencies are all Hindus, and have always been so with the exception of one term, when the Dacca University sent up a Moslem representative. The ratio of 46 Hindus to 39 Muhammadans was the outcome of the so-called Lucknow Pact between the Congress and the Moslem League. whereby the Moslems of Bengal had 40 per cent. assigned to them of the seats and the Hindus 60 per cent., a proportion which in itself is so unjust that in addition to the protest of the representatives of the community, the Government of India themselves considered it unfair, and added their own protest to it. By this arrangement, a very great wrong was done to the Moslems of Bengal, who form 55 per cent. of the population of the Province, by assigning to them a position of minority, whereas they should have been in the majority in the Council. For the sake of fair dealing, and the British people's reputation for justice, if nothing else, this wrong should be righted, and the Moslems, who form the majority of the population should have assigned to them a majority of the elected Indian seats. This ratio of minority has been further enhanced by the fact that Moslems have never been returned, and can never hope to be returned from (c), (d) and (e) Constituencies. Thus, as things are at present, adding the number of seats from (c), (d) and (e) to the total number of Hindu seats, viz. 46, we get in all 57 Hindu members as against 39 Moslems which raises the disproportion to a much larger extent, and thus practically Moslem representation during all these nine years has been still more reduced.

There seems to be no reason to retain special Constituencies such as (d) and (e), viz., the University Constituencies of Calcutta and Dacca and Indian Commerce. Special representation for Indian Commerce was conceded on the ground that European Commerce was given special representation. If it were done away with in the latter case, the European element in this Province would have had no representation other than the five members from the five divisions. In order to give adequate representation to the European community as a whole, and at the same time to obtain men of a representative character in the community, it was deemed advisable to classify their representation as had been done. The case of Indian Commerce, however, is on an entirely different footing. Every Indian member, for all practical purposes, would always defend Indian commercial interests; particularly is this so in the case of Hindu members, because Indian Commerce is at the present moment largely, if not entirely, in the hands of non-Moslems. Members who desire to take a keen interest in questions affecting Indian Commerce can always come through the general electorate. In the the present Council, too, there are men who are deeply interested in Indian Commerce, such as Babu Nalini Ranjan Sarkar, Abdur Razzak Hadji Abdus Sattar, and others who were returned from the general Constituencies.

The Marwari community, however, stands in a different position, and one seat may be allotted to them as at present.

There are at present two representatives from the two University Constituencies in the Province. These men are in no way essentially connected with the Universities, one of them is a Zemindar and the other, though a graduate, has not maintained any intimate relation with his alma mater since his college days. Thus these representatives cannot be said to represent any special interest in their Constituencies, Therefore it is, if anything, an abuse of special. representation. This state of things is bound to continue so long as the electors of these Constituencies consist, in overwhelming numbers, of young, irresponsible graduates. In fact those who in the present and in the last Council most interested themselves in questions affecting the Universities have been men who were returned by the general Constituencies.

At this further stage of our constitutional progress, there seems to be no cause for retaining any nominated members, except when any special question of a technical nature may arise, one or two experts may be nominated as members. As Dyarchy must necessarily be scrapped, there will be no members of the Executive Council as ex-officio members of the Legislature. The Cabinet will consist only of Ministers appointed from the elected members of the Council and the Local Senate. The present size of the Constituencies may be reduced by half so that, roughly speaking, the total number of members will be double the present number forming the Council. The Council will thus consist of 280 members divided as follows :—

(b) Hindus.
(e) Anglo-Indians.
(f) Depressed Class and Labour.
(g) Marwaris.

Now in fixing the proportionate representation of the above Constituencies, it will be helpful to consider the Census figures of Moslems, Hindus and the Depressed classes. I append below a table taken from the Census of 1921 :—

		In Round Figures.
Moslems		2,52,00,000
Caste Hindus :
(a) Brahmin	13,00,000
(b) Kayastha	13,00,000
(c) Baidya	1,00,000
(d) Rajput	1,25,000
(e) Buddhist and Jain ..	2,80,000
		31,05,000
Depressed and Untouchables :
(a) Kaibatta	26,00,000
(b) Namasudra	20,00,000
(c) Rajbanshi	17,00,000
(d) Bagdi	9,00,000
(e) Santal	7,00,000
(f) And other minor groups	95,00,000
		1,74,00,000

Thus it will be seen that the caste Hindus, including the Buddhists and the Jains, come to thirty-one lakhs and five thousand, whereas the Depressed Classes come to one hundred and seventy-four lakhs. The total of these two come to two hundred five lakhs and five thousand, whereas the Moslem population is two hundred fifty-two lakhs. I have already stressed that representation should be mainly on the population basis as between Hindus and Moslems in Bengal and the Punjab. But as between caste Hindus and the Depressed Classes in Bengal, having regard to the disparity of the figures of their respective population, it will be perhaps necessary to give larger representation to caste Hindus beyond what is due to them, in view of their social standing and political importance.

It will be open to the Governor to appoint, in addition, one or two members as experts as occasion arises.

AUTONOMY.

Central.—The Government of India will have complete autonomy in all subjects classified as Central with the exception of Subjects 1–5 of that Classification, viz. :—

(1) Defence of India and all matters connected therewith.
(2) External relations, including naturalisation and aliens and pilgrimages beyond India.
(3) Relations with States in India.
(4) Political charges.
(5) Communications to the extent described as at present.

The Secretary of State under the Crown will retain control only over the subjects detailed above, and in all other respects the Central Government will be free from control and interference.

Provincial.—Provincial Governments will have complete autonomy in all subjects classified as " Provincial " at present.

The Classification of subjects into Central and Provincial as at present determined may perhaps stand with slight modifications as under :—

(a) The present Classifications apparently have been made with considerable care, but one or two matters deserve consideration.

Meston Award.—I purposely refrain from dilating on the Meston Award, because it is a matter which has been pressed not only in all Memoranda from Bengal but also in the Government Memorandum as well. The Meston Award has been one of the main causes of crippling all activities in Bengal and of starving the Transferred Departments. It has been the one spectre that has been haunting like a bogy every Ministry that has come into existence. What I wish to point out is that, even with the revision of the Meston Award, the finances of Bengal compare very unfavourably with those of other provinces, whereas our needs and wants in the co-called Nation-building Departments are in certain respects even greater than elsewhere in India. Education is at a very low ebb. The most malignant epidemics such as Cholera, Kala Azar, and Malaria, are responsible for millions of deaths annually, whereas they are all more or less preventible diseases, but cannot be tackled for want of funds. The scarcity of pure drinking water in our rural areas is increasingly adding to the general death roll. In short the Department of Public Health is at present being more or less starved. On the other hand Bengal is the home of Jute. The revenue derived from Jute goes more or less wholly to the Central Government and Bengal scarcely gets anything in return for the same. I am therefore inclined to recommend that from subject 11 under the head of Central Subjects, the duties on Jute and the revenue from Income tax should be transferred to the Provinces. If both these items cannot be transferred we strongly press that at least the duties on Jute should be surrendered. It is the minimum reparation that is due to Bengal. Not only is Jute the peculiar product of Bengal, but revenue from it is derived from the sweat and toil of its teeming millions.

(b) Subject 20 of the List of Central Subjects relates to the development of Industries. In this connection I may say that Provincial Governments ought to have complete autonomy with regard to all Provincial Industries.

Provincial Councils and Composition of Cabinet. In the case of Provincial Legislatures the Governor will select his Ministers from among the members of the Provincial Council as well as the Senate and they will hold office with joint responsibility and will be responsible to the Council. There shall be at least two Ministers appointed from the Provincial Senate.

Number of Ministers. The number of Ministers should be seven, who will be selected from the important communities according to their representation in the Council.

There will be no Reserved Subjects. All subjects, other than those classified as "Central," will be distributed amongst the members of the Cabinet with the exception perhaps of Law and Order.

Term of the Council. The term of the Council will be five years.

Governor's Powers. The powers exercised by the Governor under the Act will be curtailed and will be defined.

The Permanent Officials, viz., the Secretaries, will have their powers equally defined.

Minister's Powers. Powers which Ministers possess under the present India Act will be enhanced and will likewise be defined.

Continuity of Policy. There should be some convention for the continuity of policy in the Departments, so that schemes and works of public utility started by one or one set of Minister may not be pigeonholed with the change of Minister or Ministry.

During the first three years of the Montford Reforms the Ministry remained in Office in Bengal without any change, with the result that some of the schemes initiated by that Ministry could be carried to fruition. During the next three years, however, when the Swarajya Party, led by the late Mr. C. R. Das, came into being, from the very beginning of the formation of the Ministry onslaughts were launched and there were constant changes, with the result that no work of any value could be turned out, and what schemes and policies were initiated were shelved one after the other.

Water Hyacinth Problem. During the third term the same story repeated itself. I might here quote my own experience. During my recent term of office, I had the privilege of initiating many schemes for the material welfare of my countrymen. Take for instance, the campaign against Water Hyacinth. For many years past this pest had been making woeful ravages in our countryside; the figures obtained in 1926 showed that in the case of one district alone, namely, Faridpur, the damage caused to agriculture amounted to over 40 lakhs of rupees. Faridpur has been very badly affected, but taking half of that figure, namely, 20 lakhs of rupees as the average amount of damage done to a district in Bengal and multiplying that figure by the number of districts, namely, 26, we get roughly over 4 crores of damage done annually to Agriculture alone, not to speak of the damage done to Commerce, Trade and our Waterway Communications. Since 1921, that is, from the commencement of the Montford Reforms, investigations have been made, experiments carried out, and schemes formulated as to how best to tackle this problem, namely, the eradication of of this pest. In 1924, certain chemical preparations, known as Griffiths Spray, were experimented upon, and after more than a year's labour they were found wanting. Thereafter a special Officer was deputed to carry on investigations of a different nature, and this Officer submitted a detailed report. This Report was considered, the file was noted upon, schemes were evolved, and finally in the beginning of 1927, when I was in Office, it was considered necessary to hold a Water Hyacinth Conference and to invite representative men from all sections of the House, as well as outside, in order once for all to devise means and start work. The then Collector of Faridpur, Mr. Burrows, who had spent a large amount of time and had devoted a considerable amount of labour to this question, submitted in all essentials a perfectly workable scheme which entailed the imposition of a Water Hyacinth Tax. It was therefore considered necessary to take the representatives of the people into confidence in order that they too might pronounce on the desirability or otherwise of the tax, so that eventually when the time came for the levying of the tax there might not be any opposition. The Conference was a great success and everything was made ready in order that a Bill might be introduced at the ensuing session of the Council, so that actual work towards fighting this pest might be begun from the cold weather of 1927–28, but Nemesis overtook the Ministry and the Ministry was hounded out of office in August 1927. Thereafter the scheme, which had the sanction of the people behind it, was shelved.

Similarly, the campaign against cholera, the scheme for the improvement of the cattle of this Province, and the throwing wide-open of the doors of the agricultural profession to the sons of the "Bhadra logs," the spreading of medical education by establishing medical schools and colleges in our district headquarters, and various other schemes initiated during my Ministry have been equally shelved. It will, therefore, I trust, be realised how essential it is in the interest not only of the efficiency of the departments, but also in the interest of the well-being of our country and our unfortunate countrymen that provision must be made for a continuity of policy, so that schemes prepared by a Minister or a Ministry may be carried on. It is true that the permanent Departments ensure a certain amount of continuity, but this is not enough.

Adverse Vote. It has been already stated in the Preamble that no efficient government is at all possible where the Executive is liable to removal every now and again, as has been the case in Bengal, where Ministers have been hounded out of office for no reason of policy or on no public grounds, but merely owing to personal jealousies and other causes outside the sphere of Constitutional Government. The Executive, that is the Cabinet, should always be able to count on the probability of remaining in office for some appreciable time; and although in my scheme as detailed herein I have advocated that the Cabinet should be responsible to the Council, it should not be made possible for the overthrow of the Cabinet on any flimsy ground, or on any snap vote, or by methods that have been in vogue here during these years. The adverse vote entailing the resignation of the Cabinet should also ordinarily entail the dissolution of the Council, followed by a General Election, unless there are very strong grounds to the contrary. It may also be laid down that the Executive shall be removable by a vote of no-confidence provided that such a motion is carried by two-thirds of the total strength of the Legislature.

The Provincial Government and desirability of a Second Chamber. The Provincial Legislature will be bi-cameral, consisting of :—

(a) The Provincial Senate.
(b) The Legislative Council.

Provincial Senate. The Indian Provinces forming the sub-continent of India are inhabited by heterogeneous races, peoples and communities with different traditions and culture. These various sections of the people differ from each other not only educationally, socially and economically, but in a hundred other ways. A long time must therefore, elapse before they could be moulded into a common nationhood or before their diverse interests could be reduced to one and the same level.

The Provincial Legislative Council, when further popularised, will be more or less ruled by the majority, and the result will be more than likely that irresponsible legislation may often be enacted which will encroach upon the rights of the minorities. This in its turn is likely to further augment communal strife. A situation of this kind can be controlled, if almost unlimited powers be assigned to the Governor for the purpose of vetoing or withholding his consent from any legislation or administrative measure which he has reason to believe to be contrary to the interests of the population as a whole. But by vesting in the Governor such extensive powers the relation between him and the popular Council will always be strained, which is highly undesirable. Therefore, as a check on the popular Council, the creation of a Second Chamber, i.e., a Provincial Senate, seems perfectly essential. Even in the highly advanced countries of Europe it has been found necessary to establish an Upper House as a safeguard against occasional irresponsible legislation in the Lower House. Much more will it, therefore, be necessary to provide for a check of a similar kind in our Provinces, which are politically so much behind other countries in the West. I, therefore, strongly recommend the creation of a Second Chamber which will be composed of representative men of outstanding merit, proportionately gathered from all communities. They will be drawn from the classes who have large stakes in the country, who are leaders of thought or who have had experience in administration as high officials, and generally from the clear-headed conservative element in the country who really count.

The Provincial Senate of Bengal will, therefore, consist of :—

(i) 20 Nominated Members.
(ii) 40 Elected Members.

The term of the Senate will be ten years.

The Governor will make the nominations as far as possible from men of outstanding merit and competence amongst the titled or the landed gentry, as well as ex-Ministers of Government and retired high officials, keeping in view as far as possible the proportionate representation of all communities.

The elected members will be elected six from each of the five divisions and ten from (c) and (d) below.

The constituencies to consist of :—

(a) Moslems.
(b) Non-Moslems.
(c) Landholders.

Both the Legislative Council and the Provincial Senate shall have collateral powers. Any Bill may be introduced in either of the Houses, but will not be passed into an Act unless passed by both the Houses and until it has received the assent of the Governor. It will be competent to introduce any Bill at a joint-session of both the Houses.

Qualifications of a Minister. In the appointment of Members of the existing Executive Councils and of Ministers, experience ranging over a large number of years has shown that sufficient discrimination has not been exercised. It appears that proper care has not always been taken in selecting the personnel of the existing Executive Councils as well as of the different Ministries. The composition of the Executive Councils has been heterogeneous and the same may be said of the Ministers under Dyarchy. The Governor is supposed to select those who are fairly well-educated and who may be expected to enjoy the confidence not only of their fellow-Legislators, but also of the public generally, and who possess a fair measure of ability and also a reputation for character. In some cases, I regret to say, no such consideration has prevailed.

I shall first take the case of the Civilian Executive Councillors, the appointment of whom has here and there been open to grave objection. The objection was, that admitting that higher appointments need not necessarily go by seniority, civilians believed to be of liberal and progressive views, or who have not had the advantage of belonging to a special coterie inside the official hierarchy, have often been passed over in favour of men known to be diehards or reactionaries or even of mediocre attainments.

In the report on Indian Constitutional Reforms, under the ægis of Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford, it will be found stated :—" We are aware that in the past the nominations made to the Executives have not always given satisfaction. There has been a disposition to regard the men appointed as chosen because they are ' safe ' and not likely to give the Government trouble, and if the Legislature and Executive are to work smoothly together it is, we agree, necessary to make appointments which command confidence and ensure efficiency and ability." Further, it is also stated :—" In making the nominations the Governor should be free to take into consideration the names of persons who had won distinction, whether in the Legislative Council or in other fields." From this it can leave no doubt that Members of the Cabinet should be chosen from men who, to quote the memorable words of the late Queen Empress Victoria's proclamation of 1858, " by their integrity, ability and character may be qualified to discharge their duties successfully as occupants of the exalted offices to which they are called." Failure in this respect has brought home the conviction amongst the Indian intelligentsia that appointments made particularly of Indians, either in the Executive Councils or the Ministries, have not unoften been made in contravention of this test. Cases can be quoted of men who have been appointed as Executive Councillors or Ministers simply because they were believed to be " safe " rather than qualified. The appointment of such persons has, naturally, brought into lurid light the working of Dyarchy to a much larger extent than would otherwise have been the case.

Even when making the appointment of a clerk in any private office the question of his ability and character is taken into consideration. It seems short of a tragedy that, when making appointments to the highest offices under the Crown, such consideration should occasionally be left out of account. I am, therefore, impelled to make the suggestion that some sort of provision should be made whereby when making appointment to the highest offices in the land, questions of the suitability of the candidate as to his integrity, ability and character should be taken into consideration besides other factors.

Qualifications of a Member of Legislature. The above remarks apply also to those who aspire to be the Members of the Legislatures, perhaps, though, not to such an extent. The minimum of qualifications of candidates who stand for election to the various Legislatures should also be determined. As the rules are at present, it is provided that a person who is a minor, or insane, or who has served a criminal sentence on account of his moral turpitude, etc., would not be eligible to stand as a candidate for election; but nowhere is it laid down what his positive qualifications should be by way of ability, integrity and character. The result of this omission has been that in many cases men, who outside the Council would not be allowed to cross the threshold of an honest person, have got into the Council and have secured access to social intercourse on equal terms with those who would otherwise have shunned them. Here is a case in point. Moulvi Mahammad Sadique, an inhabitant of the Noakhali District, had, as Chairman or Vice-Chairman of a local Board, embezzled some public funds. He stood for election to the Council and was returned. Thereafter the case came to a head. There was a conviction in the Criminal Court, which was upheld by the High Court, and he served the sentence of eight months with hard labour on three counts concurrently. His seat thereafter was declared vacant, but, strangely enough, not because of his conviction, but simply because he was absent from the Council for two consecutive months.

It will, therefore, be seen that some provision by way of determination of minimum qualifications of candidates for election to the Legislatures should be provided for.

THE GROWTH OF PARTIES.

Since the inauguration of the Reforms, in 1921, no organised party other than the Swaraj party created by the late Mr. C. R. Das, has come into existence.

The Congress organisation was known in the eighties and the nineties as a Liberal party in India with Nationalistic aspirations endeavouring to obtain concessions from the British people and Parliament in order to liberalise the Indian Constitution as far as possible on the British model. In the old days the Congress counted amongst its stalwarts such men as Mr. Gopalkrishna Gokhale, Sir Ferozeshah Mehta, Sir Surendranath Banerjee, Sir Badaruddin Tyabji and others. They in a manner dominated the counsels of the Congress and were the pioneers of India's Constitutional progress. They confined their agitation within the four corners of the Constitution with the basic idea that India should always remain within the British Commonwealth. Then the younger generations gradually lifted up their heads, and under the lead of Mr. Balgangadhar Tilak the Congress was split into two wings known as Extremist and Liberal or Moderate. Within a short time the extreme wing usurped all powers within the Congress with the result that the Moderates or the so-called Liberals for a time seceded from the Congress. Although thereafter there was a reunion, the Congress remained generally under the extremist domination when the late Mr. C. R. Das, leaving aside his professional career, took solely to politics and became one of the leading lights. The Congress was once more destined to be swamped by another and more vigorous political party that rose under the leadership of Mr. Gandhi, who inaugurated his famous non-co-operation movement, which entirely dominated the Congress and captured all its executive functions. Under Mr. Gandhi's banner there foregathered various discontented and disappointed individuals such as the Ali Brothers, who became his staunch henchmen and started a vigorous propaganda in order to win over the Moslems, who had so far mostly kept themselves out of the Congress fold. The stars were propitious at that particular juncture. Turkey went against the Allies, and the Moslem lieutenants of Mr. Gandhi seized the opportunity of misleading the Moslems by the cry that religion and the Khelafat were in danger. Thus the Ali Brothers started another wing of the non-co-operation movement under the nomenclature of the "Khelafatist." During the first reformed Council of 1921–23, the non-co-operation movement at one time seemed to dominate the entire political situation, and with the boycott of the Council very few Congress Hindus came in. Those that came formed the opposition and their policy was merely anti-Government. Politically-minded Moslems, too, out of fear of the Khelafatists shunned the Councils and mostly mediocre men amongst them were returned. These had no programme of their own nor they found it necessary to form into parties. On one occasion, however, during the introduction of the Calcutta Municipal Corporation Bill when the Hindus objected to the facilities that were proposed to be given to the Moslems under the Bill as introduced by Sir Surendranath Banerjee, two sharply-defined parties came into existence in the Bengal Council, but that was entirely on the communal basis and their party activities ceased after the passing of the Bill. Soon after, Mr. C. R. Das conceived the plan of non-co-operating within the Council, i.e., of entering the Council with the avowed intention of obstructing the entire machinery of Government from within. With this object he added a rider to the Gandhi non-co-operation cult and along with other provincial leaders such as Pandit Motilal Nehru and others seceded from Mr. Gandhi and established the Swarajya Party. This came into being after the general election of 1923. Mr. C. R. Das himself led the movement in Bengal and left it to the Pandits to do likewise in the Central and other provincial Legislatures. In the second Reformed Council, therefore, of 1924, Mr. C. R. Das came in with a following of some fifty members of whom about half were Moslems. He drew to his side the major portion of the Moslem element in the Council with the help of his famous Bengal Deshbandhu Pact which purported to give to the Moslems 80 per cent. of State patronage and assured them their special electorates, as well as total non-interference in their religious pursuits including "No Music before Mosque." His avowed object was to hinder the working of the Reforms by means fair or foul. This policy, unfortunately, gave a fillip to undesirable practices in the Council, as has already been noticed.

Of the total of 39 Moslem members of the Council, 23 or 24 being Swarajists, the remaining 15 or 16 non-Swarajist Moslems, together with 10 or 12 Liberal Hindus formed the Ministerial Party in January, 1924, when myself and Messrs. Fuzl ul Huq and S. N. Mullick were appointed Ministers. A short while after, the Hindu Minister had to resign as he lost his seat owing to the dispute that was pending over his election which entailed a fresh election, when he was not returned. There remained thereafter only two Moslem Ministers. In the propaganda against the Ministry, though the Swarajist Party did not admit it, yet they took advantage of the communal bias engendered by the presence of only Moslem Ministers. It was openly said in certain quarters that owing to the presence of three Moslems in the Government, Bengal was practically under Muhammadan domination. Hence, the closing up of ranks and resolute determination to wreck the Moslem Ministry were demonstrated by some of the Hindu members of the Council. But even from this demonstration the majority of Muhammadan members failed to grasp the necessary object lesson, and this Ministry was finally wrecked in August, 1924. In March, 1925, another Ministry consisting of Nawab Bahadur Syed Nawabali Choudhury and Raja M. N. Ray Choudhury was formed, but it only lasted for nine or ten days. Thereafter the Transferred Subjects were retransferred to the Reserved side and Dyarchy remained dead in Bengal till January, 1927. Thus, with the exception of the Swarajya Party the Hindu Liberals and the Moslems remained as disorganised as ever.

Central Moslem Council Party. During the general election at the end of 1926, the Central National Muhammadan Association first conceived the idea of organising a Central Moslem Council Party, and with this object they set up a large number of candidates for contesting the elections. As a result they managed to capture some nineteen or twenty seats with the help of their organisation and party funds. Overtures were made to Sir Abdur Rahim to bring about a consolidated Moslem Council Party. For reasons into which I do not desire to enter, Sir Abdur Rahim stood apart, and some eight or nine Moslems were returned under his banner. Of the remaining ten or eleven Moslem members, one came as a Swarajist and the rest without any party label. After the election was over, in December, 1926, a fresh attempt was made to bring together all the Moslem members into one party, but owing to personal animosities and jealousies among the leaders this failed. Thus during the beginning of the present Council, in January, 1927, there existed :—

(b) the Central Moslem Council Party, led by me, consisting of 24 Moslems,
(c) Sir Abdur Rahim's party, consisting of 8 or 9 members,
(d) 6 or 7 individual no-party Moslems,
(e) 12 or 13 disorganised so-called Hindu Liberals or Moderates.

The action of Lord Lytton in appointing Sir Abdur Rahim as Minister and asking him to resign after four days owing to his failure in finding a Hindu colleague was the root cause of creating further jealousies and personal animosities, and when another ministry was formed with myself and Mr. Chakravarty, Sir Abdur Rahim with his following joined the Swarajists and that ministry was also wrecked.

With the exception of the Swarajya Party, this led to a complete disruption of all other Indian groups in the Council.

The Union Party. Immediately after this catastrophe it was felt extremely essential that a party should be formed of both Hindus and Moslems, not only to promote communal concord, but primarily to purge the public life of Bengal of undesirable practices and to raise its tone. With that object Hindu and Moslem Landholders and men who were considered above board grouped together and formed into what is known as the Union Party, with Sir P. C. Mitter and myself as Patrons.

The Non-Official European Group. Besides the above parties there has always been a compact non-official European and Anglo-Indian group. This bloc has almost always voted with the Government and has seldom exercised any discrimination.

Thus it will be seen that we are still infants in the art of party Government and political organisation.

SAFEGUARDS.

I have already stated that the Moslems of India are equally, if not more than other communities, interested in the general question of the extension of the Reforms, but they emphatically press that provision should be made by Statute for certain essential safeguards, without which they are not only opposed to any extension of the Reforms, but even to the continuance of what Reforms there are already. In all the Memoranda submitted by the various Moslem Associations throughout India a case has been made out in great detail for the following items, and I need only enumerate them here without entering into detail. These are classed below under heading "I." As regards those which concern conditions prevailing in Bengal, I have to enlarge upon them to some extent and they have been treated under heading "II."

I.

(1) Separate electorates in all the Provincial Legislatures according to the Congress-Moslem League Pact of 1916, where Moslems are in a minority but, in Bengal and Punjab, on the basis of population.
(2) Separate communal electorates for the Central Legislatures, as well as on all self-governing bodies in the country.
(3) Representation by statutory provision of a due proportion of Moslems in the Cabinets. In the case of Bengal I have recommended a Cabinet consisting of seven Ministers, who will be selected from the important communities according to their representation in the Council.
(4) Moslem representation in the Assembly or the Council of State to be 33 per cent. of all elected Indian seats.
(5) Proportionate State Aid for the furtherance of educational progress amongst the Moslems and where possible preferential treatment, having regard to the backwardness of education amongst them.
(6) Adequate representation on Universities and all local self-governing bodies.
(7) In the interests of all communities, Hindu or Moslem, provision should be made that no resolution should be proceeded with in the different Legislatures or in any of the different self-governing bodies affecting the religious, social or educational interest of any community whatsoever, if the same be opposed by at least two-thirds of the members of that community on those bodies.
(8) Commissions in the Army and Navy should be allotted in proportion to the strength of the respective communities, and arrangements for their military and naval training be duly made.
(9) Indianisation should not be proceeded with to the detriment of any particular community, but should be carried out gradually with due regard to the communal proportion and by securing the widest possible confidence in the administration and preventing a communal or class monopoly.
(10) The Reforms should be extended to the North-West Frontier Province.
(11) Sind should be raised to the status of a Province under the Reforms.

II.

Representation of different communities in all the Public Services should be in accordance with the proportion which a community bears to the population of the Province. The average representation of Moslems throughout India should not be less than one-third.

The Mussulman case in Bengal is based not on the dicta of any Moslem but on the findings of that great statistician, Sir William Hunter, of the Indian Civil Service. Before one can realise fully their claim to a just and legitimate share of State patronage by virtue of their preponderance in population, and their historic position, it is necessary to take an economic survey of their condition during the last eighty or ninety years. For this I can do no better than quote from Sir William Hunter's "Indian Mussulman." Writing in 1871 this was what Sir William said: "The English obtained Bengal simply as the Chief Revenue Officer of the Delhi Emperor . . ." Our legal title was simply that of the Emperor's Dewan or Chief Revenue Officer. As such the Mussulmans hold that we were bound to carry out the Muhammadan system which we then undertook to administer. There can be little doubt, I think, that both parties to the Treaty at the time understood this. For some years the English maintained the Muhammadan Officers in their posts, and when they began to venture upon reforms, they did so with a caution bordering upon timidity. The greatest blow which we dealt to the old system was in one sense an underhanded one, for neither the English nor the Muhammadans foresaw its effects. This was the series of changes introduced by Lord Cornwallis and John Shore, ending in the Permanent Settlement of 1793. By it we usurped the functions of those higher Mussulman Officers who had formerly subsisted between the actual Collector and the Government, and whose dragoons were the recognised machinery for enforcing the Land-Tax. Instead of the Mussulman Revenue-farmers with their troopers and spearmen, we placed an English Collector in each District, with an unarmed fiscal police attached like common bailiffs to his Court. The Muhammadan nobility either lost their former connection with the Land-Tax or became mere landholders, with an inelastic title to a part of the profits of the soil.

"The Permanent Settlement, however, consummated rather than introduced this change. It was in another respect that it most seriously damaged the position of the great Muhammadan Houses. The officer who has studied the Permanent Settlement most minutely writes thus:—'It elevated the Hindu Collectors, who up to that time had held but unimportant posts, to the position of landholders, gave them a proprietary right in the soil, and allowed them to accumulate wealth which would have gone to the Mussulmans under their own Rule.

"This, then, is the first public wrong on which the Muhammadan aristocracy arraign the British Government. They assert that we obtained the Administration of Bengal from a Mussulman Emperor on the understanding that we would carry out the Mussulman system, and that as soon as we found ourselves strong enough we broke through this engagement. We shut the Mussulman aristocracy out of the Army, because we believed that their exclusion was necessary to our own safety. We deprived them of the monopoly of the most lucrative functions in the Administration, because their deprivation was essential to the welfare and just government of the people. But these grounds, however good in themselves, fail to convince an ancient nobility suffering under the blight of British Rule. Their exclusion from the Army seems to the Mussulmans a great public wrong; our departure from their ancient fiscal system, an absolute breach of faith.

"The third source of their greatness was their monopoly of Judicial, Political, or in brief, Civil Employ. It would be unfair to lay much stress on the circumstance, but it is nevertheless a significant fact, that none of the native gentlemen who have won their way into the Covenanted Civil Service, or up to the bench of the High Court, are Mussulmans. But for some time after the country passed under our care, the Mussulmans retained all the functions of Government in their own hands. Mussulman Collectors, as we have seen, gathered the Land-Tax; Mussulman Faujdars and Ghatwals officered the Police. A great Mussulman Department, with its headquarters in the Nizam's palace at Murshidabad, and a network of officials spreading over every District in the Province, administered the Criminal Law.

"For the first fifty years of the Company's Rule the Mussulmans had the lion's share of State patronage. During its second half century of power the tide turned, at first slowly, but with a constantly accelerating pace, as the imperative duty of conducting public business in the vernacular of the people, and not in the foreign patois of its former Muhammadan conquerors, became recognised. Then the Hindus poured into, and have since completely filled, every grade of official life. Even in the District Collectorates, where it is still possible to give appointments in the old-fashioned friendly way, there are very few young Mussulman officials. The Muhammadans who yet remain in them are white-bearded men, and have no successors. Even ten years ago, the Mussulmans invariably managed to transmit the post of Nazir, or Chief of the Revenue Bailiffs, to men of their own creed; but now one or two unpopular appointments about the jail are the most the former masters of India can hope for. The staff of clerks attached to the various offices, the responsible posts in the Courts, and even the higher offices in the Police, are now recruited from the pushing Hindu youth of the Government School. The net result has been that the Mussulman element in the Public Services has gone on growing weaker every year.

"This statement the following statistics will prove. In the highest grade in which the appointments dated from a previous generation, the Muhammadans did not have much to complain of, as in April, 1869, there was one Mussulman to two Hindus: there is now but one Mussulman to three Hindus. In the second grade there were then two Muhammadans to nine Hindus; there is now one Mussulman to ten Hindus. In the third grade there were then four Mussulmans to a total of twenty-seven Hindus and Englishmen; there are now three Mussulmans to a total of twenty-four Hindus and Englishmen. Passing down to the lower ranks, there were in 1869 four Mussulmans among a total of thirty of all creeds; there are now four among a total of thirty-nine. Among the probationers from whom the service is recruited, there were only two Mussulmans in a total of twenty-eight; there is now not a single Muhammadan in this rank.

"It is, however, in the less conspicuous Departments, in which the distribution of patronage is less keenly watched by the political parties in Bengal, that we may read the fate of the Mussulmans. In 1869 these Departments were filled thus:—In the three grades of Assistant Government Engineers there were fourteen Hindus and not one Mussulman; among the apprentices there were four Hindus and two Englishmen, and not one Mussulman. Among the sub-Engineers and Supervisors of the Public Works Department there were twenty-four Hindus to one Mussulman; among the Overseers, two Mussulmans to sixty-three Hindus. In the offices of Account there were fifty names of Hindus, and not one Mussulman; and in the Upper Subordinate Department there were twenty-two Hindus, and again not one Mussulman.

"But it is unnecessary to multiply instances of a fact that is patent in every page of the Civil List. I have made up a table of the gazetted appointments for which Englishmen, Muhammadans and Hindus are alike eligible:—

"A hundred years ago, the Mussulmans monopolised all the important offices of State. The Hindus accepted with thanks such crumbs as their former conquerors dropped from their table, and the English were represented by a few factors and clerks. The proportion of Muhammadans to Hindus, as shown above, is now less than one-seventh. The proportion of Hindus to Europeans is more than one-half; the proportion of Mussulmans to Europeans is less than one-fourteenth. The proportion of the race which a century ago had the monopoly of Government, has now fallen to less than one twenty-third of the whole administrative body. This, too, is the gazetted appointments, where the distribution of patronage is closely watched. In the less conspicuous office establishments in the Presidency Town, the exclusion of Mussulmans is even more complete. In one extensive Department the other day it was discovered that there was not a single employee who could read the Mussulman dialect; and, in fact, there is now scarcely a Government office in Calcutta in which a Muhammadan can hope for any post above the rank of porter, messenger, filler of inkpots, and mender of pens.

"From the highest official to the lowest there was now a firm conviction that we have failed in our duty to the Muhammadan subjects of the Queen. A great section of the Indian population, some thirty million in number, finds itself decaying under British rule. They who but yesterday were the conquerors and governors of the land, can find no subsistence in it to-day. Before the country passed under our rule the Mussulmans professed the same faith, ate the same food and in all essentials led the same life as they do now. To this day they exhibit at intervals their old intense feeling of nationality and capability of warlike enterprise; but in all other respects they are a race ruined under British rule. It is not that they have ceased to retain the entire State patronage, but that they are gradually being excluded from it altogether. It is not that they must now take an equal chance with the Hindus in the race of life, but that, at least in Bengal, they have ceased to have a chance at all.

"The administration of the Imperial Taxes was the first great source of income in Bengal and the Mussulman aristocracy monopolised it. The Police was another great source of income and the Police was officered by Muhammadans. The Courts of Law were a third great source of income, and the Mussulman monopolised them. Above all, there was the Army, a great confederation of conquerors who enrolled their peasantry into troops and drew pay from the State for them as soldiers. A hundred and seventy years ago it was almost impossible for a well-born Mussulman in Bengal to become poor. At present it is almost impossible for him to continue rich.

"For some time after the country passed under our care, the Mussulmans retained all the functions of Government in their own hands. Then the Hindus poured into, and have since completely filled, every grade of official life. The truth is that when the country passed under our rule the Mussulmans were the superior race, and superior not only in stoutness of heart and strength of arm, but in power of political organisation and the science of practical Government. Yet the Muhammadans are now shut out equally from Government employ and from the higher occupation of non-official life. Before the country passed to us they were not only the political, but the intellectual power of India. They possessed a system of education, which, however inferior to that which we have established, was yet by no means to be despised and was capable of affording a high degree of intellectual training and polish, and which was infinitely superior to any system of education then existing in India.

"At an outlay of £800,000 upon Resumption proceedings, additional revenue of £300,000 a year was permanently gained by the State. A large part of this sum was derived from the lands held rent free by the Mussulmans or by Mussulman foundations. Hundreds of ancient families were ruined, and the educational system of the Mussulmans, which was almost entirely maintained by rent free grants, received its death blow. The justice of these proceedings may, however, be defended, but the absolute misappropriation of scholastic funds cannot. It is painful to dwell on this charge of misappropriation, because it is impossible to rebut it.

"The astute Hindu in this as in all other matters has been first in the field. He has covered the country with schools admirably adapted to the wants of his own community, but wholly unsuited to the requirements of the Muhammadans."

Such is the picture of Moslem decadence in Bengal as drawn by Sir William Hunter in 1871. I shall now quote from a speech that I delivered on the 13th June, 1926, when I presided over a gathering of more than 100,000 persons.

"Such has been the treatment meted out to the Moslems for generations together till the advent of one of the greatest of Viceroys, viz., Lord Curzon, who had the fairness and far-sightedness to see that some reparation was long overdue to them. It was thus with the Partition of Bengal, the province of Eastern Bengal and Assam came into being and was declared a settled fact under a pledge given to Moslems. But, alas! the settled fact was once more doomed to be unsettled, and the promise given was once more broken. And it broke too the stout heart of that great man, the late lamented Nawab Sir Salimullah Bahadur of Dacca, who was at once a tower of strength to the Government and a tower of strength to his people. The impetus, which the Moslem Community received at that epoch towards advancement and progress, received a rude set-back, and clouds again darkened the Moslem horizon. Soon after, there came the Great War and in its wake followed the non-co-operation movement started by Mr. Gandhi. After the previous repeated disappointments, Moslems in their thousands succumbed to its allurements, hoping that, by joining its ranks and throwing their political lot with the Hindus, they would be able to retrieve their past fortunes, but, alas, only to meet with further disappointment."

There can be no growth of nationhood, or for the matter of that real self-government in Bengal or in India unless the all-important factor, namely, real Hindu-Moslem Unity is present, but it is no use attempting to bring about Hindu-Moslem Unity without removing the root causes that underlie the strained relations between the two communities. For want of removal of these causes, jealousy and hatred seem to permeate through all the sub-strata of the lives of the two communities.

In the administration of the country we find a spirit of complete isolation pervading the members of both the communities in respect of one another. In an office filled by Hindus there is seldom a vacancy for a Moslem uuless the head of the department happens to be a European or an absolutely unbiassed Hindu officer. In a School Library controlled by a Hindu Headmaster there is hardly a book by a Moslem author which can get access there. This is the state of Hindu-Moslem feeling in the country, which is aggravated by the manner in which all Government patronage is enjoyed by one community as compared with the other.

Distribution of State Patronage in Bengal in 1923–1924. I have already quoted Sir William Hunter to show what the distribution of State patronage in Bengal was in 1871. I shall now give figures to show what it is in recent times. The figures below are taken from the statistics of 1923–24.

In the executive branch of the Provincial Service there are 75 per cent. Hindus and 4 per cent. Muhammadans, in the Excise Department 69 per cent. Hindus and 31 per cent. Muhammadans, in the Education Department 80 per cent. Hindus and 20 per cent. Muhammadans, in the Agricultural Department 95 per cent. Hindus and 5 per cent. Muhammadans, in the Medical Department 97½ per cent. Hindus and 2½ per cent. Muhammadans, in the Public Works Department out of a total of 41 Indian appointments there is only one Muhammadan, in the Forest, Marine, and Irrigation Departments, leaving out the non-Indian appointments there are 100 per cent. Hindus to 0 per cent. Muhammadans.

During the regime of Lord Carmichael, in 1913, Government laid down that 33 per cent. of appointments in the Public Services should go to Moslems. A decade afterwards it was found that not only was that percentage not reached but that in some departments the Moslem element was conspicuous by its absence altogether, and in other Departments the percentage reached was nowhere like the 33 per cent. contemplated and laid down in the Provincial Government Rules.

The question, therefore, in all its bearings, was reconsidered during the regime of Lord Lytton towards the end of 1925 and two formulæ were then laid down and accepted by the Government as a whole. They were :—

(a) Proportion of Moslems in the Public Services not necessarily in accordance with but on the basis of population. " That it is the duty of the Government to take measures to ensure that there shall be in the future a sufficient proportion of Muhammadans in certain of the higher services to ensure that the general interests of the community shall not suffer and that the activities of Government as a whole shall be for the benefit of the whole population ; that this proportion shall be fixed, not necessarily in accordance with, but on the basis of population ; that with regard to the subordinate appointments a sufficient share is allotted to the Muhammadans to encourage the education of that community and to prevent the monopoly of public employment by any one class or community."

(b) " That in the case of promotions within a service or from one service to another there can be no question of communal interests and promotions must be based on merit alone or on merit combined with seniority as the case may be."

It was also further laid down that " each department must be consulted as regards the percentage they will take as a working guide to carry out Government's policy. The Government of India must be addressed. We should tell them the general lines of the policy we propose to adopt and point out that it is essential for this policy that a larger number of Muhammadans should be obtained among the Indian portion of the recruitment for the Indian Civil Service. We may say the present rules do not seem to make this possible and should make suggestions as to how the rules should be altered. We should definitely take up the question of amending the Civil Courts Act so as to place the recruitment for munsifs in the hands of the Government. The High Court, of course, will strongly resent this, and we should have to address them in the first instance when we have framed a suitable amendment."

Commenting on the above an Indian member of the Government at the time noted as follows :—

" Taking into account the probable results of the competitive examination in England, even if 50 per cent. of the direct appointments in Bengal recruited for in India be filled by Muhammadans, the Hindus will still preponderate in the Indian Civil Service. And if in the Provincial and the Subordinate Civil Services the proportion of Muhammadans be reserved at less than 50 per cent. chances are that a smaller proportion of them will get into the Indian Civil Service by promotion and their total strength in the Indian Civil Service will be still less. On this as well as on general administrative grounds, I urge that so far as the Provincial and Subordinate Civil Services are concerned, the proportion as in the case of the Indian Civil Service should be 50 per cent, and not 45 per cent. as Chief Secretary proposes. Chief Secretary contends that the holding back of 5 per cent. of the appointments in these as well as in the other administrative services will serve to stimulate education in the community. Theoretically, there may be some force in his contention, but knowing as I do the history and the present conditions of my community, I feel sure that the more of these appointments are placed within their reach the greater will necessarily be the competition among the students of the community leading to a more rapid spread of education and enhancement of educational standard in the community. We had an absolutely unmistakable demonstration of this during the short-lived administration of Eastern Bengal. These considerations apply equally to the Imperial and Provincial Police, Excise, and other similar services." Finally, the following order was passed :—

" 1. That both formulæ be adopted.

" 2. That all departments be ordered simultaneously to examine the conditions of recruitment to the higher services under them, and adopt a percentage as an immediate guide in the working of the recruitment. This percentage can, of course, be altered from time to time within the limits of the formulæ.

" 3. That the appointment department prepare an answer to the Government of India's last letter on the subject of the Indian Civil Service and Indian Police making proposals on the basis of the formulæ.

" 4. That the judicial department prepare an amendment of the Civil Courts Act, which, under the rules, must be submitted to the Executive Council before any further action is taken on it. If desired, a draft to the High Court might be prepared for the information of the Executive Council at the same time as the amendment.

" 5. That the appointment department circularise Commissioners and Heads of departments insisting on the minimum of one-third in ministerial offices and giving the reasons ; where there is a sufficiency of really suitable Muhammadan candidates the proportion should be increased to comply with formulæ I."

It will thus be seen that Government have realised though tardily, the necessity for a full and complete revision as to how State patronage should be divided between the two communities. But to my mind they have not done what would be regarded as full justice to the claims of the Moslems of Bengal. The simplest course seems to me to go straight ahead and lay down that State patronage in Bengal should be distributed amongst the communities in proportion to their numerical strength, provided a minimum standard of efficiency is satisfied. In any event this question should not be left to be determined by local governments, but it is urged that this should also be embodied by statute in the Constitution. The reason is that unless the same be embodied in the constitution real effect will not be given to it. Just the same as effect has not yet been given even to the 33 per cent. rule laid down by the Government during the regime of Lord Carmichael, so the present formulæ are also likely to remain a mere pious declaration on the part of Government.

In urging this point I wish it to be clearly understood that I am not impelled by any communal considerations whatsoever. India at the present time is at the threshold of a glorious opportunity. On the one hand it is the proud privilege of the Britisher to raise India towards that height of liberal government which they themselves enjoy, on the other hand it is up to the Indians to prepare themselves to be worthy of it. This consummation can only be brought about by one fact, and one fact alone and that is by a real and permanent entente between the two great communities that inhabit this land. It is the Englishmen's privilege to mould the present heterogeneous mass into a homogeneous whole, in other words a common nationhood, and it is up to us to put forward our best efforts towards that consummation. The promised land of Swaraj lies on the summit of yonder hill along the steep slopes of which upward mounts a chariot drawn by two horses, one is called Hindu and the other Moslem. If of the two steeds drawing the chariot up the hill one is well-fed, well-built, strong and hardy, and the other is lean, weak and halting, however much the British charioteer may urge the horses forward the chariot will not be in a position to negotiate the climb. It is, therefore, in the interest of the well-fed horse itself that the lean and the weak horse should be given not only its due share of fodder, but, if necessary, even an excess share so that both may be able to pull together. Be it said to the credit of that far-sighted statesman, the late Mr. C. R. Das, that it was he who saw that if the Hindus ever desired to reach the promised land it was to their interest to see that they pulled the Moslems along with them. Impelled by ideas such as these the late Mr. C. R. Das advocated that even an 80 per cent. of State patronage be given to the Moslems, a proposition which found, alas ! no favour with his short-sighted following. No one can condemn more than I do the excesses that are committed both by Hindus and Moslems towards one another, and I yield to none in my yearning for a day that may dawn when the members of both these communities will be so moulded together that they will realise that all their material interests under the sun are identical, but economic grievances are really at the root of these communal troubles. The present conditions had their counterpart in the days of Akbar when conditions were reversed, and it was left for that sagacious Prince, that great statesman, to throw wide open the gates of State patronage to the members of the Hindu Community, as he, too, dreamed that one day his empire may boast of a people with common interests and common aims. Alas ! the hand of Fate cut short that dream, and his successors went back on his policy. Let not that mistake be repeated. I appeal to members of both communities clearly to realise the issues which are at stake. It is for the members of the British race to act as physicians and prescribe the correct dose. In revising economic relations between the two communities the shortsighted amongst both may grumble, but if it were really desired that permanent amicable relations should begin to grow up between the two communities then it is for the British element to play their part as the discerning physician.

APPENDIX.

USURY LAWS.

In the interest of the masses generally, protection against the bone-racking usury system which is in vogue is essentially necessary. Seventy per cent. of the entire population of Bengal belongs to the agricultural class, and this is the class which is most hit by the want of Usury Laws. In East Bengal, in some districts, the Moslem population is almost over 85 per cent. and throughout the Eastern portion of the Province the average Moslem population would not be perhaps less than 70 per cent. It would hardly be an exaggeration to say that not 1 per cent. of this population is safe from the clutches of the usurer. Even those who belong to the middle class known as Bhadralog, are also in their clutches.

1,300 years ago the Prophet of Islam forbade usury. In the burning words of the Holy Koran it is clearly laid down that while trade for profit was allowed, usury was condemned. As charity is the broad basis of human sympathy, usury annihilates all sympathetic affection and leads to extreme miserliness. Usury refuses to allow the rich to grow richer by reducing the poor to still greater poverty, which is the real aim of usury. Usury moreover promotes habits of idleness by its worst effects as more or less it causes men to be obsessed by selfishness.

India's poverty is proverbial, but no means adopted to effect her economic salvation would ever be complete without providing against usury. The Royal Agricultural Commission has drawn attention to various problems, including the eradication of this pest. Whatever improvement may be carried out in the domain of agriculture, whatever efforts may be expended in the direction of raising agriculture from its primeval position in this country, however much agriculture is carried on by scientific methods as in other advanced countries, no headway will ever be made unless and until this problem is dealt with effectively and radically. The rate of interest in Bengal varies from As. 2 per rupee per month, i.e. 150 per cent. to 300 per cent. per annum, and sometimes the cupidity of the usurer knows no bounds. Recently a case was reported in the papers (vide Statesman of 20th June, 1928), with such startling headlines as these :—

"26 LAKHS FOR 22 RUPEES"

And it went on " The Munsiff of Chandpur has just decided a mortgage suit brought by a money-lender against a debtor, claiming Rs26,00,700 as principal and interest due on a sum of Rs22 advanced as a loan 13 years ago. The plaintiff in the suit is Adhar Chandra Saha, of village Barkul (Hajigunj) within Chandpur, and the defendant is a man named Nazaruddin. It was alleged in the plaint that the defendant obtained a loan of Rs22 in May, 1915, executing a mortgage bond repayable with interest at 10 per cent. per mensem with compound interest every half year. In January, 1928, the interest due was Rs26,00,048. The plaintiff agreed to relinquish his claim for the interest to the extent of Rs25,99,947 and asked for a decree for Rs600 only. The parties compromised the case, and a decree for Rs431 was passed in favour of the plaintiff." Even taking the figure of Rs600 or Rs431 which was finally decreed on compromise, it unfolds a terrible tale. The law gives the Court discretion not to pass a decree on a bond beyond a certain reasonable figure, but that discretion, it is to be regretted, is seldom exercised.

Generally speaking, 10, 20 and often 50 times the principal are decreed. If by the extension of the Reforms, it is also desired to look to the material well-being of the teeming millions of the population of this Province, then I must say, with all the emphasis at my command, that this subject too should be included in the scope of the Enquiry and necessary provision made. I realise that it is the primary business of the members of the Legislatures, Central or Provincial, to engage themselves in this task, but having regard to the precarious condition of the masses prevailing for generation after generation, since the British occupation of this country, I cannot help thinking that if the British connection is to be in the interest of the masses, and if initiative is taken in many questions by other than the people themselves, the initiative in this matter, too, should be taken by the members of the Statutory Commission who are enquiring into questions affecting our Constitution. I must further point out that this question also affects our Constitution in this sense, viz., that the money-lending class, by its hold on the debtors, can influence freedom of voting, and it has done so in some instances most effectively.

HOLIDAYS UNDER THE NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS ACT.

Public Holidays are of two kinds :—Those that are declared as such under the provision of Section 26 of the Indian Negotiable Instruments Act of 1881, and those which, in addition to the above, are gazetted as Government Holidays. During the former, not only Government offices, but Banks, Mercantile firms, Mills, Factories, Docks, and in short all places of public business are closed, whereas during the latter Government offices alone are closed.

It was a notable fact that before 1913 there was not a single Moslem day of religious festivals declared as a Public Holiday under the Negotiable Instruments Act in Bengal, whereas 16 days were declared as such for Hindu festivals, and some more days were so declared on account of Christian festivals. At that time in the Punjab, the United Provinces and Bombay, the Hindu Community had 8, 12 and 9 of such holidays respectively, and the Moslems there had from 6 to 7. This was naturally considered a great hardship for the Bengal Moslems, particularly having regard to the preponderance of their population. As in all things, the Bengal Moslems were gradually losing ground, such was their lot in this case, too. It was, however, my privilege to move a resolution in the old Imperial Legislative Council in 1913, as a result of which three days, viz. the 2 Ids and the Mohurrum, were declared holidays under the Negotiable Instruments Act. The disparity, however, is still so very great that it calls for urgent readjustment. The Bengal Moslems, therefore, urge that this disparity should be reasonably modified.

The Moslem religious festivals of the 2 Ids are reckoned not only according to the Moslem Lunar Calendar, but they depend on the fact whether the moon on the particular occasions is visible or not. As these public holidays are declared at the commencement of the year, it often transpires that the festivals of the 2 Ids actually take place on the days following the 2 days that are gazetted as Public Holidays under the Act. Thus the fact of declaring only 1 day for each of the 2 Ids as holiday under the Act has not sufficiently relieved the Moslem public of the hardships that they have to undergo while having dealings with Banks, Mercantile firms, Mills, Factories or Docks. It is, therefore, reasonable to demand that 4 days instead of 2 should be declared as Public Holidays under the Act on the occasion of the 2 Ids.

The Bar-i-wafat, or as it is called the Fatiha-duaz-daham, is also a sacred day to the Moslems. It is the day when the Great Prophet of Arabia was born, and owing to a curious coincidence it is also the day when he departed this mortal life. This falls on the 12th of Rabi-al-Awal of the Moslem Lunar month. Hence the Bengal Moslems claim that this day should also be declared a Public Holiday. They also claim that amongst the days that are gazetted as Government Holidays, some of their days of religious festivals, notably during the Ramzan, may be gazetted as Government Holidays.

NO-CONFIDENCE MOTION.

Full Text of Mr. Ghuznavi's Speech.

"The following is the full text of the speech delivered by Hadji Mr. A. K. Ghuznavi in reply to the vote of no-confidence at the meeting of the Bengal Council on the 25th of August, 1927 :—

It is only a short while ago that I had an occasion to say elsewhere that artificial clouds were beginning to gather on the political horizon of Bengal, and that a fresh attempt would again be made to stop the work of the Reforms and to arrest its further progress in Bengal. My predictions have come true. I would say at once that this vote of no-confidence is merely a manœuvring, a sordid political move—in order to gain cheap notoriety and to secure the halo of victory on the part of some, and to satisfy personal grudge and private spite on the part of others. But, sir, I ask, have they ever paused to consider what the effect of their favourite pastime is likely to be on the future of this province ? Have they ever paused to consider that at the expense of satisfying a personal grudge and securing the applause of the gallery they are really setting back the hands of the clock of progress so far as this province is concerned ? Have they considered what harm they have already done to the progress and well-being of the land they live in and the yet greater harm which they are likely to cause in view of the forthcoming advent of the Statutory Commission ? They have already succeeded in one, namely, to render Bengal a bye-word of ridicule. A time was when while Bengal led, the rest of India followed. Now it is Bengal that is doomed to lag behind other provinces as the result of the light-hearted pastimes in which they have been indulging for some years past.

ALONE AND ISOLATED.

Bengal now stands isolated and alone while the Reforms are working satisfactorily in all the other provinces. In spite of the rhetoric of my friend, Dr. Roy, and his disavowal of any personal motive in bringing this motion, I am afraid that a great deal of personal motives have entered into this motion. He has tried to explain the attitude of his party with regard to the question of Dyarchy and he has dilated on the provisions of the Act which give the Governor the power to administer the Transferred Department irrespective of the question of the Minister. He has told the House that the provisions of the Act do not confer any real responsibility on the people. He has told the House that the Governor can interfere in all matters and functions of the power of the Minister. This is far from the truth. May I tell him that it is the Minister who really makes out the policy ? May I tell him that the Governor is there to take and give advice to and to guide and be guided by the Minister. I say that it is possible for any Minister to do sufficient good to his country and the people if he really wishes to do so and if he is worth his salt. In all civilised countries where parliamentary institutions flourish, it is not possible to bring in a motion of no-confidence against any Minister on such flimsy pretext—nay, it would be unthinkable. There such a motion must be based on some constitutional issue or some particular question of policy or some matters connected with the public weal ; but here, in the speeches to which I have listened patiently, I have failed to find a single instance which they have been able to cite of any action on my part whereby I could have possibly forfeited the confidence of my countrymen.

WELFARE SCHEMES.

It was only in March last when a vigorous attempt was made to throw out the salary of the Ministers. At that time, I must say, so far as a large section of friends on the opposite is concerned, there was some plausible ground inasmuch as it could have been interpreted as an attempt to kill Dyarchy altogether. The deplorable Kulkati incident was there ; full advantage was taken of arousing communal passions to the highest pitch ; but in spite of all such sinister endeavour their attempt was defeated, and the verdict was entirely in our favour. What has happened since then ? If anything, I have been in the meantime trying my humble best to do whatever I can in order to serve my God and my country. I consider it a sacred privilege to serve God by serving His creatures and that is what I have been doing. Ever since the assumption of office I have been untiring in my efforts to formulate and push through far-reaching schemes affecting the public welfare. I would briefly recapitulate a few items. Will it please my friend, Dr. Roy, if I tell him that I have initiated various schemes of public utility ? Shall I tell him, although he treated the subject in that light-hearted fashion whereas I did not for one moment treat them in the way he has done ? Shall I tell him that as regards the question of cholera—a disease which at at once rouses terror in the minds of the people—that it was I who initiated a vigorous campaign against it ? It was in Bengal that 30 years ago Dr. Hafkin invented that wonderful treatment. While other countries had taken advantage of this system of treatment and driven away cholera from their shores here in Bengal thousands were dying every month from cholera ; but since the introduction of the above treatment the death rate has fallen off considerably. Was it a crime for the Minister to do this ? Was it a crime to serve his countrymen, I ask ? If so, I plead guilty to the charge. Then as regard water hyacinth the House is perhaps aware that this question has been before them for a number of years and still nothing tangible had been done, I have given very careful attention to this question. Most of the members are perhaps not aware of the extent of the damage done alone to crops by this pest and they will perhaps be surprised if I say that in one district alone the loss to agriculture came to Rs47½ lakhs. May I ask if it is a crime to take all steps that were necessary in order to eradicate the pest ? If so, I plead guilty to the charge.

KULKATI INCIDENT.

Now, sir, I turn to the regrettable Kulkati incident which has been yoked to the cause of political vendetta and I will only say that they are worse than vultures who could take advantage of the bodies of those martyrs for their political propaganda. I have been told that I did not stir in the matter. I emphatically repudiate the charge. It was I who took a large number of the members of this House to wait upon the Hon'ble the Home Member and to represent Moslem feeling in this connection and press for necessary inquiry. Nor did I stop at that. I also interviewed His Excellency Lord Lytton, the then Governor, and did whatever was possible in the circumstances, and I only rested when I felt sure that necessary action would be taken.

What have the other gentlemen done ? I have been trying to raise funds for the relief of the people and they were trying to stop the collecting of those funds ? Those funds, God willing, will be distributed to the people affected in the fulness of time.

PERSONAL JEALOUSIES.

I have no hesitation in saying that this is no bonâ fide motion of no-confidence at all. It is merely an opposition arising from a curious amalgam of political irresponsibilities and personal jealousies and disappointed hopes on the part of disgruntled politicians. It is such an opposition which on the pretext of our having lost the confidence of this House seeks to hound us out of office before we have even had a fair chance and time to show what we can do. One can understand the attitude of the Congress Party in the Council which is avowedly out to oust Dyarchy and kill Dyarchy if that be possible. But I had hitherto thought that their opposition was against the principle and not against the personnel of the present ministry. But the opposition from their new found Moslem allies seems inexplicable as these gentlemen were sent to the Council with a distinct mandate to work the Reforms and not to destroy them. But their first act was to vote against the salaries of the Ministers. What lay behind their action then lies behind their action now and is quite patent to all.

RELEASE OF DETENUS.

I have also been charged with keeping silent at the time when there was a motion before the House with regard to the release of the detenus. I was told that I remained neutral. With your permission I will refer my friends to the Rules of Business on this subject. Speaking from memory I may say that the rules are that when a Minister does not happen to agree with anything that transpires in the work of his colleagues, he cannot possibly oppose them by speech or vote against them. There is only one course open to him and that is to remain neutral. I am sure that my friends on the other side cannot be possessed of the divine gift of reading other people's thoughts. They surely cannot pretend to tell me they knew what thoughts were in my mind when I sat silent and did not vote on that resolution. I ask them is it fair on their part to charge me with a thing to which they cannot ascribe any motive ?

STATUTORY COMMISSION.

I have also been charged with communalism and things of that kind. I beg to emphatically declare that everyone can have only approbation for a Muhammadan or a Hindu who safeguards the legitimate rights of his community without encroaching upon the rights of others. But we can have nothing but condemnation for that Hindu or that Muhammadan who tries to oust the other. In this land of ours it is the duty of the Hindus and Muhammadans to live side by side as brothers. As I have said on more than one occasion that if my Moslem brethren will only realise that it is their duty not only to help each other, but to live in amity with the members of all the sister communities, then nothing on earth could retard their progress. Such being the case I would appeal first of all to my Moslem brethren to assist me in the working of the Reforms. I would appeal to all in the name of everything that is holy to consider the effect of their action to-day. We have been told that the Statutory Commission is coming shortly. I want to ask them squarely and fairly what verdict can the Statutory Commission give other than that Bengal is unfit for any further political advance if we go on as we are doing ? I fully share the views of my friend, Sir Abdur Rahim, that Dyarchy is not a perfect constitution. Dyarchy has its faults, limitations and shortcomings. But is not our duty to work Dyarchy and work the Reforms for what they are worth ? It is our duty to show by our merit that we are worthy of further Reforms and further progress. It is not for us to say that because this constitution is not perfect we won't have it. It is for us to say that whatever be the limitations of the system we will work it and show by our merit that we deserve something better. I need not remind my friends of the proverb " First deserve and then desire." We have got to prove our merit before the bar of the English Parliament and before the bar of the British people, and we have to prove that we are fit for further Reforms before we can expect to get them.

If my friends on the other side would only recall the events in recent years that took place in Ireland and Italy, they would find that things there are different from what things are in this country. A lot of blood was spilt and machine-guns were fired there, but we have no such weapons to fight with, but we have the greatest of weapons, and that is to work the Reforms and show by our action that we deserve further Reforms and further progress, and responsibility.

TO SERVE MY COUNTRY

Here I stand and declare before God that I have been inspired all the time by one and one motive alone, and that is to serve my country to the best of my ability. I do not claim to be infallible. I am imperfect and conscious of my limitations. But I recognise it to be my duty to do what I can in order to serve and further the progress of this country. I frankly confess that I have always been inspired by these ideals in spite of what my friends on the other side of the House may say.

In conclusion I can only deplore in the words of the poet :—

Oh ! what a rarity,
Of honour and charity
Under the Sun ! "

FALL OF MINISTRY.

WRECKERS' INTRIGUES AND UNCLEAN METHODS.

Mr. Ghuznavi's Speech.

" At a gathering of officials at the Grand Hotel on the 29th August, 1927, the following amongst others were present :—Messrs. J. H. Lindsay, C.I.E., I.C.S., R. N. Reid, I.C.S., J. G. Drummond, I.C.S., Major-Gen. G. Tate, I.M.S., Dr. C. A. Bentley, M.B., D.P.H., Mr. A. T. Weston, Rai Bahadur J. M. Mitra, Rai Bahadur J. N. Roy, Messrs. R. T. Davis, A. D. MacGregor, F. C. Griffin, S. C. Mitter, G. C. Sen, B. B. Sarkar, J. C. Sen, Khan Bahadur Quamaruddin Ahmed, Mr. Susil Kumar Ganguli, Khan Sahib Kabiruddin and Khan Sahib A. Jalil.

Addressing them Mr. Ghuznavi said :—

GENTLEMEN,

At the outset, I desire to convey to you my deep appreciation of your loyal co-operation, unfailing courtesy, genuine assistance which you have rendered me, and your sincere devotion during the period in which I had been in office for the second time as a Minister of the Government of Bengal. We have been closely associated together in the various departments which it has pleased Providence to entrust to my care. During this brief period it was with your assistance that I was able to formulate many a scheme which, when matured, will be fraught with immense benefit to my unfortunate countrymen. There is the campaign against Cholera, the Rural Public Health Scheme which will dot the map of this province with Health Bureaus in every thana, the campaign against Water Hyacinth, the scheme for the improvement of the entire cattle of this province, the establishment of Veterinary Dispensaries with underground cells for the storage of free serum, the throwing wide open the doors of the agricultural profession to the sons of " bhadralogs," the development of our Home and Cottage industries, and the speeding up of the passage of the State Aid to Industries Bill through the Council, the spreading of medical education by, establishing medical schools in Barisal, Berhampore Chinsurah, Jalpaiguri and elsewhere, and the raising to an up-to-date standard the hospitals in the rural districts of Bengal, the drawing up of a more satisfactory scheme for rural water-supply, the amendment of the long obsolete Local Self-Government and the Bengal Municipal Acts, the initiating of proposal for the control of motor vehicles traffic in our rural areas, the instilling of the ideas of co-operation throughout rural Bengal, the popularising of Jute and other Sale Societies to the same extent as the credit side of the Co-operative movement, the formation of a close service in the Co-operative Department, which is most urgently needed in the interests of the efficiency of the department, the creation of some other agency than that existing at present for the recruitment of Muhammadan Marriage Registrars, the amelioration of the condition and emoluments of Sub-Registrars, Veterinary Surgeons and other underpaid subordinate officers in the public employ, and various other schemes of public benefit and utility in the nine departments out of twenty into which administration is divided in Bengal. These, gentlemen, are the principal items which have been engaging my earnest attention, and in which you all have been of the greatest assistance to me.

TWO MONTHS' WHIRLWIND TOUR.

Besides these, it has been my privilege to make what one might call a whirlwind tour during the last two months throughout the major portion of this province where I had gone to learn at first hand the needs and wants of my fellow-countrymen, so that I might be better able to minister to their necessities and afford any relief which it was possible for me to obtain from the well-guarded strong-rooms of the Bengal Treasury. This in a way completes the tale of the work begun, but left undone. I leave all this legacy to your care and to your charge.

WRECKERS' INTRIGUES.

Inscrutable are the ways of Providence : but it is for man to accept His decrees cheerfully and patiently in the hope that it is all for the best. When I read this morning's paper, I came across the following lines :—" There is no need to dwell upon the more than dubious methods by which the last Ministry was driven from office. These methods are, unfortunately, a commonplace of politics in Bengal, and there was last week manœuvring, intrigue, and worse, of a kind that would be considered a disgrace to any part of India except this Presidency." When talking about the qualifications of a Minister, they were summarised in that paper as ability, including of course educational qualifications, social standing, a real following and freedom from pecuniary worry ; in other words, plenty of cash. If a Minister is required to keep his seat in Bengal at the present moment intact, I could not agree to these being the requisite qualifications, except perhaps the last. From my experience of two Ministries, this is what I would say. If a Minister in Bengal wishes to make his Ministry stable, he must start in the first instance by leaving the Finance Department severely alone ; and he must be content to relegate his files and the work of the administration to his Secretaries and their subordinates. Thereafter, he must devote his entire time and energy in pandering to the whims, caprices and vagaries of the waverers and blacklegs amongst his Party and outside and their myriads of relations and connexions ; and their slightest wish must be a law unto him. He must renounce all his independence of thought and action, and subordinate even his physical necessities to their comforts—nay, even to their pastimes. He can only then hope to withstand any onslaught from the constitution-wreckers even in unholy alliance with the mandate-breakers.

TRIBUTE TO SECRETARIES.

Well, friends, your poor Minister sadly lacked in these qualifications : hence you must be content to part with him. But although he may not be there in the flesh with you in the Secretariat, his spirit will be there to cheer you on in the good work which he loved so well. When I laid down the reins of office once before in 1924, this was what I said :—" No Minister, as far as I knew, had the privilege of working simultaneously with three Secretaries and a large number of Heads of Departments who were uniformly and devotedly loyal to him, as they had been to me. I did not remember of even one solitary instance where the Secretaries did not faithfully co-operate and carry out my orders in the administration of the Transferred Departments." Once more I fully endorse every word I uttered then. I would like to refer to Lord Lytton's swan song in which he gave expression to his views about the present constitution, and said :—

" The existence of an Executive which cannot be removed by the Legislature and of a Legislature which cannot be removed by the Executive is not calculated to produce harmony between the two, and, without harmony between the Legislature and the Executive, efficient Government is impossible. To ensure harmony an elected Legislature requires an Executive responsible to it and removable by it, and an irremovable Executive requires a nominated Legislature."

Well, gentlemen, how I feel about it is this. The first and foremost Reform that I would be inclined to press before the Statutory Commission would be to remove the anomaly in the spectacle of the present Government where half the Government has got to depend on the vote for its salary, and the other half has not. Either restore independence of action to the entire Executive or let the whole Executive sail in the same boat. An argument was whispered to me against the latter proposal, viz., that in that case there will be a chance of the entire Executive being turned out from time to time. Against this I would point out that if anything, it would tend to operate differently, as there would be more oarsmen to keep the boat of State afloat.

GOVERNOR AND MINISTERS.

Gentlemen, one word more, and I have done. A reference was made the other day to the Governor with regard to his relations to the Minister in charge of the Transferred Departments. I would say at once that the work in the Transferred Departments depends to a large extent not only on the personality of the Minister who, as I said, must be worth his salt, but also on the personality of the Governor who is there to listen to his advice, to give his advice, who is there to guide him and be guided by him. In His Excellency Sir Stanley Jackson, Bengal is fortunate in having one who has played the game all his life and is playing the game here as well. He did play the game with his Minister too. And I have to acknowledge publicly my indebtedness to Sir Stanley for his multitudinous acts of kindness, no less to the gracious lady who is by his side to cheer and comfort him in the midst of his tribulations and trials in steering clear of the shoals and the rocks in the waters of the Hooghly. I can say that during the brief period of our close association he never failed to give me the benefit of his advice: nor was he ever chary of accepting my advice.

"A BOND-SLAVE FREED FROM SHACKLES."

Well, gentlemen, I can only compare my feelings to-day to that of the bond-slave whose shackles have fallen off from him, and who feels that he is free once more. From my college days up till now, I have been accustomed to work more than ten to twelve hours a day, and I feel that work is my food, my raiment and the very breath of my nostrils. The sense of freedom that I derive is not from work, but from unnecessary worry. When I find public life in Bengal free from these shackles—free from the loss of one's independence of thought and action, I shall welcome it. Till then, friends, adieu."

["The Bengalee," dated 30-8-27.]

SCENE IN COUNCIL LOBBY.

Official Tactics.

"On Monday last in the Bengal Legislative Council Lobby, the Maharaja of Nadia, asked Mr. Faroqui, M.L.C., on which side the latter was going to vote on the no-confidence motion. Mr. Faroqui replied that he would be guided by what his party decided and he could not give any other reply. The Maharaja was insistent and in a somewhat haughty tone demanded a clear answer. On Mr. Faroqui's not acceding to the Maharaja's demand, the latter told Mr. Faroqui that he would have Mr. Faroqui removed from the common managership of his Joint Estate. It was obviously meant as a threat to Mr. Faroqui and the latter told the Maharaja that he could do whatever he liked. Thereafter Mr. Faroqui reported the matter to the Private Secretary to the Governor.

The over-zealousness of the Maharaja in the cause of the Ministers has attracted the attention of many and he has been heard by many in the lobby to say that 'the present Ministry is his creation' and he must do his best to keep it alive."

["Forward," dated 21-3-28.]

Memorandum submitted by the Hillmen's Association, Darjeeling (Bengal).

On behalf of the Darjeeling Hillmen's Association, I desire to submit the following Memorandum to the Royal Statutory Commission for its kind and sympathetic consideration :—

The Association consists of 500 members representing all the sections of the hill people—namely Nepalese (Gurkhas) Bhutias, Tibetans, Lepchas and Sikkimese living in the whole district of Darjeeling—and its object is to safeguard the interests of the entire hill people in the said district.

The Association desires to confine its remarks to item (c) of the Appendix to the " Invitation to submit Memoranda " issued by the office of the Indian Statutory Commission, viz., methods whereby particular interests—communal, local, social and economic—may obtain adequate representation on local Self-Governing Provincial and Central Representative Bodies.

The Association regards it as an axiomatic truth that in any scheme for constitutional development there must be adequate provision for the extension of franchise to all communities having stakes in the country.

The hillmen community in the district of Darjeeling at present occupies a very unique position in the country—their population has increased to a great extent, they have advanced in education and now are also engaged in every sort of avocation of life and all round progress is noticeable amongst them.

The Association submits that though the hill people in the district represents eighty per cent. of the population and are sufficiently advanced and are taking part in the Municipal and District Board administration, they have been excluded from the reforms, whereas such backward tribes as Santals of Santal Parganas and their own fellow-brethren in the other provinces, namely Shillong, Simla, etc., have already got the reforms.

The Association further submits that great injustice has been done to the hillmen community in the district of Darjeeling by treating the said district as " backward tracts " and excluding it from the scope of the reforms.

This Association submits also that having regard to the progress made by the hillmen in recent years towards education, administration and trade, steps should be taken to remove the Darjeeling District from the list of " backward tracts " and include it within the scope of reforms.

This Association finally begs to submit that in the event of the district being included within the scope of the reforms, at least three seats may be provided both in the Provincial and Central Legislatures for hillmen community in the district of Darjeeling.

At a time when the situation is fraught with the possibility of a new orientation of policy it is essential that the hillmen community representing eighty per cent. population in the district of Darjeeling should have a proper representation on the local Legislative body to look after their interest.

This Association therefore confidently expects that the Indian Statutory Commission will give this matter its sympathetic consideration, and will be pleased to include the district of Darjeeling within the scope of reforms by removing it from the list of " backward tracts " and to provide for adequate representation on behalf of the hillmen community.

Memorandum submitted by the Constitutionalists (Southern India Liberal Federation), Madras.

At the very outset we may submit that we accept that the ultimate determination of the time, the manner and the extent of the constitutional progress of India is entirely at the discretion of the British Parliament. But in the Bill that may hereafter be passed by the Parliament making constitutional changes in India, it should be recognised, that it is so passed out of deference to the wishes of the people of India. In making this proposal, we are not attempting to follow the example of the famous Declaration of the United States Constitution, which begins with, " We the people of the United States do ordain and establish." But we do wish to follow the precedent set up in the Preamble to the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, wherein we find, " Whereas the people of New South Wales, etc., have agreed to unite in one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and under the Constitution hereby established," so that the emphasis of the people might indicate the democratic origin of the Constitution, and foreshadow its nature. Thus, the Preamble to the Government of India Act 1929 may begin as, " Whereas the people of the various provinces in British India have agreed to give up the unitary government under which they are hitherto governed and to unite in one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth under the Crown of Great Britain and under the Constitution hereby established, etc."

We may also mention that our goal is full Dominion Status—leading up to absolute equality of status with Great Britain—with India, governed by her own people, under a system of complete responsible government, and as equal partner of the British Commonwealth of Nations, under the British Crown. We attach to the principle of equality of nationhood as much importance as the Dominions attach, and our aim to secure international recognition of such equality is not less earnest than that of the Dominions. The Dominions, no doubt, have stolen a march over us, but we are determined to overtake them. Separation, or " Independence " from Great Britain, is not by any means our desire. We consider that both India and Great Britain, in fact even the Dominions, have everything to gain by remaining parts of the same Commonwealth of Nations, while separation might mean weakness of the Empire and danger to India. We earnestly hope and trust that all the present constituent parts of the British Commonwealth of Nations might continue as equal partners for a long time to come, in the interests of all concerned and for the common good.

In order to enable India to attain the status indicated above, we wish to emphasise the necessity of the immediate introduction of four great reforms in the present Constitution. These may be stated as :—

I. Complete Provincial Autonomy.
II. Introduction of the principle of responsibility in the Central Government.
III. A Federal System of Government for India.
IV. A declaration of fundamental rights.

I

Provincial Autonomy.

It has been said that Provincial Autonomy has never been defined by Indians, and that politically-minded people in India have no clear conception of what that expression is intended to convey. But, for our present purpose, we may be permitted to adopt the definition quoted by Sir Frederic Whyte, in his monograph " India a Federation," from an unnamed authority, " Autonomy is defined as, in general, freedom from external restraint, Self-Government." By Provincial Autonomy, we only mean freedom for the Government of the Provinces from the restraints of the Government of India, or the Secretary of State or the British Parliament. We want Provinces in India to have governments of their own, uncontrolled and unrestricted from above in all provincial matters—in matters connected with administration, legislation and finance. We want Provincial Governments in India to enjoy the same freedom which the State Governments in the Commonwealth of Australia enjoy, subject of course, to this, namely, that Provincial Governments shall bear to the Central Government in India, the same relations which the said States' Governments bear towards their Federal Government.

At this stage of the progress of the country, it does not, perhaps, require any very elaborate argument to make out a case for the grant of complete Provincial Autonomy. The whole question has been threshed out by the Muddiman Committee. A volume of evidence has been collected, both oral and documentary, from all shades of political opinion in India, from Ministers, ex-Ministers, Executive Councillors, retired Executive Councillors, leaders of all parties in the country, and leaders of Opposition in the Legislative Councils, not to speak of representatives from various communal and political associations. If there is one subject on which there is an overwhelming consensus of opinion in favour of reform, it may be said that this demand for Provincial Autonomy is that one. We do not, therefore, propose to enter into an elaborate discussion or argumentation in support of it. We shall, however, mention the more important points below.

1. The authors of Dyarchy themselves called it a hybrid system and the sooner it is altered the better.

2. They meant it to be only a transitional measure —a halfway house. A decade is a sufficiently long period for change, and the halfway house has long been passed.

3. Dual control creates friction, and the smooth working of the governmental machinery is impaired.

4. The system was intended merely as an experimental measure. The experiment has been performed.

5. It was meant to give training to Indians in responsible government, and the training has given sufficient experience.

6. The principle of unity is a recognised fundamental essential in all modern and civilised good governments. Dyarchy is its antithesis.

7. Under the present system there need be no unity amongst the Ministers themselves, as distinguished from unity with the Executive Councillors. The removal from power of the Ministry as a whole is not only not insisted on, but the dismissal of individual Ministers is actively encouraged or insisted on—a proof of imperfect solidarity in Ministers. In December, 1923, immediately after the second General Election, a formal resignation of the three Ministers in Madras was obtained by the Governor, and a new Ministry was formed with two of the old Ministers and a new third Minister. The Minister who was dispensed with was not consulted, nor was he ever told why he was replaced by another. In March, 1928, two out of three Ministers in Madras had to resign, and their places entrusted to two others, and the new Ministry continued as of old. Joint responsibility of a Ministry is thus not recognised, while solidarity in a Ministry is neither encouraged nor expected. The Muddiman Committee, while observing that " the difficulties in the way of establishing joint responsibility in India are doubtless great," adds, " we are convinced that joint responsibility of the Ministers is the very essence of the present Constitution . . . the object (of the Reforms) was to introduce an approach to Cabinet Government for the Transferred Side of the administration; until this is accomplished there will be, in our opinion, little training in responsible government." But, they admit that "there are, however, some provisions in the rules under the Act, and also in the Instrument of Instructions, which suggest that the Governor in relation to Transferred Subjects should be guided by the advice of the individual Minister."

8. Joint deliberation (recommended by the Joint Committee) between the members of the Executive Council and the Ministers has been found to be almost impossible, and consequently has not often been resorted to except in Madras and Bengal.

9. There is no need for joint deliberation amongst the Ministers themselves. Each Minister can have his own policy, and can go on with it, provided, of course, the Governor accepts it, and the Legislative Council does not object to it. In Madras, the fiction of a Chief Minister is in vogue. But he is a Chief Minister only in name. The other Ministers are not bound to follow his lead or accept his advice.

10. The Reforms of 1919 were intended to introduce responsible government in the provinces. But Clause 3 of Sec. 52 of the Act provides for action being taken by the Governor against the advice of the Ministers if he sees sufficient cause to dissent from their opinion. This is a negation of the principle of responsible government. In no civilised country, in which the system of responsible government obtains, is a Governor allowed to act against the advice of the Ministers, though it may be open to him not to act upon such advice.

The analogy, drawn from that fact under similar circumstances, the Governor can override his Executive Council, does not apply, for the simple reason that the Executive Council is not responsible to the Legislative Council, while the Ministers are.

In the Royal Instrument of Instructions to the Governor, we find, "in considering the Minister's advice and deciding whether or not there is sufficient cause in any case to dissent from his opinion, you shall have due regard to his relations with the Legislative Council and to the wishes of the people of the province as expressed by their representatives therein." These instructions could not be followed, no doubt, for very good reasons, by the Governor of Madras in March, 1928, and his dissent from the opinion of two of his Ministers resulted in the resignation of the latter, though the said Ministers' position was in consonance with the resolution passed by the Legislative Council on the 25th January, 1928.

11. Provision is made under the rules for the Governor to take charge of a Transferred Subject in cases of emergency where, owing to a vacancy, there is no Minister available. In such cases, the Governor is not responsible to the Legislative Council for the administration of such a subject. This again is a negation of the principle of responsible Government. What is more, in such cases, the Governor is not responsible even to the Secretary of State or the British Parliament. This is negation of all responsibility.

12. The Joint Committee recommended that "Members of the Executive Council and Ministers should not oppose each other by speech or vote; members of the Executive Council should not be required to support, either by speech or vote, proposals of Ministers which they do not approve; nor should Ministers be required to support by speech or vote proposals of the Executive Council of which they do not approve." This has resulted in some anomalies. The Ministers are expected to be loyal to their colleagues on the Reserved Side, and to assist them by defending their position in the Legislative Council. But if the Legislative Council disapproves of any proposals of the Reserved Side, then the Ministers must either be disloyal to their colleague or displease the Legislative Council and act against the wishes of that body. In Madras the spectacle was witnessed when the Ministers voted with the Executive Councillors while the Ministers' followers voted against them, as in the case of the resolution on the Permanent Revenue Settlement. In this the Ministers were defeated, but their party was victorious. Again, Ministerialists can be defeated, but the Ministers can be with the winners, as in the case of the debate on the Staff Selection Board. Under the above circumstances, the Executive Councillors naturally suspect the loyalty of the Ministers, while the latter feel helpless.

13. The Joint Committee recommended, under the circumstances referred to in the beginning of the last para., "all other official members of the Legislative Council should be free to speak and vote as they chose." The predicament, in which Mr. Samuel, Financial Secretary to the Treasury, was placed recently by accepting, on his own authority and in the absence of his chief, a budget amendment in the British House of Commons, need not arise in the provinces in India. Under the above rule, even a Secretary attached to a Minister can speak and vote against the latter. In 1922 the Secretary, Mr. G. B. F. Muir, I.C.S., moved an amendment to a provision in the District Boards Bill then under discussion in the U.P. Legislative Council. The Minister, Pundit Jagat Narayan, who was in charge of the Bill, knew nothing about the amendment, was never consulted by the Secretary and was opposed to it on the merits. It was with great difficulty that the Secretary was prevailed upon to withdraw the amendment.

14. Under Sec. 72 D (4) of the Government of India Act, the Governor of a province may certify that any Bill or any clause of a Bill affects the safety and tranquillity of the province, and on that account may direct that no proceedings or any further proceedings shall be taken by the Council in relation to that Bill or a clause thereof. This negatives the right of the people or their representatives in the Legislative Council to make laws which they consider necessary for the good of their province, and stifles legislation and public opinion at a very early stage.

15. Under Sec. 72 E (1) the Governor may certify that the passage of a Bill relating to a Reserved Subject which a Legislative Council has failed to pass or refused leave to introduce, is essential for the discharge of his responsibility, and thereupon the Bill will be deemed to have been passed and shall, on the signature by the Governor, become an Act. This is a negation of all principles of responsible government. This power of the Crown to make laws over the head of the people and of their representatives is foreign to all democratic, representative, and responsible systems of government.

16. Under Sec. 81 (3), the Governor may withhold his assent from a Bill passed by the Legislative Council. The grounds on which he may so refuse his assent are nowhere specified in the Government of India Act. This withholding of assent must be based on definite principles which should be specifically defined in the Act.

17. Under Sec. 81 (4) the Governor-General also may withhold his assent from any Act passed by a Local Legislature and assented to by the Governor. This double check is unknown to other constitutions enjoying responsible government. Even for this second assent, the principles are not defined.

18. Under Sec. 81 (1), the Governor may reserve a Bill for the consideration of the Governor-General. Under Sec. 81 A (3) the Governor-General may reserve any Act for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure thereon. Here again is a provision for double distillation. There can be no objection for a single reservation, but then it must be for the reasons, on the principles and on subjects, recognised in all countries where responsible government prevails.

19. Under Sec. 80 (A) the Local Legislature has power to make laws "for the peace and good government" of the province. The usual expression is "for the peace, order and good government." It is not clear why the word "order" is omitted. It is also not clear, therefore, how far the plenary powers of a Local Legislature are restricted by the omission.

The fact that the word "order" is omitted in giving power to the Governor-General in cases of emergency to make Ordinances and Regulations for the peace and good Government of India in Secs. 71 and 72 of the Act does not seem enough to consider that the omission was intended merely to remove redundancy.

20. Sec. 80 A (3) prohibits a local legislature from making or taking into consideration any law regarding certain subjects without the previous sanction of the Governor-General. This requirement of previous sanction must be done away with, while the making of laws regarding the more important subjects mentioned in the section, such as, the discipline of the army can be made ultra vires of the Legislative Council.

21. Under Sec. 72 D (2) proviso (a) when any demand in the budget relating to a Reserved Subject has been refused by the Legislative Council, the Governor may certify that the expenditure provided for by the demand is essential to the discharge of his responsibility for the subject, and on that certicate the refused demand is deemed to have been granted. This is taking away the power of the purse from the people, the most essential and elementary right known to democracies and responsible governments. Under proviso (b) of the same section, the Governor can certify, " in cases of emergency," authorising such expenditure even in the case of Transferred Subjects, on the ground that it is necessary for the safety or tranquillity of the Province, or for the carrying on of any department, This ignores responsible government altogether.

22. Again, the sanction of the Legislative Council is unnecessary, under Clause (3) of the said section, for the expenditure on certain items. Some of these ought to be brought under the control of the people's representatives; that is, the number of non-votable items should be reduced to a minimum. The Legislature should have power to alter the Civil Lists, without affecting existing holders of office.

23. Under Devolution Rule No. 27, " the Local Government of a Governor's Province shall not, without the previous sanction of the Secretary of State in Council, or of the Governor-General in Council, as the case may be, include any proposal for expenditure on a Transferred Subject in a demand for grant, if such sanction is required by the provisions of Schedule III to the Devolution Rules." Schedule III gives a list of new posts which cannot be created and of existing posts which cannot be abolished or whose pay cannot be increased or reduced without the previous sanction. In some cases, even temporary appointments cannot be created, nor can any grant of an allowance, pension, or gratuity be made to any Government servant, except under certain circumstances, without such pervious sanction. These limitations to the powers of the Governor acting with his Ministers in Transferred Subjects, and in fact, of the Legislative Council itself, show how unreal responsible government is, and to what extent outside control is exercisable even when the Ministers, the Governor and the Legislative Council are agreed upon certain expenditure. It is submitted that the control of the Legislative Council ought to be deemed sufficient in such matters.

24. The power of making laws by Regulations and Ordinances under Secs. 71 and 72 of the Act must be limited to the cases in which His Majesty can pass Orders in Council or issue Proclamations. The Legislature in India, as in all other civilised countries, must have " the ultimate power to prevent legislation by the Crown " except, perhaps, in cases, if any, in which the Crown in England can legislate by Orders in Council or by Proclamations.

25. Under the existing system, Ministers are able to carry their proposals in the Legislative Council and to retain their offices as Ministers, not on the support of elected majorities, but with the help and co-operation of nominated members and government officials. It was noticed by the Muddiman Committee that out of 15 divisions that took place in the Punjab Legislative Council, the official vote determined the result in 8 instances. The principle of responsibility to the electorate is thus lost. Similar instances have occurred both in Madras and in other provinces. A more singular position had arisen in our province soon after the elections in 1926. The election disclosed that out of 98 elected members, about 48 happened to be Swarajists, 20 to be Justicites (Party in power from 1921 to 1926), 6 Europeans, 18 Independents, and 6 more of no denomination. The Swarajists refused office, and the Justicites, being in a minority, were unwilling to form a ministry, and the Governor called upon the Independents to form a ministry, and they did form one. They had no elected majority in the Council; and yet they carried on quite efficiently for more than a year. Thus, any three elected members of the Legislative Council, if made Ministers by the Governor, can carry on without fear of being defeated in the Legislative Council. The incentive to form and consolidate parties, and to increase the number of followers, based on a separate definite policy and programme, is lost. This is one of the reasons why party system, so very essential for the development of responsible government, has not been encouraged. The defect is inherent in the system of nomination to a popular house.

26. Under the system, now in force, the responsibilities of a Governor are, no doubt, heavy, but his powers also are really enlarged over his powers in the pre-Reform days :—

(a) Under the old system, as Governor-in-Council, he was ordinarily bound by the opinion of the majority of the Council, except in cases where a decision was left entirely to his discretion, under the then Act, and in rare cases where he was empowered to overrule his Council. This applied to all subjects, because then there were no Transferred Subjects. After the Reforms, the Governor exercises more power than before over what are now the Transferred Subjects. As pointed out already, he can override his Ministers. He can interfere not only with the policy of a Minister, but also with every detail of his administration. Executive Councillors are entitled to record their minutes of dissent and ask for their transmission to the Secretary of State. The Ministers have, evidently, not got this power.

(b) The Governor-in-Council is bound to call for meetings of the Council, and it is the will of the majority of that Council that prevails. In the case of Transferred Subjects, the decision of the Governor, acting with his individual Ministers, is final. A Minister cannot call in aid the votes of his co-Ministers to outvote the Governor, as the Executive Councillors can do. A Governor is not bound to consult all the Ministers together.

(c) Please mark the words " the Governor acting with his Ministers." The significance of this language is clear, and it has been used to ignore the basic principle of responsible government.

(d) The rules enabling Secretaries and heads of departments to have access to the Governor behind the back of the Ministers have worked to the disadvantage of the latter. These rules are defended on the ground that the Secretaries are Secretaries to the Government, and not to individual Ministers or members of Government, and on the ground that the system existed even in the pre-Reform days. That is, no doubt, true, but then there was neither Dyarchy nor any responsibility to the Legislative Council. Mr. D. N. Banerjee in his " Indian Constitution " (p. 420) observes that Governors in some provinces " have to control their Ministers to reduce them to the position of mere advisers and to concentrate power in themselves, even in respect of the administration of Transferred Subjects."

(e) The control over the Ministers is, for all practical purposes, twofold now. There is the control by the Governor, and there is the control by the Legislative Council. This double control is incompatible with Ministers' responsibility to the Legislative Council. And, when we remember that the Governor is not responsible to the Legislative Council, and, that under the Legislative Council Rules and Standing Orders, the conduct of a Governor cannot be questioned in the Legislative Council by interpellation or by moving any resolution, we can realise the condition of responsible government, as it exists at present in the Provinces.

27. Under the practice set up in Madras, it is not open to a Minister to see any file or Government Order passed in another department without the permission of the Member concerned. It is only after obtaining such permission, the file or Order will be supplied to him. But this disability does not attach to a permanent Secretary with a Minister, under the same practice or convention. The position of a Secretary is thus better than that of a Minister.

28. It is not open to a Minister to raise any question for discussion or start a file on any point affecting any Reserved Subject. The following case has once occurred in Madras. At the suggestion of the Governor, and in fact, on his command, the Minister of Industries prepared a note with a view to transfer certain powers of initiative, then enjoyed by the District Collectors and the Board of Revenue, to the Director of Industries, in the matter of mining consessions. The Finance Member (an Executive Councillor on the Reserved Side) objected to this, on the solitary ground that a Minister could not take the initiative in any matter touching or affecting a Reserved Subject. The note had to be dropped at once, the Governor, who ordered the Minister to prepare the note, having surrendered to the objection of his Executive Councillor.

29. The absence of any real control of a Minister over his own Secretary has already been referred to. Neither he nor the Legislative Council can effectively control members of All-India Services working under the Ministers. The salaries of the Services are non-votable, and sometimes occasions have arisen in many a Legislative Council in India when members had to move motions for cutting down the pay of the clerks and peons of an officer whose salary is non-votable and whose action on certain matters is objected to. Unable to vote down the salary of the officer, the Legislative Council resorts to the device of voting down the salary of a petty clerk to indicate its disapproval of the action of the officer. This may be perfectly legal, but does not add to the sense of responsibility or to the dignity of constitutionalism, or to the training of Indians in the direction intended.

30. The pay and prospects of the All-India Services are in the hands of the Secretary of State. These All-India officers have not much to induce them to be loyal to the Ministers or co-operate with them whole-heartedly save their own good nature, sense of duty and honour. In the evidence before the Muddiman Committee, several instances were disclosed that certain members of the permanent services did not wholeheartedly co-operate with the Ministers. There is, no doubt, much to be said on both sides. The Ministers thought the services should obey them. The members of the services thought that the Ministers were new to their work, and should be guided by the advice, which they are in a peculiar position to give, on account of their vast administrative experience. The Ministers were of opinion that they knew their country and the conditions therein better than British officials, whose knowledge in such matters, however long they may have stayed in India, cannot be complete. Given the goodwill and a desire on both sides to give and take, much of the friction might, no doubt, have been avoided. But assuming that the administration had to be carried on in the strict letter of the law, there can be no denying that the difficulties of a Minister in this connection were, to a large extent, real.

31. The appointment and posting of some of the more important officers is with the Governor, and sometimes with the Government of India. Occasions might arise, and did arise, when a Minister wanted to post a particular officer to a certain place, but he was defeated in his object. For instance, in Madras, when the post of the Surgeon-General fell vacant, the Minister for Local Self-Government, who held the Medical Portfolio, could not get his nominee appointed, but an I.M.S. officer from Northern India was sent down as Surgeon-General to the Madras Government. Now, the Minister is responsible to the Legislative Council for the administration of the Medical Department. The Surgeon-General is an I.M.S. officer, originally appointed by the Secretary of State for India, and ever afterwards under the control and direction of the Government of India. The Minister has a policy of his own in matters medical, and wants, let us assume, to introduce certain reforms, such as the development of indigenous medicine. The difficulties of a Minister, under the above circumstances, are easily realised. There is no guarantee that the Surgeon-General appointed by the Government of India will see eye to eye with him on such matters. The new Surgeon-General, too, may have to take some time to understand the policy of the Minister, and this might mean much loss of valuable time, which is so very precious when it is remembered that the term of office of a Minister is normally only three years, unless he is re-appointed Minister after the next General Election.

32. Next, if a Minister finds that there are several superfluous posts in Transferred Departments filled by members of All-India Services, or that the duties of a large number of them can be efficiently discharged by the less paid officers of the Provincial Services, the Minister or the Governor acting with the Ministers has no power to abolish any such post, or transfer it to the cadre of a Provincial Service.

33. The reservation of certain posts in the Transferred Department to the I.C.S. has also caused some inconvenience in some provinces, in that it did not leave enough scope for the Minister to make a choice that can be said to be satisfactory. Take for instance the Co-operative Department. The head of that department should be endowed with a large amount of missionary zeal, sufficient acquaintance with prominent men, and the conditions in the rural areas, and a knowledge of and ability to speak the vernacular of the locality. Some I.C.S. officers might be available to fulfil these requirements, but not many. The Minister is not empowered, under the constitution, to put in an Indian or even an European who does not belong to the I.C.S. when the post is " listed."

34. The Reforms of 1919 were inaugurated under trying circumstances. The stringency following the war necessitated increased taxation and drastic retrenchment. Four provinces had also to pay a heavy contribution (since discontinued) to the Indian Exchequer. Under these heavy handicaps, the Ministers, during the last eight years, could not give tangible proofs of the benefits of Reforms, by effecting improvements in sanitation, hospitals, education, roads and the like, which alone directly appeal to the people. If these were the only handicaps, nothing could be said against the Reforms themselves, so far as financial sharing between the two halves of the Government is concerned. But the system of joint purse brought about its own disadvantages to the Ministers. Public opinion in India was largely in favour of a separate purse. As noticed by the Muddiman Committee " The Madras Government, a member of the Council and some ex-Ministers from Bengal, the President of the Legislative Council in Bihar and Orissa and a Minister in Assam, all suggest that a system of a separate purse should be established." But the Committee could not recommend its adoption.

35. Under the Devolution Rules, Finance is a Reserved Subject, and the member in charge of the Finance Department is to be an Executive Councillor on the Reserved Side. Now, every proposal for expenditure, from every department, must pass through the Finance Department. The Reserved Departments are thus placed in an advantageous position of knowing everything, through the Finance Department, about every measure and proposal of the Transferred Departments, while the latter have no means to obtain knowledge of what is passing in the Reserved Departments. The disadvantage to the Ministers is that the Reserved Half, taking advantage of this knowledge, applied early for and obtained large sums of money, by way of re-appropriation. Again, the Finance Member has other subjects to administer, which, as his own children, naturally claim larger sympathy and therefore larger expenditure on their behalf, and are satisfied. This also worked to the detriment of the Transferred Subjects.

36. Next, Devolution Rule 38 gives great powers to the Finance Department in the matter of re-appropriation. Whereas that department can sanction any re-appropriation within a grant from one "minor head" to another "minor head," a Minister can only re-appropriate from one sub-minor head to another sub-minor head within that minor head.

37. The Joint Financial Secretary contemplated by Devolution Rule 36 cl. (2) has never been appointed in any Province, and the advice and assistance of such an officer was not forthcoming to the Ministers. The Muddiman Committee had recommended the appointment of a Financial Adviser instead of a joint Financial Secretary, the idea being that he should advise the Ministers " in the preparation of their proposals for expenditure so as to secure that they are not likely to suffer from technical objections, which might be raised by the Finance Department." This ignores the main object of the appointment of the Joint Financial Secretary who shall have equal powers with the Finance Secretary and who is to be a watch-dog, as it were, of the interests of the Ministers.

38. The subjects chosen for transfer and those reserved tell their own tale and disclose the plausible difficulties of Dyarchy. All subjects have a bearing upon each other, and it is difficult to dissociate one from another in actual administration. In Madras, the Minister for Agriculture is a minister without Irrigation or Land Revenue, both of which are Reserved Subjects. He is also Minister of Industries without Labour, Factories, Boilers or Mines which are all Reserved Subjects. He is further a Minister for Development without Forests or Electricity, both of which are again Reserved Subjects. The Minister for Public Works has nothing to do with Irrigation, though the Department of Public Works includes Irrigation as well as Civil Works. The Chief Engineer, who is the head of the Public Works Department, is thus a subordinate of the Minister so far as the Civil Works (roads and buildings) are concerned, and is a subordinate of an Executive Councillor (Reserved Side) so far as Irrigation is concerned. The absurdity of such a scheme is apparent on the face of it. The truth is, you cannot, in this fashion, divide subjects for administration, which all interact upon one another. The unity of the Government, designed for other purposes, is equally necessary in the administration of the subjects, which so interact upon one another. The distribution of subjects, under various portfolios, is a matter of mere administrative convenience and disposal of business, and Dyarchy cannot be justified on the basis of that circumstance. The Government of a State is a single mechanism in which each subject has its own function to serve. You cannot dissociate some subjects from the rest without dislocating the entire mechanism. No doubt, in order to gain the more important advantage of training Indians in the art of responsible government, a certain amount of dislocation in the administrative machinery had to be resorted to, and put up with, in a transitional stage. But since the need no longer exists, and the training, already had, can be deemed to be sufficient, it will be cruel to persist in this makeshift device.

Sir John Marriot in his book, " The Mechanism of the Modern State " says " the Cabinet system as hitherto worked in England has involved the acceptance of five principles :—

1. Close correspondence between the Legislature and the Executive.
2. The political homogeneity of the Executive.
3. The collective responsibility of the members of the Cabinet.
4. The exclusion of the Sovereign from its meetings.
5. The common subordination of its members to the leadership of a First Minister."

Now, from what has been said above, it will be found that every one of these principles is violated in the Provincial Governments. We have seen how the Ministers voted against their own parties, and were defeated by their own followers when the latter did not approve of certain actions of the Reserved Half. We have also seen that Ministers were able to carry on certain measures only with the help of nominated and official members. Secondly, we have seen that Dyarchy is the very negation of homogeneity amongst the Ministers themselves. Thirdly, we have also seen one or two Ministers being dismissed or called upon to resign while others retained office. Fourthly, the presence of the Governor at the meetings of the Ministers, and in fact, the Governor himself being the actual head of the Ministers, violates the principle of the exclusion of the Sovereign from meetings. Lastly, we have also seen that there is nobody like a Prime Minister in any of the Provincial Ministries. The fiction of a First Minister in Madras was only one in name, and it never carried with it any of the characteristic features of Premiership. Thus has Dyarchy defeated the working of the Cabinet system, sought to be introduced in the Provincial Governments. But it cannot be denied that it has given sufficient experience to Ministers and members of the Legislative Council to understand the basic principles of responsible government. The time has come when Dyarchy has to be replaced by full responsible government.

Having given our reasons why Dyarchy in the Provinces should be changed into a form of full responsible government, we shall endeavour to give a few details concerning the constitution of Provincial Governments and Legislatures. Only a few details are given, because our submission is that the Australian model should be followed in preparing the constitution of the Provinces of India. As most of the provisions of the Constitutional Act concerning that country will have to be adopted, with such necessary alterations as the conditions in India might require, it will be unnecessary to repeat here the various provisions of that Act. We are aware that the Australian Constitution had not as any part of its object the framing of a government for the States. Autonomous States were in existence before the Federation was formed. It was not so in the case of the Canadian Constitution. We have to follow the latter in providing for the constitution of both the Federal and Provincial Governments. The following provisions are merely suggestive, and are by no means exhaustive :—

A. PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

1. There shall be no distinction between Reserved and Transferred Subjects. All shall be Provincial subjects, and under the control and direction of the Ministers.

2. The Governor of every province, including provinces other than presidencies, should be appointed directly by the Crown without the intervention of the Governor-General, or Governor-General in Council Such a Governor should generally be chosen from well-known British politicians. Our Association does not think that the time has yet come when Provincial men could be appointed as Governors. The duties of a Governor are very delicate, and at times very onerous.

3. The Governor in a Province should occupy the same position, as nearly as possible, of a constitutional Governor in Australia. He should act entirely on the advice of his Ministers, except in matters which are expressly or by implication reserved for his sole discretion.

4. No instructions shall be sent to the Governor from the Secretary of State on any topic except the assent or reservation of Bills.

5. If a Governor does not conform to regular constitutional usage, he shall be liable to be removed from office by His Majesty, if two-thirds majorities of both Houses of the State Legislature decide that they will not work with him.

6. A Governor shall have power to dismiss a Ministry or to ask his Minister or Ministers to resign under circumstances similar to those under which a Governor of an Australian State can dismiss or call for resignation. But, before resigning or obeying the order of dismissal, the Ministry shall be entitled to make a reference to the Secretary of State who may revise the decision of the Governor.

7. The Ministry shall consist of the Prime Minister, and not less than five other Ministers. The Governor shall appoint the Prime Minister who shall choose his colleagues with the approval of the Governor.

8. The Ministers in the province shall occupy the same position, as far as may be and as nearly as possible, as the Ministry in Australia, the Governor occupying the position of a constitutional Governor in the States in that country.

9. There shall be no Executive Councillors in the sense in which they exist at present. But, there shall be two advisers to the Ministry generally chosen from the Civil Services. These two will have a seat in the Cabinet, and also in the Legislative bodies, without a vote in either. One of these is to be the Financial Adviser to the Ministers, and the other their Adviser on Law and Order. They will receive the same salary as the Ministers.

10. There shall be an Executive Council to advise the Governor in the government of the Province (State), and the members of the Council shall be chosen and summoned by the Governor and sworn as Executive Councillors and shall hold office during his pleasure. All the Ministers and their two Advisers shall be Executive Councillors. The other Executive Councillors shall be honorary and unpaid. When a Governor in Council is given power under the Constitution, he shall act, if not always on the advice of his Ministers, yet always in accordance with the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. He shall not act without advice, though he can refuse to act. He shall not undo any action taken legally by his Ministers, though he can obtain another Minister to cancel the act of his predecessor.

11. The Indian Government being made a Federal Government, and the autonomy of the Provinces being recognized, according to our proposals, the relations between the Federal and States' Governments shall be, as nearly as possible, those obtaining in Australia between the Federal Government and the States' Governments in that country, in matters executive, legislative and judicial, subject to the limitations mentioned in the above paragraphs.

12. We prefer the Australian System of Provincial Governments to the Canadian system. Our reasons are threefold.

(1) We want the residuary powers in the provinces.

(2) We do not want any control of the Federal Government over the Provincial Governments, except what might be involved in the statutory provisions concerning the relations between the two Governments.

(3) The Native States in India can fit in only with the Australian system, but not with Canadian system.

B. PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES.

(a) CONSTITUTION.

1. There must be two Provincial Legislative bodies—a Legislative Council, and a Senate.

2. The Legislative Council shall be entirely elected.

3. The Senate shall be partly elected and partly nominated.

4. The relations between the two Houses shall be similar to those obtaining in Australia, as nearly as possible.

5. The number of members of the Legislative Council shall be nearly twice that of the existing numbers.

6. The number of the members of the Senate shall be about a third of the Legislative Council.

(b) LEGISLATIVE POWERS.

The Provincial Legislature shall have the following powers in particular, among those which their counterparts in Australia enjoy.

1. The legislative power of the Provincial Legislatures shall be plenary, defined and exclusive.

2. In cases where there are concurrent powers and there is a conflict between provincial laws and the Indian laws, the latter shall prevail.

3. Proposed Provincial laws shall not be subjected to double assent, nor disallowed, except when they are ultra vires, or unconstitutional.

4. The Governor may assent or refuse to assent to any Bill passed by the Legislative bodies, in the name of the King. No Act shall require the assent of the Governor-General. The Governor may reserve a Bill for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure.

5. The Governor shall have no power to make grants by certification. He shall have no power to make Regulations or Ordinances, except in so far as he may be authorised by any Act of the Legislature.

6. Provincial Legislatures shall have no power to pass any law inconsistent with any Indian or Parliamentary Act.

7. They shall not undertake any legislation affecting any Federal subject.

(c) FRANCHISE.

1. Separate electorates for minorities, such as, Moslems, Indian Christians and Europeans shall continue.

2. Separate electorates for Depressed Classes, with separate electoral qualifications, shall be established.

3. Single member constituencies, or, in the alternative, plural constituencies with proportional representation on the system of a single transferable vote, shall be formed.

4. We are not in favour of universal suffrage, for the present; but the property qualifications of voters may be reduced, and this is absolutely necessary in the case of the Depressed Classes, Indian Christians and the Moslems.

5. Reservation of seats now allowed to the Non-Brahmins in the Provinces of Madras and Bombay shall continue.

(d) RELATIONS BETWEEN THE TWO HOUSES.

1. The Budget and all Bills imposing new taxes shall originate in the Legislative Council only.

2. The Senate shall have no power to amend any taxation Bill or any item in the Budget.

3. The Senate shall have no power to amend any Bill so as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people.

4. The Senate may, at any stage, return to the Legislative Council any Bill which the Senate may not amend, requesting, by message, the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein.

5. Except as provided above, the Senate shall have equal powers with the Legislative Council in respect of all Bills.

6. The Budget shall deal only with appropriations.

7. Bills proposing taxation shall only deal with taxation. No tacking shall be allowed.

8. Provision shall be made to avoid deadlocks. The Australian procedure in this connection is very complex. We prefer the English method regarding money Bills, and we suggest that provisions similar to those of the Parliament Act of 1911 might be adopted in the Constitution, subject to the above provisions. As regards other Bills, provision shall be made for dissolution consequent on a disagreement of the two Houses.

9. The Legislature shall have power to make constitutional changes in matters affecting franchise, electoral divisions and the like.

II.

RESPONSIBILITY IN THE CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.

The question of reforming the Government of India presents innumerable difficulties. If it is agreed that India is ripe for full responsible government, the solution would have been easy enough by granting it without reservations. But the existence of Native States, the absence of Indian naval, military and air defences, the Hindu-Moslem troubles, the Brahmin-Non-Brahmin dissensions, the disabilities of the Depressed Classes, and the want of experience in responsible government in the Central Government, and the non-realisation of responsibility by the electorate, which is mostly illiterate, make the British Parliament hesitate to agree to the immediate grant of complete responsible government to India. Yet, there seems to be no alternative. Sooner or later full responsible government must be established in this country. Representative government is a settled fact in this land. It is not a recent institution. It has been in existence for several years. It has grown up from time to time, and may now be said to be in full swing. There can be no going back on it. Mr. Gwynn's suggestion, of an Assembly to be filled by members nominated by the provincial Ministers, is therefore out of the question. As the Hon. Mr. R. H. Brand said, in his "The Union of South Africa," "Institutions, when once they have been brought into being, have a knack of refusing to disappear." Representative government cannot, therefore, be abolished without bringing about disaster. Now, the history of representative institutions in the Dominions shows that such institutions in the Dominions inevitably lead to only one consequence, namely, responsible government. You cannot long continue the former without granting the latter. They are bound to go together. One cannot exist without the other.

In the chapter on "Failure of Representative Government in the Canadas," Prof. Kennedy observes, "There were fundamental contradictions in being allowed a say in passing laws without controlling the judges who interpreted them; in being allowed to vote taxes without deciding the items of appropriation; in being a constitutional part of the Government without an effective voice in the administration. The French Canadian House of Assembly never saw these difficulties politically isolated or politically correlated. They attacked one and all, but always when they felt that their race and nationality were in danger. Law the French Canadian must obey; taxes the French Canadian must pay; judges the French Canadian must face; administration the French Canadian must experience; and the challenge given in turn to each was a challenge fundamentally inspired by racial homogeneity and kept alive by those fears, suspicions, arguments, and aggressions which are the peculiar weapons of nationalism when fettered and unfree in a servile state" (pages 158 and 159) . . . In another place, in the same chapter, he observes, "But perhaps the most serious cause of failure in the functioning of the constitution was the fact that the Crown had no constitutional responsibility to the Houses of Assembly, and yet there could be no legislation without them." . . . "The whole system was vitiated by possessing an executive authority which did not need to rely on public opinion." (p. 164) . . . Again, we find Kennedy thus describing the state of Canada. "The history is full of painful illustrations of the Crown's independence of grants and of its carrying on the administration of the provinces without monies voted by the legislatures. This was one of the broad issues. The protagonists of the popular Houses in this connection were often factious and recalcitrant demagogues, but behind their wearisome protests and endless reiteration of their claims, there lies a fact of experience in modern government, that there can be little hope of political stability as long as the executive is financially independent." (p. 163).

We feel we need not apologize for these somewhat lengthy quotations. All the above conditions obtain in India to-day. All the fundamental conditions referred to in the first paragraph quoted exist to-day in India. Substitute the word Indian for French Canadian, and read the paragraph, and you will find it is entirely true of India. The Indians as a nation feel a "racial homogeneity" as against the Britishers in India, and the Hindu-Moslem differences and the Brahmin-Non-Brahmin squabbles are either forgotten or ignored in the struggle for freedom against an irresponsible executive. "The fears, suspicions, arguments, and aggressions" are as much the peculiar weapons of our "nationalism" in 1928 as were those of French Canada in 1828. We, too, pass laws and have no control over the judges who interpret them. We, too, vote taxes without deciding a good many items of appropriation. Our legislative Assembly is a constitutional part of the Government without an effective voice in the administration; our Executive is, to a large extent, independent, financially, of our legislative bodies. More than half the central expenditure is not votable by the Assembly, and fresh taxation has been imposed in spite of the adverse vote of the Assembly. Expenditure voted down by the Assembly can be restored by certification of the Governor-General. A whole votable budget has been easily thrown out by the Assembly, and has been as easily restored by the Governor-General. It is a matter of almost annual occurrence, that some items of expenditure are voted down by the former, and are certified by the latter, as a matter of course. The Crown has no constitutional responsibility to the Assembly. The executive authority need not rely on public opinion in India. There are at least ten ways in which a proposed law can be guillotined if the executive is so minded.

1. If it is one whose introduction is prohibited by the Act, say, one touching the army or the public debt, it cannot be introduced at all.

2. If it requires previous sanction, and the Governor-General refuses such sanction, it can be thrown out at the first reading.

3. It may be rejected by the Assembly.

4. It may be rejected by the Council of State.

5. It may be rejected at joint sitting of the two Houses.

6. The Governor-General may refuse assent or may return it for reconsideration.

7. The Governor-General may veto it at any stage, on the ground that it affects the safety and tranquillity of India.

8. The Governor-General may reserve it for His Majesty's pleasure, and His Majesty may disallow it thereon.

9. His Majesty may disallow it after it received the assent of the Governor-General.

10. If passed and assented to by His Majesty, even then the British Parliament may repeal it.

The Governor-General can make laws by Ordinance. He can get laws passed with the help of the largely nominated Council of State, and, in the last resort, can pass laws by Certification, as in the case of the Princes Protection Bill 1922. Even taxation laws are so passed. as in the case of the Financial Bills of 1923 and 1924.

The Indian Assembly has an elected majority and an Indian majority. In spite of the numerous disabilities already adverted to, it exercises wide powers, almost as wide powers as any legislative body in the world, save that of bending the executive to its will. As has already been pointed out, the members of the Assembly can not only discuss the entire budget, but also throw it out to a large extent. As the Hon. Mr. (now Sir Malcolm) Hailey said, in introducing the first budget (1921–22) under the the Reforms, " If we incur expenditure, it would be under their mandate. If we impose taxation, it will be by their vote. If the burden pressing on any class of the community has to be lightened ; if large concessions have to be given to any class of government employees ; if large schemes of development on any project of social or moral improvement have to be financed, the House will have to share with us the responsibility to the general taxpayer." The members of the Assembly have got the power of interpellation, and can heckle the executive with supplementary questions on a wide range of subjects. They can move resolutions on all matters of public interest. In cases of urgency, they can move the adjournment of the House, a powerful weapon in the hands of clever politicians, who wish to expose the vagaries of the executive. Their vote must be obtained for the passing of any proposed law in the ordinary course. Private members can introduce their own Bills on many matters that concern public interests. They serve on Committees, including the Finance Committee and the Public Accounts Committee. They thus wield enormous powers which are often used to the detriment of constituted authority, without fear of being called upon to undertake the responsibility of putting their theories into practice. They are denied the advantage of learning by experience. They become reckless and imprudent. Recent debates in the Assembly have disclosed that non-official members excel the Government in the power of debate. The bureaucratic instinct ingrained in the Executive Councillors makes them regardless of their duty to satisfy the non-official representatives of the people. The latter feel they are slighted. The former consider them as unreasonable and irresponsible. Bad blood is created. Discontent prevails. Suspicion is generated. The non-official members stump the country and represent the Government in the blackest colours ; and the Indian press backs them. The result is inconceivable—the deplorable result of constituted authority being brought into contempt.

How then can there be any hope of political stability ? Referring to the period immediately preceding Lord Durham's arrival in Canada, in 1838, Prof. Kennedy observes, " The hushed racial melancholy of one part of the country and the stifled political aspirations of the other bore witness to the fact that race could not be crushed or satisfied in its active life by inadequate constitutional recognition, and that a political people could not for ever sit down quietly under the domination of privilege." Conditions in India to-day are almost similar to those in Canada of 1838. It is, therefore, clear that full responsible government for this country cannot long be delayed. We have, ourselves, noted the difficulties in the way. But they are by no means insuperable. Steps should therefore be taken to pave the way. The whole question resolves itself into this, that a scheme should be devised which involves the introduction of responsibility into the Government of India. This may mean Dyarchy again. The condemnation of Dyarchy in Provincial Governments, and our proposals to end it by the grant of full responsible government in the provinces, is no argument against its introduction in the Central Government, if its only consequence, and that an immediate consequence, is the grant of complete responsibility in the near future. After all, all politics are a matter of compromise. Possibly, too, the scheme may be so framed as to reduce the drawbacks of Dyarchy to their minimum. Temporary inconveniences can well be endured while under the hope of obtaining full responsible government in the near future.

The alternative suggested by Mr. Gwynn, to abolish the present constitution of the Assembly, to fill up that body with members nominated by the Provincial Ministers, is unthinkable. It will, undoubtedly be a retrograde step and will cause immense dissatisfaction and disaffection, the consequence of which cannot be easily foreseen now. We have already drawn attention to the observation of Mr. Brand that political institutions, once brought into existence have a tendency to refuse to disappear. Mr. Gwynn's proposal will create, if pressed, a tremendous agitation in India. It involves the breach of a great constitutional principle. As pointed out by Mr. A. B. Keith, in his " Responsible Government in the Dominions," it was decided in the famous case of Campbell vs. Hall that if representative institutions were granted by the Crown to a conquered or ceded colony, the grant was irrevocable unless the right of revocation was expressly reserved in the instrument by which the grant was made. No doubt, the Indian constitution with its representative institutions was not granted by the Crown alone, but by the Parliament. But no distinction, in principle, can be made between the two kinds of grants. Representative institutions in India were established, not for the first time by the Government of India Act of 1919, but by very early Acts. Sec. 84-A of the 1919 Act providing for an inquiry into the working of the system of Government reserves no such right to revoke representative institutions in India, whereas some such power is reserved to restrict the degree of responsible Government, introduced by that Act into Provincial Governments. No doubt, the all-powerful sovereignty of the British Parliament to make and unmake anything is undoubted, but political consequences will not be overlooked in attempting to make any such catastrophic changes. An Act of 1774 revoked the representative system of Government granted to Quebec in 1763, and entrusted the legislative power to the Governor and a nominee council. Not only was this repealed in 1791, but also the representative institutions had to be perfected, and full responsible government had to be granted, as time went on. The whole history of His Majesty's Oversea Dominions is a history of Military or Executive Governments, developing into representative governments, and later on into responsible governments, and then into federal governments, and finally into practically autonomous governments.

THE INDIAN GOVERNMENT.

Assuming then that responsibility will be introduced into Central Government, we venture to place the following scheme of reforms in the Central Government for consideration of the Royal Commission, and in doing so, we may at once admit that we are not unaware of its defects ; nor are we unconscious of its incompleteness. It is a suggestion —a bare suggestion.

The system of the Indian Government shall be Federal.

All the subjects that are now Central Subjects shall remain as Federal Subjects, power being reserved for the Federal Legislature to effect any transfer, if found desirable, later on.

There are two alternatives for the introduction of responsible government. The first is, that responsiblity be almost fully introduced forthwith in the Federal Government, making a reservation so far as the first four Federal Subjects (mentioned in the Schedule I, attached to the Devolution Rules) are concerned. The reservation shall be to the effect, that the Governor-General, as representing the Crown, shall determine the organization and administration of the said four subjects, and that the Legislature shall not interfere with the expenditure or policy regarding those subjects. This suggestion is based on the analogy of the Japanese Constitution, Article XII of which runs "The Emperor determines the organization and peace standing of the Army and Navy," while Art. LXVII runs "those already fixed expenditures based on the Constitution upon the powers appertaining to the Emperor, and such expenditure as may have arisen by the effect of law and that appertain to the legal obligation of the Government, shall neither be rejected, nor reduced by the Imperial Diet without the concurrence of the Government." The subjects of Defence, External Relations, Native States, and Political Charges being thus reserved, the objections ordinarily raised against the grant of responsible government are fairly removed, while the Indians can have no reasonable complaint, as they will not be much worse off than the Japanese nation. No doubt, in Japan only Defence is so reserved, but then there is no question of Native States in that country; and External Affairs and Political Charges are intimately connected with the subject of Defence. If it can be said that there is no Dyarchy in Japan, the exclusion of the above subjects from the control of the Indian Legislature cannot make our constitution Dyarchical.

If the above scheme be not acceptable, then the other alternative is practically Dyarchical. Federal subjects shall be divided into ministerial and non-ministerial subjects, and the following subjects shall be treated as non-ministerial subjects, that is, as matters of Imperial concern, and shall not, for the present, be entrusted to the Ministers.

1. (a) Defence of India and all matters connected with His Majesty's Naval, Military, and Air Forces in India, or with His Majesty's Indian Marine Service, with any other force raised in India, other than Military and armed police wholly maintained by Local Governments.

(b) Naval and Military works and cantonments.

2. External relations, including naturalisation and aliens, and pilgrimages beyond India.

3. Relation with States in India.

4. Political Charges.

5. Communications to the extent described under the following heads, namely :—

(a) railways and extra-municipal tramways, in so far as they are not classified as provincial subjects under entry 6 (d) of Part II of this Schedule ;

(b) aircraft and all matters connected therewith :

(c) inland waterways, to an extent to be declared by rule made by the Governor-General in Council or by or under legislation by the Indian Legislature.

6. Shipping and Navigation, including shipping and navigation on inland waterways in so far as declared to be a central subject in accordance with entry 5 (c).

7. Lighthouses (including their approaches), beacons, lightships, and buoys.

8. Port quarantine and marine hospitals.

9. Ports declared to be major ports by rule made by the Governor-General in Council or by or under legislation by the Indian Legislature.

10. (12) Currency and coinage.

11. (13) Public Debt of India.

12. (21) Control of cultivation and manufacture of opium, and sale of opium for export.

13. (30) Criminal law, including criminal procedure.

14. (31) Central police organization.

15. (32) Control of arms and ammunition.

16. (34) Ecclesiastical administration, including European cemeteries.

17. (40) All-India Services.

18. (43) Regulation of ceremonial titles, orders, precedence and civil uniform.

19. (45) The Public Service Commission.

All other Federal (Central) Subjects shall be Ministerial Subjects, subject to the control of the Ministry, just as Transferred Subjects are in the Provinces, under the present constitution. The above division of the subjects is by no means claimed to be the best. A better division can be obtained if a committee of officials and non-officials, presided over by one of the members of the Royal Commission, goes into the question and submits its recommendations to the Commission. Another committee, similarly constituted, shall go into the question of reducing the drawbacks of Dyarchy, in the light of experience gained in the provinces.

There shall be a Privy Council to advise the Governor-General in the Government of India, and the members of the Council shall be chosen, appointed, and summoned by the Governor-General and sworn as Privy Councillors, and shall hold office during his pleasure. The Executive Councillors and the Ministers shall be ex-officio members of the Privy Council. Besides these the Governor-General may choose and summon ex-Ministers, and other well-known men that have rendered public service, and swear them as Additional Privy Councillors. These also shall hold office during the Governor-General's pleasure, but shall receive no salary. When the Governor-General in Council is given powers under the Constitution, he shall act on the advice of the Council; he shall not override his Council and still claim to be acting as Governor-General in Council. He shall not act without advice, though he can always refuse to act. He shall not be bound always to summon the Ministers, and the Additional Privy Councillors for all meetings of the Privy Council. If he feels the need, he can, at any time, increase the strength of the Privy Council by adding Additional members to that body.

The portfolio system shall continue, and the portfolios of the subjects which are not entrusted to the Ministers shall be given to the Executive Councillors, half of whom shall be Indians and the other half Europeans.

No qualifications shall be fixed for the Executive Councillors.

The number of the Executive Councillors shall be such as the Governor-General thinks fit to appoint. The officer commanding, for the time being, His Majesty's Indian forces shall be an ex-officio Councillor.

The Governor-General alone shall not exercise any power conferred by the Constitution on the Governor-General in Council.

The Governor-General and the Executive Councillors shall be responsible to the Secretary of State and the British Parliament for the administration of the Subjects not entrusted to the Ministers. The Secretary of State may, subject to the provisions of the Indian Constitution, superintend, direct and control all acts, operations and concerns which relate to such Subjects. He shall have no such right in matters connected with the Subjects entrusted to the Ministers.

The Indian Ministry shall consist of a Prime Minister and not less than three other Ministers of State. The Prime Minister shall be appointed by the Governor-General and the other Ministers shall be chosen by the Prime Minister and approved by the Governor-General. In appointing Ministers, regard must be had, as far as possible, for the representation of the three Presidencies and Burma. No Minister shall hold office for a longer period than six months, unless he is an elected member of one of the Houses of the Indian Legislature.

All the Central Subjects scheduled as Ministerial Subjects shall be entrusted to the Ministers, and so far as the administration of those subjects is concerned, the Ministry shall have the same powers, and shall be bound by the same conventions, as are recognised, enjoined and followed in all countries where responsible government prevails.

The Ministers shall be responsible to the House of Representatives, and such responsibility shall be collective. The Ministers shall not be controlled in any way by the Secretary of State for India. The Governor-General shall not undo any action taken legally by the Ministers, though he can obtain another Minister to cancel the act of his predecessor.

THE INDIAN LEGISLATURE.

The Constitution of India must follow the example of the Constitution of Canada and Australia, in adapting to its institutions the legal theory of the composition of Parliament. The Parliament of India shall consist of the King-Emperor, a Council of State, and a House of Representatives. The theory of Indian Government shall regard that government resides in the King, and that the Legislative and Executive Acts are Acts of the Crown. The form of enactment shall be, "Be it enacted by the King-Emperor's Most Excellent Majesty, the Council of State and the House of Representatives of India." In the exercise of his discretion as to assenting to or withholding his assent from Bills, the Governor-General shall regard his duty as an officer of the Imperial Government.

The Bicameral System shall continue.

The Indian Legislature should be given powers to alter the Indian Constitution, within certain limits, and subject to the requirements as to reservation and laying of Bills before Parliament. Measures which create or alter electoral divisions, franchise and similar questions shall be exempted from the requirement affecting the reservation of Bills.

An effort should be made to distinguish between classes of legislation as of Imperial or of Indian interests. The power of the Governor-General shall be limited in the latter class of measures. He will, of course, have the general power of withholding assent in all cases, but in Acts which concern Indian interests only, he should be guided by the advice of his Ministers and should rarely use his powers of veto. As regards measures of Imperial interests, he can exercise his powers to assent, to refuse to assent, or to reserve for the consideration of the Crown subject to the Royal Instructions. In these cases, even disallowance by the Crown after the Governor-General's assent may be provided for.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

1. The more populous House shall be called the House of Representatives.

2. It shall consist of twice its present number of members, and shall wholly be elected, suitable constituencies being found for minorities and Depressed Classes.

3. Universal suffrage is not advocated, for the present, but property qualifications of electors should be reduced, more especially for the Depressed Classes and some minority communities.

4. Separate electorates should continue so far as the European, Moslem, Sikh, Indian Christian, and Depressed Classes communities are concerned. Proportional Representation, on the system of single transferable vote, shall be established for the other constituencies. Reservation of seats should be provided for non-Brahmins of the province of Madras and for those of Maharashtra in the Bombay Presidency.

5. Illiteracy should not be a disqualification.

6. The present disqualifications may continue, but to them must be added, being President of a District Board or Government Contractor. But conviction for a political offence not involving moral turpitude or violence or disturbance of peace should not be a bar. The five-year rule should be abrogated.

7. Women's suffrage should be allowed on the same qualifications as required for men. But the minimum age should be 30 in the case of women, while men can vote at the age of 21.

8. All those whose wage-earning capacity is assessed at Rs30 per mensem shall be eligible to vote.

9. All military pensioners will be entitled to vote, in whatever rank they might have served.

THE COUNCIL OF STATES.

1. The Upper House may be called the Council of States.

2. All the nine provinces should have equal representation on the Council of States. The minor provinces will be entitled to representation proportionate to their population and their importance.

3. The Native States, if they are willing to join, should be represented in the Council of States by 16 members. The Native States may be divided into eight groups, each sending two representatives. One member from each group shall be nominated by the States forming that group, while the other member shall be elected by the people of the States forming that group, a property qualification determining the electorate.

The members of the Council of States representing the Native States shall have no vote except on matters affecting the Native States, but they shall be entitled to speak on any subject that may be brought forward before the Council of States. The travelling and other expenses of these members shall be borne by the States concerned.

4. The proportion between the elected and the nominated members may be the same as at present.

5. The total number of members shall be half that of the House of Representatives.

6. The franchise shall be the same as at present, as also the disqualifications.

7. The present system of proportional representation shall be retained.

8. The system of postal voting shall be abolished.

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN THE TWO HOUSES.

1. The distribution of powers between the two Houses should be clearly defined, and similar to that suggested by us for the Provinces.

2. The power of initiation of Money Bills shall, of course, lie solely in the House of Representatives, and the Council of States may not amend Bills imposing taxation or appropriating revenues or monies for the ordinary annual services of the Government. Nor shall it have any power to amend any Bill so as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people. But, the Council of States shall be at liberty, at any stage, to return to the House of Representatives any Bill which it may not amend, requesting by message the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein, and the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make any such omissions or amendment with or without modifications. Except as limited above, the Council of States shall have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of all Bills. Laws imposing taxation shall deal only with taxation, and any other provision contained therein shall be of no effect. Tacking should be prohibited.

3. Specific provisions should be contained in the constitution to prevent deadlocks especially in financial matters.

4. If the House of Representatives rejects, or amends unacceptably, any Finance Bill, which the Upper House is prepared to accept, the Lower House shall be dissolved, when the rejection or amendment is not made on the merits but on political grounds. But, if the new House of Representatives also rejects the Finance Bill, the Government must accept that decision, except where the money is required for the administration of the first four subjects in the list of Federal subjects.

POWERS OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

1. The power of legislation by certification must go.

2. The power of granting demands for appropriation shall be limited to the expenditure needed for the administration of the first four subjects in the list of Federal subjects.

3. The power of ordinance-making shall be limited to cases in which His Majesty in Council can pass Ordinances in Great Britain.

4. Reservation and disallowance are, no doubt, legitimate, but such powers ought to be defined and confined to the narrowest limits. The grounds on which the disallowance can be made shall be defined, and the subjects which require reservation shall be specified. Generally, the power of disallowance, or reservation, should be confined to cases of ultra vires of the Indian or Provincial legislatures, and should not be allowed in cases where hardship, irregularity, injustice, or interference with the vested rights or contracts are brought forward. Where a proposed legislation is contrary to natural justice, or is confiscatory or ex post-facto, it may be reserved.

THE SERVICES.

The question of the security of the All-India Services will be sufficiently met by giving an appeal to the Secretary of State against dismissal, as was done in Natal in 1891. In other respects, the Services must be placed under the entire control and direction of the Central and Provincial Governments and Legislatures in India. Of course, provision will be made for pension, in the case of those who do not wish to serve India any longer owing to conscientious objections. If, however, the new constitution is confronted with more serious problems, concerning the Services, a Commission similar to the Lee Commission might be appointed, and decisions taken on the report of that Commission.

DEFENCE.

All the military, naval and air forces stationed in India, on her frontiers or in her waters, and paid for by India, shall be called His Majesty's Indian Forces. The Command-in-Chief of all these forces shall be vested in the Governor-General, as the King's representative, and he shall have control of all such forces. His Majesty's Indian forces shall not be liable for service outside India and her waters, except on the orders of the Governor-General in Council. In view of the peaceful times through which India is passing, and the international movement for reduction of armaments, the time has arrived when a serious attempt should be made to reduce expenditure on standing armies, whose purpose may be served by a National Militia, Territorial Forces, and Volunteer Corps. A system of compulsory training should be introduced to enable Indians to be prepared to defend their country in case of foreign aggression. The whole subject, however, is entirely technical, and laymen like ourselves can only throw out suggestions. But, from a political and constitutional aspect, we may be permitted to urge that the status of India, in controlling her own forces, and in rendering assistance to the other parts of the Empire, or in receiving help from them, shall be equal, as far as possible, to that of the self-governing Dominions. The history of the relations between the Home Government on the one hand and the Colonial Governments on the other, is replete with instances in which the Colonies were constantly urging on the Home Government to continue to undertake the responsibility of their Naval and Military Defences, to bear the cost thereof and to exercise the necessary control, while England was often urging upon the Colonies that the latter should undertake the responsibility of their own defence, bear the cost themselves and enjoy the right to control their own forces. India, having long borne the entire cost of her defence forces, naturally expects that the same generosity should be extended to her, in the matter of organizing and controlling her own forces.

III

A FEDERAL INDIA.

We are strongly in favour of a Federal system of Government for India. The question has been raised whether the seeds of federalism have not been sown already in the constitution of this country. We will revert to this question a little later. Meanwhile, there can be no doubt that the present constitution of India, as contained in the Government of India Act, is unitary. But, almost singularly, India has a Central Legislature consisting of two Houses—the Assembly and the Council of State—and it also has Local Legislative Councils in nine Provinces. This is a somewhat unique Constitution, not found in any Unitary State, except, perhaps, the South African Union. The Local Governments in India are subordinate to the Central Government. The Acts passed by Local Legislatures must receive the assent of the Governor-General to become law. The Indian Legislature can pass laws for the benefit of a single province, though this is rarely done. It can also pass laws for the provinces, in subjects which are, under the Act, Provincial Subjects, as distinguished from Central Subjects. The Mussulman Waqf Act, 1923, is an instance in point. It can also amend or repeal any Act that had been passed by a Local Legislature. It will thus be seen that, though there are two different Legislatures, one for All-India and another for each of the nine provinces, the Constitution of India is unitary. The complete subordination of the Provincial Governments to the Indian Government also negatives the theory of India being a Federation in embryo. The double Legislature is, no doubt, due to historical accident, and probably also due to considerations of convenience raised by the vastness of the country and the immensity of the population. But, it cannot be said with certainty that a federal conception, to be realised and matured, in the near or distant future, was altogether absent from the minds of British statesmen, who were responsible for the various constitutions that were given to India from time to time.

The federal idea was fostered in India by historical reasons. From the time British connection began with this country right up to the Regulating Act of 1773, the three Presidencies of Madras, Bombay and Bengal were independent of each other, and were in the same position as the Canadian Colonies, the Australian States, and the American States were before their federations were formed and before they had their Federal Governments. For a hundred and fifty years, no doubt, we have had a central and unitary Government, but we wish to get back to the old position of separate autonomous provinces subject, of course, to the condition of partnership in a Federation.

Again, independent powers of legislation or passing Regulations and Ordinances were originally enjoyed by the Governor-in-Council both in Bombay and in Madras, for nearly two centuries now (since the Letters Patent of 1726). This power was, no doubt, abolished in 1833 (by the Charter Act of that year), but was restored in 1861 by the Indian Councils Act of that year. Since then, the provinces were having their own Legislative Councils and passing their own laws. It will be almost impossible now to induce the provinces to agree to an abolition of their Councils, which abolition alone will be the logical position for a perfect Unitary State.

When the Government of India Bill, 1858, reached the stage of second reading, Bright made a speech which was significant. "I would propose," he said, "that instead of a Governor-General and an Indian Empire, we should have neither the one nor the other. I would propose that we should have Presidencies and not an Empire." "I would propose that the Government of every Presidency should correspond with the Secretary of State in England . . . I would have the army divided, each Presidency having its own army."

There is, perhaps, not much in the name "Council of State" given to the Upper House of the Indian Legislature. This body does not contain an equal number of elected members from each of the Provinces, a common and most necessary feature in Federal Constitutions. There are, however, passages in the Montford Report which clearly indicate the presence, in the minds of the famous authors, of a conception of a federal system of government for India in the future. In Chapter X of the Report dealing with Native States, they observe in para. 300 " We know that the States cannot be unaffected by constitutional developments in adjoining provinces . . . We feel the need for caution in this matter . . . Looking ahead to the future, we can picture India to ourselves only as presenting the external semblance of some form of ' Federation.' The provinces will ultimately become self-governing units, held together by the Central Government which deals solely with matters of common concern to all of them. But the matters common to the British Provinces are also to a great extent those in which the Native States are interested—defence, tariffs, exchange, opium, salt, railways, and posts and telegraphs. The gradual concentration of the Government of India upon such matters will, therefore, make it easier for the States, while retaining the autonomy which they cherish in internal matters, to enter into closer association with the Central Government, if they wish to do so. But, though we have no hesitation in forecasting such a development as possible, the last thing that we desire is to attempt to force the pace. Influences are at work which need no artificial stimulation. All that we need or can do is to open the door to the natural developments of the future."

Even more important is the suggestion involved in para. of 5 of the Preamble to the Government of India Act, 1919, which runs, " Whereas concurrently with the gradual development of self-governing institutions in the provinces of India, it is expedient to give to those provinces in provincial matters the largest measure of independence of the Government of India which is compatible with the due discharge by the latter of its own responsibilities." Sir Frederick Whyte, in his " India a Federation," considers that the above paragraph in the Preamble is an answer to those who say that India is not at present a Federal State. He does not say that it is a full answer, but he does say " the raw material for the creation of a Federal Constitution already exists and the first step towards it was taken by Parliament . . . in the fifth para. of the Preamble to the Government of India Act." He adds, " the next step in the solution of the Indian constitutional problem will bring us face to face with those very questions which the makers of Federal Constitutions in Germany, in Switzerland, in the British Dominions, and, above all, in the United States of America, had to answer." In another place he observes, " a country so variously composed as India, and already divided into provincial areas which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to abolish, is an appropriate region for a Federal Constitution, and, from whatever standpoint we approach it, requires a constitution expressly made in the form of a special Statute."

Provincial legislation in India has occasionally taken a turn which is singularly, if unintentionally, consistent with federal systems of government. In February, 1926, was passed in the Assembly a resolution " to move the Secretary of State to disallow the Burma Expulsion of Offenders Act or in the alternative to take immediate steps to introduce a Bill in the Indian Legislature to repeal the same." That Act was passed by the Burma Legislative Council in September, 1925, to enable the Government of the province to deport, from Burma, non-Burmans convicted in Burma of certain offences. The Act itself was similar to the Gondas Act of Calcutta. The argument against it was that one province should not undertake legislation harmful to another. It was likened to an anti-Asiatic legislation in South Africa. The resolution in the Assembly was carried by 69 votes to 38. But the Act itself is not yet repealed. It was passed after Burma was brought within the provisions of the Government of India Act of 1919. If, as was apprehended, the Act was designed to exclude a certain class of Madrasees, and if a province could exercise such a right, it looks as if Burma acted somewhat like a State in a Federal country. For instance, under the exception to Art. 45 of the Swiss Constitution, it is open to a canton to refuse admission to, or to expel any Swiss national who is not a native of that particular canton, and who, in consequence of a penal conviction, is not entitled to civil rights, or who permanently comes upon the charge of public charity. The question of expulsion on account of poverty is understandable, on the principle accepted in England by the Poor Relief Act, 1572 (14 Eliz. C. 5. Cl. 17). But the Burma Act does not refer to the question of poverty. Nor does it confine itself to penal convictions which disentitle the convict to civil rights. The Burma Law, therefore, seems to be even in excess of the Swiss Law. Such a law, passed by a provincial legislature, seems, theoretically speaking, to be ultra vires in a unitary constitution. The very fact that one province can legislate for itself, and that to the detriment of another is proof positive of the absence of the unitary system. It is admissible in the States of a Federal country, where the States retain a portion of the sovereign power. Mr. Jinnah and Pandit Motilal Nehru urged, in the discussion on the aforesaid motion in the Assembly, that one province cannot undertake legislation, if not harmful to, at least affecting another province. Lala Lajpat Rai pointed out that such a power in any province strikes at the very root of the principle of nationality. Sir A. Muddiman's reply relied on the Joint Parliamentary Committee, who said, " when the Provincial Government and the Provincial Legislature are in agreement, normally speaking, they should have their way." The recommendation of the Joint Committee is more in accord with the federal principle than with the unitary one.

It will, perhaps, be convenient in this connection to meet the theoretical objections sometimes raised in this country against Federation. The authority of Professor Dicey is often invoked. In the introduction to his " Law of the Constitution," he is decidedly in favour of a unitary type of government, as against a federal form. Amongst the evil consequences he mentions, " If one state of a federation greatly exceed in its numbers and in its resources the power of each of the other states, and still more if such dominant partner, to use a current expression, greatly exceed the whole of the other Confederated States in population and in wealth, the confederacy will be threatened with two dangers. The dominant partner may exercise an authority almost inconsistent with federal equality. But, on the other hand, the other States, if they should possess under the constitution rights equal to the rights or political power left to the dominant partner, may easily combine to increase unduly the burdens, in the way of taxation or otherwise, imposed upon the one most powerful state."

Dicey also thinks that " Federalism again would mean, in any country where English ideas prevail, the predominance of legalism or, in other words, a general willingness to yield to the authority of the law courts." He further observes, " Federation, lastly, creates divided allegiance. This is the most serious and the most inevitable of the weaknesses attaching to a form of government under which loyalty to a citizen's Native State may conflict with his loyalty to the whole Federated Nation." It may not be difficult to find effective answers to this criticism. Suffice it to say, however, Dicey's introduction to his " Law of the Constitution," from which the above quotations are extracted, was written in 1914, when the war clouds were gathering, and when a vigorous campaign for an Imperial Federation of Great Britain and her Dominions was in full swing. The issue between Imperial Federation and Imperial Co-operation was fought out even after his death. The " Round Table Magazine," and " The Problem of Commonwealth," by Mr. Lionel Curtis, promulgated the doctrine of an " Imperial Super-State," to achieve what is called an " organic union." Not until the Imperial Conference passed the famous constitution resolution of 1917 was the question of Imperial Federation set at rest. The share of Professor Dicey in achieving that result was by no means insignificant, though his untimely death cut off one of the strongest exponents of Imperial Co-operation. His remarks, in the aforesaid introduction, underrating Federal Governments, though couched in very general language, were intended mainly to apply only to the proposed Imperial Federation or the Commonwealth of English-speaking nations under the British Crown. They can have no application to such Governments as those of the United States of America or of Canada, and it is respectfully submitted, to any future constitution of India.

One other objection raised by Professor Dicey is that a Federal Government is a weak form of Government. This may seem to be quite correct on first impressions. One, however, cannot be so sure. English writers are apt to believe that because their own Government is strong, and because their form of Government is unitary, therefore the strength must be due to the form of that government. One wonders whether the same thing can be said of France. For more than a century the history of France did not disclose the strength of her governmental institutions, despite her heroic fights for freedom and independence. The strength of the Italian government is sometimes mentioned as a proof of the unitary type of government. But, perhaps, Italy's strength to-day is not so much in her governmental institutions as in the one man she has produced, Signor Mussolini. The previous history of Italy does not impress one that there is anything in Italy's institutions that contribute to her strength. On the other hand, what about the United States of America ? To-day it must be acknowledged as the richest country in the world, and its government is one of the strongest governments in the world. It is true that Hamilton, also, thought that a Unitary Government would be stronger and more efficient than a Federal Government. That was a century and a half ago. What has experience shown ? Are the United States weak to-day ? Does any American dream of converting the government of the United States of America into a Unitary Government ?

In our own country, a much respected ex-President of the Indian National Congress laboured hard to convince that body, when it met at Madras in December last, that a Federal Constitution was undesirable and even dangerous for India. His arguments sum up the case for a Unitary Constitution for this country, and are consequently worth examining. He starts by saying that Federalism is a new device, and quotes Professor W. J. Ashley, who said that "No precedent existed for the type of Government which the United States Constitution set up." That is true so far as that type goes. But it is historically wrong to suggest that "Federation" itself is a new device. Federalism is at least as old as the Federal Unions that were formed among certain of the City States of ancient Greece.

Then we are told, a Federal Constitution admits of no conventions. That this is not correct can be asserted on the authority of Prof. Dicey, himself, who says, "The conventional element in the Constitution of the United States is far larger than most Englishmen suppose. See on this subject Wilson "Congressional Government" and Bryce, "American Commonwealth" Chs. 34 and 35. It may be asserted without much exaggeration that the conventional element in the constitution of the United States is now as large as in the English Constitution."

Another objection raised against Federal Constitutions is, that it is inconsistent with responsible government. Canada and Australia have answered this objection. It was raised in both those countries before Federations were formed there, and to-day they are not only working quite successfully, but have even worked their way to real autonomy.

Yet another objection put forward is that a Federal Government is more expensive than a unitary government. This is no doubt true, but cost does not really count in constitution-making. Nor will the cost be so unbearably heavy as it is feared.

We are also told that the vastness of our country is a point in favour of a Unitary Government, especially for the purpose of defence. But, perhaps, the very vastness of the country is one of the strongest reasons for a federation of the Provinces. So wide is the diversity and so deep is the cleavage between province and province, in religion, in language, in race and in social and economic conditions that it is impossible to conceive how any highly centralised Unitary Government can be efficiently carried on in this great country without breaking down. Such a government will not be able to serve the subjects of distant provinces, nor will the central legislative body be in a position to cope with the enormous legislative duties dealing with conflicting interests. By the mere weight of the immensity of its own work will the machinery of both the Executive and Legislature break down to pieces within a few years. No Central Government at Delhi under the Moghul Emperors was ever able to keep an effective control over all the provinces, and when the Moghul Power betrayed signs of weakness, the provincial Satraps lost no time in setting up independent or quasi-independent kingdoms. No prudent statesman or far-seeing constitution-maker should lose sight of this possible contingency. It happened before and it may happen at any time in future. History has a tendency to repeat itself. In a central Government, too, there is the danger of a reversion to autocracy, so much dreaded by the fathers of the American Constitution. A powerful Minister or Peshwa, or a Napoleon or a Sivaji might yet arise with ambitions for a throne and a Unitary Government will be an easier prey to him than a Federal Government. Such ambitions are not easy of realisation in a Federal country where also there is not much possibility for Provincial Satraps to make themselves masters and rulers of their States. Democracy is undoubtedly safer under a federal than under a unitary constitution.

There is yet another danger in a unitary form of government, so far as India is concerned. Those that are familiar with the working of the Indian National Congress will remember the apprehensions entertained by Madras, Central Provinces, the United Provinces, and the Punjab, at the beginning of this century regarding the autocratic control of that popular body, at one time by Bengal, and at another by Bombay. If the leading spirits of a particular province get the upper hand in a central unitary government, the desire of that ring of politicians to rule over the other provinces becomes almost irresistible. It will naturally cause irritation and suspicion in other provinces and the smooth working of the machinery of Government will be greatly impeded.

The objection, that the existence of a large number of Native States is a stumbling-block in the path of a Federation, is absolutely untenable. It has already been pointed out that, according to Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford, the solution of the problem of the unification of India lies in the working out of a system in which the Native States can be brought into line with the provinces of this country. In fact, the strongest reason for a federal system of constitution for India lies in the existence of these Native States. It is no use telling the hereditary rulers of these States that they must be prepared to be content with occupying the position of Provincial Governors. They have rights of their own. You cannot take away those rights. They are created, sanctioned and recognised by treaties. You cannot treat these treaties as scraps of paper. They are solemn pledges of the Suzerain. The Princes will be justified in drawing the sword to protect them. Their consent is essential for any form of union that you may desire. They have fiscal rights. They are independent of British India. They owe no allegiance to you, the people of British India. They owe no allegiance to each other. They owe allegiance only to His Brittanic Majesty. They are exactly in the same position as the American States were before the Declaration of Independence. They are exactly in the same condition as the Colonies, the Canadian Provinces, or Australian States were before federation. These Indian Native States, too, are in varying degrees of civilisation and culture. Their languages are different. Their religion is not the same. Their economic conditions vary. Even the personal law, under which their subjects are governed, is different in different states. Now it is impossible that in the midst of free India, there could be six hundred or more such Native States, scattered over the whole area, equally free and independent of each other and of British India, without danger of constant conflict. It is impossible to expect that the Indian States will acknowledge subordination to the Central Indian Government, and reduce themselves to the position of provinces. On the other hand, if a Federation can be formed, there will be a possibility of inducing the States to join the Federation, while retaining their autonomy for a long time to come. At first, they will be unwilling to join the Federation. But, as time goes on, and as they watch the working of the Federation, the States cannot remain unaffected by the constitutional developments rapidly progressing in the adjoining provinces. Democracy, too, will find its way into the States, however furtively and slowly it may be. Then will the States find it desirable, in their own interests, to make common cause with the adjoining provinces and acquire a longing for becoming real and effective partners in the great Commonwealth of India. But, as hinted in the above lines, it is clearly a matter for the States to choose. It is for them to decide whether they will join the federation or not. Unless and until the people and the rulers of the States desire to join the Federation, it is not for British India or for her politicians to ask the Native States to become her partners. But, as long as India remains a country with a highly centralized form of government, so long will the Native States find it impossible to seek union with her, for union then can only mean subordination. Only a federation and that the Australian type, not the Canadian, can solve the problem of the Native States. Otherwise, constant warfare and strife will be the only consequence.

The history of the financial relations between the Government of India and the Provinces affords another important reason why India needs Federation. The treatment which Madras and the United Provinces received for nearly a century, at the hands of the Government of India, in being made milch-cows of India, and the fact that Bengal, Bombay and Burma were fed at the expense of the other provinces are matters of history. The controversy, now happily no more, over what was known as "The Iniquitous Impost," that is, over the contributions which the provinces had to pay to the Central Government, during the first six or seven years of the introduction of the Reforms of 1919, furnishes another argument pointing to the necessity of complete Provincial Autonomy and of a Federal system of Government. After the Reforms have put an end to the system of divided heads, there is, no doubt, a sort of financial autonomy enjoyed by the provinces at present. To-day, it is true, the revenues of the province are kept separate and are not mixed up with the central revenues. But, the theory is still the old one. All revenues are Indian revenues and are vested in His Majesty. The Accountant General, in the Provincial headquarters, is an Officer of the Government of India, and the cash balances in one province are allowed to be utilised in accommodating another province. But, apart from theoretical considerations, practical difficulties will always be arising so long as Provincial Autonomy is not developed and provinces are subject to the control of a Central Government. In a highly centralised government, it is impossible for the provinces to refuse calls for payment from above, even in ordinary years. No province can be sure of its own resources nor can it expect the absolute use of its own revenues collected, perhaps with great difficulty, and used with the greatest economy. It cannot treat such revenues as its own and any inducement to economise will be taken away, if the province is constantly reminded that its revenues are not its own, but that the Central Government can take them away at any moment and under any pretext. It is unnecessary to dilate upon the disadvantages of such a system. If the provinces are to prosper, if they are to expand their revenues and utilise them for nation-building purposes, such as education, sanitation, public health, irrigation, and other works of public utility, they must be in a position to call their revenues their own, so that the economies effected in one branch may supply funds for the development of other branches and the surpluses at the end of each year might be brought over to be utilised in the following year or years. Such a position is possible in theory and in practice only under a federal system in which provinces enjoy complete Provincial Autonomy.

One other important circumstance, which makes the need for a federation of provinces absolutely inevitable in India may be mentioned here. There are provinces in which social tyranny, religious oppression and political dominance of a single community over majority communities are intolerably prevalent. Take, for instance, the case of Madras. Here the Non-Brahmins form 87 per cent. of the population, pay 85 per cent. of the taxes, and own the bulk of the property in the country. The Brahmin community, known as the "Monopolist Community," whose population is 3 per cent., whose taxpaying capacity is very little, and whose aggregate property is negligible, for all practical purposes, occupies a position in politics and in the public services which is unknown in the history of the world, save perhaps that of the Magyars in Hungary. The Non-Brahmins complain that they are subjected to a social tyranny, and wish to free themselves from it. The Depressed Classes and the Untouchables form nearly a fifth of the population. There are communities whose very sight is pollution, and in Malabar there is what is known as distance pollution, that is to say, the members of a particular community cannot approach the members of the higher castes and must always keep themselves beyond a certain prescribed distance. Then the influence which the priestcraft exerts over the ignorant masses, over women and over people prone to superstition, is infinitely more than what is said to have been exercised by the Jesuits over the Roman Catholics of the seventeenth century. Every social event is accompanied by a religious ceremony—from the time a soul enters its mother's womb till death takes place, and for three generations afterwards. Marriage and death alike come within the purview of this religious bondage. Even insignificant incidents, such as naming, ear-boring, initiation to the alphabet, and the like, are converted into religious ceremonies. The influence of the priestcraft over the people can be easily understood under such circumstances. These disabilities can be removed and grievances redressed only in an autonomous provincial government, and by a provincial legislature. In the Central Government and in the Central Legislature it is impossible for the representatives of a single province to convince the majority of those present there, who come from different provinces, who may not visualise the depth of the feeling for change or the enormity of the wrong suffered. Federation, and Federation alone, can solve these problems to any extent that may be deemed satisfactory. It is only in an autonomous province that independent action to remedy these evils can be undertaken. Each province will then be at liberty to effect such reforms as are essential for emancipation from social tyranny, religious bondage, and political domination, and for enhancing the happiness of its citizens. The power, control and influence, which a central government is apt to exercise over provincial governments in a unitary form of government, are certainly heavy blocks which bar independent action on the part of provinces.

Having given our reasons why a Federal system of Government is needed for India, we may be permitted to mention a few salient features of the exact type we want. We have already pointed out that the partnership of the Native States in the Indian Federation is possible only if the Australian system is adopted. That system alone can guarantee the complete autonomy which the Native States would naturally demand. We do not propose to enumerate the details of the constitution of the States and of the Commonwealth and of the relations between the two. That will be the task of those entrusted with the onerous duty of drafting the Bill, and we are sure that they will keep the provisions of the Australian constitution constantly before them. We may, however, be permitted to mention a few important features to which we would like to give prominence.

1. The Federal Government and the States' (Native States as well as provinces) Governments shall in their relations be independent, and not hierarchical. That supervision, control and direction which the Dominion Government exercises over the Provinces in Canada shall not be allowed in India. The respective Governments may owe certain duties to each other, but that is different from subordination or dependence.

2. The State Legislation shall not be subject to the veto of the Federal Executive. The Provincial Governor will assent or refuse to assent, in the name of His Majesty, or reserve for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure, Bills passed by the Provincial Legislatures.

3. The legislative powers of the Federal Parliament shall be exclusive, as also those of the Provincial Legislatures. There may also be concurrent powers, but in case of conflict, the law of the Commonwealth shall prevail.

4. The legislatures of the States shall have the residuary powers.

5. The functions of the Commonwealth shall be separate from and independent of the functions of the State Governments, but the Commonwealth and the States system shall be regarded as one whole.

6. The subjects owe a double allegiance: the subjects are subjects of the State in whose territory they live and also the subjects of the Federal Government.

7. When any dispute arises as to where a certain power lies, whether in the Commonwealth Government or in the States Government, it shall be decided by the courts, which can determine the validity of the authority under which acts are done, save the authority of the Imperial Parliament.

THE JUDICATURE.

There shall be a Supreme Court for India, which shall exercise functions similar to those of the Federal Supreme Court of Australia (called "The High Court of Australia"). Its constitution and powers shall be, as nearly as possible, similar to those of the Federal Supreme Court in that country. All the courts, now existing in the provinces (States of India) whether they be High Courts, Chief Courts, or Judicial Commissioner's Courts, or the courts subordinate thereto, shall be deemed to be courts of the State in which they are located. The Indian Legislature may also establish, besides the Supreme Court of India, other Federal Courts anywhere in India, and it may also invest the existing courts, hereafter to be called the State Courts, with Federal jurisdiction. The right of appeal to the King in Council from Indian Courts shall be on the lines prescribed in the Australian Constitution, and also the right of appeal from the State Courts to the Supreme Court. The Judges of the Supreme Court shall be appointed by His Majesty and be liable to be removed by His Majesty on an address from both Houses of the Indian Legislature. The other Federal judges shall be appointed and be liable to be removed likewise by the Governor-General. The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall be similar to that of the Supreme Court of Australia. The power to define the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the other Federal Courts shall rest with the Indian Legislature. The Indian Legislature may also make laws conferring rights to proceed against the Government of India or of a State (Province), in respect of matters within the limits of the judicial power.

IV

DECLARATION OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS.

The following fundamental rights shall be embodied in the Constitution:—

1. Personal freedom is inviolable. No restraint or deprivation of personal liberty by the public power is admissible, unless authorised by law.

2. Persons in custody are to be informed, within twenty-four hours of their arrest, by what authority and upon what grounds they were ordered to be deprived of their liberty, and they must at once be given an opportunity to raise objections against such deprivation. A writ of Habeas Corpus shall be available for all such persons, every Sessions Judge (besides the High Courts) being invested with authority to issue such a writ.

3. The dwelling of each person is inviolable, and shall not be forcibly entered into or upon, except in accordance with law.

4. Freedom of conscience is guaranteed.

5. The free practice and profession of religion is guaranteed, subject to public order and morality.

6. The right of free expression of opinion is guaranteed, when not opposed to public morality.

7. The right to assemble peaceably is guaranteed.

8. The right to free elementary education is guaranteed. School attendance is compulsory for boys and girls till the age of 12.

9. All the citizens of India are equal before the law, and no penal law, substantive or procedural, shall be of a discriminating nature.

10. No one shall be tried save in due course of law, and extraordinary courts shall not be established, save only such military tribunals as may be authorised by law for dealing with military offenders against military law.

11. Save in time of war, or army rebellion, and for acts committed in such time, the jurisdiction of military tribunals shall not be extended to or exercised over the civil population.

12. No person shall be criminally charged without a jury, save for minor offences by summary courts, and for military offences by Military Courts.

13. The secrecy of correspondence, as well as the secrecy of postal, telegraphic and telephonic communication is inviolable. Exceptions may be admitted by federal law only.

14. Freedom to combine for the protection and betterment of their conditions of labour, and their economic position generally is guaranteed to workmen. All agreements and measures which tend to restrict or abrogate that freedom are contrary to law.

15. No State Legislature shall make any law taking or giving power to deport any subject of any other State in India, or to withhold admission into the State.

16. The union of the executive and the judicial functions is inadmissible.

17. Every citizen of India is guaranteed the free use of all public roads, public tanks, public wells, public schools, and other public resorts.

18. Free admission to every public Hindu temple is guaranteed to every Hindu.

19. Protection against untouchability is guaranteed. It is for the State Legislature to enact such provisions as may be necessary to give effect to this right.

20. Communal representation in Public Services is guaranteed, provided qualified applicants are available. No one community shall be allowed to monopolise any particular Service.

We do not think that we need assign any reasons for these fundamental rights being incorporated in the constitution that is to be given to India. As Mr. Moore observes in his "Commonwealth of Australia," a constitution or instrument of government in the modern sense, consists of, among others, "an enumeration of rights of the citizens or classes of citizens against the government, which may vary from the enunciation of a few general principles, which are rather counsels of perfection than practical restraints, to the most minute provisions on all sorts of matters rigorously binding the organs of government." The first sixteen of the fundamental rights, we have asked for above, are to be found in many, if not almost all, modern constitutions. It may, perhaps, be contended that the remaining four rights are not rights against the State, but only against certain communities, and that such rights cannot be treated as fundamental rights. Our answer is that fundamental right are not in recent times confied to rights against the State, but are extended to rights against sections of society. For this position we may be permitted to cite the authority of Mr. Oppenheimer who, in his book "The Constitution of the German Republic" observes, that "Whilst the fundamental rights of the traditional order are all individualistic in character, and are rights against the State, the Weimar Constitution had added an entirely new type, social in scope and availing not against the State, but against certain social groups. For, as was stated in the National Assembly, the citizen must be secured by protection, not only against the State, but also against other social powers, sometimes more formidable than the State itself." Most of the fundamental rights mentioned in Sch. V. of Part II of the Appendix attached to the Constitution of the German Federation of 1919 may be contended to have been directed against Capitalism, and for the protection of Labour. But a perusal of Art. 130 in the same Appendix will disclose that provision is made for protection against a bureaucracy which in pre-war Germany was feared as an imperium in imperio. If in modern Germany provision could be made in the Constitution itself for fundamental rights, for the protection of labourers against capitalists, and for the protection of citizens against the bureaucracy, as distinguished from the State, there can be no reasonable objection for provisions being made for safeguarding the natural rights of the Oppressed and Depressed Classes in India. We feel that a heavy setback is being wrought against the development of nationality in this great land of ours by the indignities to which a certain class of Indian nationals is being daily subjected, and by the selfishness and clannishness of a certain monopolist class, who wish to have all the power and influence in their own hands to the detriment of majorities, thus striking at the very root of democracy. If India is to be a real nation, and if that nation is to be a self-respecting nation with a certain amount of solidarity, so very essential for a self-supporting self-government, the last four fundamental rights, mentioned above, require recognition and enforcement. They are, no doubt, rights against a section of society, and are not rights against the State. But they are rights essential to the very existence of a stable democratic State.

MADRAS.

22nd February, 1929.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION (EXCEPT SIR JOHN SIMON), OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE AND OF THE MADRAS PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

(IN THE ABSENCE OF THE CHAIRMAN, LORD BURNHAM TOOK THE CHAIR).

Deputation from the Constitutionalists (Southern India Liberal Federation).

The deputation consisted of :—

Rao Bahadur Dr. C. NATESA MUDALIAR, L.M. and S.
Mr. P. N. MARTHANDAM PILLAI, B.A., B.L., Advocate.
Mr. A. SIVARAMA MENON, B.A., B.L., Advocate.
Mr. R. MADANAGOPAUL NAIDU, B.A., B.L., Advocate.
Mr. N. GOPALA MENON, B.A., B.L., Advocate.
Mr. V. SIVAPRAKASA MUDALIAR, B.A., B.L., Advocate.

1. The Chairman : You, Rao Bahadur, are acting as chief spokesman of the deputation ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) Yes.

2. We all have in our hands the able and explicit Memorandum which you have drawn up, and which was sent to us as long ago as June last. Perhaps, as it is so complete a document, the best thing will be for me to ask you, Rao Bahadur, whether you would draw our attention to the paragraphs and passages which you think are most important, and generally deal with it yourself ?—On page 203 of our Memorandum we have noted down the points : "I, Complete "Provincial Autonomy. II, Introduction of the "principle of responsibility in the Central Govern- "ment. III, A Federal system of Government for "India. IV, A declaration of fundamental rights."

3. May I ask on that, with regard to the definition of the words, "provincial autonomy," do you want it to be the correct definition, which is, of course, local independence, or do you want it to be what has become almost an Indian definition, that is to say, local self-government ?—Local independence. We do not want the Central Government to have any control over the Provincial Government.

4. It must be self-government, but it need not necessarily be what you may call popular—I can hardly say democratic government ?—We have got, on page 203 : "By Provincial Autonomy, we only "mean freedom for the Government of the provinces

" from the restraints of the Government of India, " or the Secretary of State or the British Parliament. " We want provinces in India to have governments " of their own, uncontrolled and unrestricted from " above in all provincial matters—in matters con- " nected with administration, legislation and finance. " We want provincial Government in India to " enjoy the same freedom which the State Govern- " ments in the Commonwealth of Australia enjoy, " subject, of course, to this, namely, that provincial " Governments shall bear to the Central Government " in India, the same relations which the said States' " Governments bear towards their Federal Govern- " ment."

5. Of course, in the case of Australia the different States surrendered their rights for the formation of a Federal Government or Commonwealth ?—The Central Government ought to have certain powers, but each province ought to be independent as regards provincial matters.

6. Well, Sir John Simon could deal with it much more effectively from the point of view of constitutional law, but that is not quite so. There are certain subjects on which both the States and the Commonwealth have power to legislate. Immigration is a matter for the Commonwealth, and land settlement is a matter for the States. That is only an example ; and it is the same thing to some extent in regard to other matters ?—Here, too, there may be some subjects in regard to which the Central Government can legislate and others in regard to which the Provincial Government can legislate.

7. You want the Government of India to be on the lines of the Australian Commonwealth and the Australian States ?—Yes.

8. Then will you pursue the matter just as you like ? You condemn Dyarchy. Do you wish to say anything on that ?—We condemn Dyarchy because it is not working well at all ; in fact, the ministers when appointed have practically no power. There is a Legislative Council to which the ministers are responsible ; there is the Governor on the other hand, who may disagree with the ministers, and all the ministers need not act collectively. Each minister is independent. The Governor may ask one minister to resign and keep others in office. Then, the Secretaries of the ministers are not under the control of the ministers ; they can act independently.

9. As a matter of fact, in Madras the Governor who was in office at the time of the Reforms decided to treat the Government as a unitary Government ?—He did his best, but subsequent events took a different course.

10. Has not the precedent set by Lord Willingdon been followed since in this Presidency ?—Recently, even when the Legislative Council agreed with the policy of two of the ministers they were made to resign their appointments, and the chief minister alone was kept in office ; and then, in 1923, when three ministers were asked to resign, after the lifetime of the Council one of them was kept out, and the two others along with another formed the ministry ; so there is no collective responsibility of the ministers. Practically, ministers have no independence. They are responsible to the Council, but they cannot act independently of the Governor, and sometimes they cannot act independently of even their own secretary. That is the condition of the ministers in Madras.

11. In the case you cited they did act independently ; that is to say they both resigned ? —No, two of them resigned. The chief minister and the other ministers should act collectively. Two ministers resigned and the chief minister remained.

12. Would you like the whole lot to go—to get rid of them in a batch ?—Yes. The ministers and the councillors should act together. There are cases in which the ministers succeed, voting with the reserved half and other members while their own party may be defeated.

13. And you think you have got the political situation sufficiently organised to make sure of one party taking the place of another ?—The parties in Madras did work well for at least six years. The party may vote against the ministers ; sometimes the party succeeds while the ministers are defeated ; sometimes the party is defeated while the ministers succeed ; so there is no responsibility here. The ministers, therefore, are not responsible to the Legislative Council.

14. But it is not only that. I understand you make a point that the ministers and the members are not on an equal footing ?—The Executive Council members ? No.

15. Will you pursue your theme ?—The Executive Council members have got more powers. The ministry cannot act independently of the Governor, while the members of the Legislative Council can.

16. Could you refer us to the page and paragraph of your Memorandum ?—Paragraphs 1 to 38 are about the same thing—the defects of Dyarchy as it is worked in the Madras Presidency.

17. Will you draw our attention to the special points ?—Page 203, paragraph 7 : " Under the present " system, there need be no unity amongst the " ministers themselves, as distinguished from unity " with the executive councillors."

18. Yes, I understand that. That is a question of joint responsibility ?—Yes. Then, No. 9 on page 204 : " There is no need for joint deliberation amongst " the ministers themselves. Each minister can have " his own policy, and can go on with it, provided, " of course, the Governor accepts it, and the Legisla- " tive Council does not object to it." Of course, as I say, we have a chief minister in name in Madras, but the ministers are not bound to follow his lead or accept his advice. Then, paragraph 12 : " Mem- " bers of the Executive Council and ministers should " not oppose each other by speech or vote ; members " of the Executive Council should not be required " to support, either by speech or vote, proposals of " ministers which they do not approve ; nor should " ministers be required to support by speech or vote " proposals of the Executive Council of which they " do not approve." There comes the difficulty of ministers voting with the Executive Council, not with the Legislative Council to which they are responsible. We emphasise that there should be joint responsibility, that the whole Cabinet should act as one body.

19. You want a Cabinet system of government in the English fashion ?—Yes.

20. You are not thinking of any foreign systems ? —No, we are thinking of the English fashion.

21. I see you are against the Governor having the power of certifying Bills ?—Yes.

22. That is opposed to the true spirit of democracy, I suppose ?—Yes.

23. But that applies equally whether the Government is democratic or not ; whether it is democratic or oligarchic ?—We want democratic government.

24. Universal franchise ?—Not universal franchise. We want the franchise as it is, or it may be widened a little.

25. But that is not democratic at all ; that is what I call oligarchic ; but I understand you think it should apply, just the same, whatever the basis of the Government ?—Yes. Then on page 205, paragraph (d) : " The rules enabling secretaries and " heads of departments to have access to the " Governor behind the back of the ministers have " worked to the disadvantage of the latter." The secretaries should be the secretaries of the ministry, of the whole Cabinet.

26. The Governor's position should be that of the Sovereign ; that is to say, not to have power, but to have dignity ?—Yes. Then, paragraph 27, on page 206 distinguishes between the ministers and the Executive Council members. Ministers are not allowed to have a look at the files of the whole Government, but the Executive Council members are. The minister's secretary can do it.

27. As a matter of practice they do see them, do they not ? I have been told so ?—With the permission of the members they can see them, but the secretaries of the ministers can do it even without such permission.

28. I know the formal points involved, but I was told that in practice ministers did see these files. Ministers in other provinces told us that they did, as a matter of fact, see the files ?—It may be so in other provinces, but in paragraph 27 we say that " Under the practice set up in Madras, it is not open " to a minister to see any file or Government Order " passed in another department without the per- " mission of the member concerned."

The Chairman : Yes, I know that.

Sir A. P. Patro : The question is that both the minister and the executive councillor, if he wants to see the file, has simply to send a note to the secretary, and the secretary will, in the usual course, send the file to him. In the same way with the members. If they want to see a file in transferred matters, they send a note and the file is sent to the member.

The Chairman : It is the same practice as in England.

29. Sir A. P. Patro : That is not an important matter ?—We had our information from an ex-minister. Then, paragraph 29, page 206 : " The " absence of any real control of a minister over his " own secretary has already been referred to."

30 The Chairman : Could you tell us, have there been any large cases of friction between a minister and his secretary and the Governor of Madras : Is this imaginary, or is it real ?—It has been felt by the ministers themselves. As we say in paragraph 29 on page 206 : " Neither he nor the Legislative " Council can effectively control members of All- " India Services working under the ministers. The " salaries of the Services are non-votable, and " sometimes occasions have arisen in many a Legisla- " tive Council in India, when members had to move " motions for cutting down the pay of the clerks " and peons of an officer whose salary is non- " votable." Because the salaries are non-votable, the Legislative Council members have had to move as token motions the reduction of the salaries of their clerks and other subordinates.

31. Have those items been restored by the Governor ?—Yes.

32. The clerk has not lost his salary ?—No, it has been restored by the Governor.

33. Then, as they say in law, the clerk is not damnified ?—No.

34. Sir A. P. Patro : If I may explain, there have not been many instances where such action was taken by the Legislature. No doubt, criticism is faced by the fact that sometimes it is non-votable, but there have not been many cases where there has been unpleasantness of that sort ?—Is not there any instance of the Governor certifying demands refused by the Council ? There was a case where my friend, Sir. A. P. Patro, took a leading part, viz., the Russelkonda Saw Mills case.

Sir A. P. Patro : That does not relate, Rao Bahadur, to the matter of services. It was a matter of a new project put forward by the Government, and they thought that industrial enterprise would not be beneficial, and, therefore, the Council negatived the demand, and the Governor thought it would be in the interests of the country and of the people that the enterprise should be begun. Therefore, it is not a case of services.

35. The Chairman : Mr. Bhore has looked it out for me, and it refers to a case where the Governor certified expenditure in respect of the Forest Department. That is the case you are referring to ?—Yes. Many resolutions were tabled. After the assurances of the members of the Executive Council and the ministers, those resolutions were withdrawn. For instance, in Madras the pay of judges of the High Court is non-votable, and simply because the equal distribution of appointments to various communities was not given due recognition by the High Court of Madras, resolutions were tabled often to reduce by Rs100 the demand in the Budget for the salaries of the clerks of the High Court, and it was only after the member gave a satisfactory explanation and agreed to the principle enunciated the resolutions were withdrawn.

36. The reductions were not carried, I understand ? —No. They were not carried.

37. That happens in other legislative bodies, does it not ? That is a common feature of legislative bodies ?—(Mr. Naidu) The salaries of members of Council being non-votable, a reduction is proposed in the salary of a clerk. It is not pressed to a division, but it gives the opportunity for a discussion on the particular good behaviour or otherwise of the member.

38. These reductions of small amounts in the salaries of petty officials are moved in the Legislative Council because you cannot get at the person you want to get at ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) Yes, that is the point. Then, paragraph 33, on page 206 : " The " reservation of certain posts in the Transferred " Departments to the Indian Civil Service has also " caused some inconvenience in some provinces, in " that it did not leave enough scope for the minister " to make a choice that can be said to be satisfactory. " Take, for instance the Co-operative department. " The head of that department should be endowed " with a large amount of missionary zeal, sufficient " acquaintance with prominent men, and the con- " ditions in the rural areas, and a knowledge of and " ability to speak the vernacular of the locality. " Some I.C.S. officers might be available to fulfil " these requirements, but not many. The minister " is not empowered, under the constitution, to put " in an Indian or even a European who does not " belong to the Indian Civil Service when the post " is ' listed '."

39. You do not think the I.C.S. officers have been satisfactory in this capacity ?—No. Some I.C.S. officers may be satisfactory, but most of them are not. Ministers have not got the power to do as they like in such cases.

40. They are not allowed to go outside the regular Services, and take whom they like ?—No. (Mr. Naidu) There is no reflection on the I.C.S. officers. There are certain positions to which people of experience ought to be appointed, but the rules are such that only I.C.S. officers can be appointed to such offices and no power or discretion is given to the ministers.

41. Supposing you got a Public Service Commission at work here, then the minister would still be debarred from making the choice of anybody he might think fit ?—As far as we are concerned, we are not for allowing a Public Service Commission to supersede the powers of a minister under the new Reforms.

42. You think it would interfere with the liberty of the individual minister ?—Yes. (Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) The Government will dictate a policy to the Public Service Commission, and they will have to follow it. Of course, they are independent of the Government in selection, but the policy would come from the Government.

43. The Government would give directions to the Public Service Commission ?—Yes. Then, paragraph 38 on page 207 : " The subjects chosen for " transfer and those reserved tell their own tale and " disclose the plausible difficulties of Dyarchy. All " subjects have a bearing upon each other, and it is " difficult to dissociate one from another in actual " administration. In Madras, the Minister for " Agriculture is a minister without Irrigation or " Land Revenue, both of which are reserved subjects. " He is also Minister of Industries without Labour, " Factories, Boilers or Mines, which are all reserved " subjects. He is further a Minister for Development " without Forests or Electricity, both of which are " again reserved subjects. The Minister for Public " Works has nothing to do with Irrigation, though " the department of Public Works includes Irriga- " tion as well as Civil Works."

44. That is in favour of the transfer of the departments which cover all these subjects ?—Yes. These are the points we want to emphasise.

45. Sir A. P. Patro : May I explain it ? The point raised by the Rao Bahadur is that the re-distribution of the portfolios would be conducive to more efficient work ?—No, no, no. All these subjects should become provincial ones. All these subjects should be transferred. Some subjects ought not to be transferred and others reserved. Every subject should be transferred.

46. Full responsible Government ?—Provincial autonomy.

47. Major Attlee : This document is an illustration of the confusion between provincial autonomy and responsible government in a province. The one relates to the position as between the province and any outside authority, and the other to the constitutional position within the province. I think we ought to get it clear, because a good deal of this, I think, is taken up in a confusion between two terms ? —There are two things now ; transferred and reserved subjects. We say all will be provincial subjects—no transferred subjects and no reserved subjects.

48. The point is, that is not provincial autonomy ; that is responsible government in the province. Provincial autonomy has relation to the position as between the Province and the Central Government ? —The Chairman asked us about the defects of Dyarchy. We have been telling that.

49. The Chairman : Will you go on ?—It is explained on page 207 : " There shall be no distinction " between reserved and transferred subjects. All " shall be provincial subjects, and under the control " and direction of the ministers."

50. You want the Governor to come out from Home, I see, and not to be a civil servant, in any case. That applies to other provinces. Here they are always drawn from Home, at least practically ?—Yes.

51. That is, you are legislating for other provinces. I mean, this provision about bringing Governors out from Home rather than from the Civil Service hardly applies to the Presidency of Madras ?—We want the continuation of the present system. (Mr. Naidu) We do not say it is a grievance we want redressed ; but we want the present system to continue.

52. But you are thinking of other provinces than your own ; you want to benefit other parts of India as well ?—Yes.

53. I see you say, on paragraph 3, on page 208, " The Governor . . . should occupy the same position, " as nearly as possible, of a constitutional Governor " in Australia."—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) Yes. Then paragraph 7, on page 208 : " The Ministry shall " consist of the Prime Minister, and not less than five " other Ministers. The Governor shall appoint the " Prime Minister who shall choose his colleagues with " the approval of the Governor." Then, paragraph 9 : " There shall be no executive councillors in the " sense in which they exist at present. But there " shall be two advisers to the Ministry generally " chosen from the Civil Service. These two will have " a seat in the Cabinet, and also in the legislative " bodies, without a vote in either. One of these is " to be the Financial Adviser to the Ministers, and " the other their Adviser on Law and Order. They " will receive the same salary as the Ministers."

54. Would they be able to speak ? I see they cannot vote ?—They can speak ; they can advise.

55. In the Legislative Council ?—Yes.

56. Will they have the right of speaking, or will they only speak when called upon ?—They will have the right of taking part in the discussion. Then on page 208 we deal with the franchise : " Separate " electorates for minorities, such as Moslems, Indian " Christians and Europeans shall continue."

57. The present number ?—Yes. (Mr. Naidu) We say, in paragraph 4 : " We are not in favour of " universal suffrage, for the present ; but the property " qualifications of voters may be reduced, and this is " absolutely necessary in the case of the Depressed " Classes, Indian Christians, and the Moslems." That necessarily means that there will be an increase in the number of voters, and we propose that members of the provincial council shall be more numerous than at present.

58. Can you tell us something of your scheme for the representation of the Depressed Classes, because we have heard a good deal of it here ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) We are proposing here, in paragraph 2 on page 208 : " Separate electorates for Depressed " Classes, with separate electoral qualifications, " shall be established." As there are not many Depressed Class people who are paying taxes, the franchise should be reduced as much as possible. It may be that voting capacity should be given to anybody who pays any tax.

59. There are ten seats filled by nomination now ? —Yes.

60. Do you want ten seats reserved for them ? Is it to be by election ?—By election. (Mr. Naidu) But they will be increased if our proposal about the increase of the number of members of the legislative council is accepted. In that case the number of members who represent the Depressed Classes should be increased to some higher number.

61. I am not quite clear as to the franchise for the Depressed Classes now ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) Now, anybody who pays Rs10 can vote, but there are not many Depressed Class people who are paying Rs10 tax ; in fact, there are not many of them who pay even Rs2 or Re1 tax. So our suggestion is that all those Depressed Class members who pay any tax should have a vote.

62. Does that cover the local cess for local bodies ? —Yes.

63. Have you made any calculation as to the number of Depressed Classes that will form this new electorate ?—No, we have not, but we know by experience what it is.

64. Not many ?—Not many.

65. But you prefer that system to nomination ?— When we want to have this extended legislative council we prefer it, but I would rather leave it to the members of the Depressed Classes to settle it for themselves.

66. Would they do that by a plebiscite or a referendum ? How would they settle it ?—The representatives of the Depressed Classes may meet and settle it.

67. But you have not got a register up to the present ?—I mean the members of the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly belonging to the Depressed Classes.

68. Sir Hari Singh Gour : But they are not elected by the Depressed Classes ?—But there is no other course now, as matters stand, but to take the people who are now on the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly and ask them to come to a conclusion ; and there are various Associations, and the presidents of those Associations might be called in to give their opinion.

69. The Chairman : Then I understand the body that would settle the electorate for the Depressed Classes are members of the Depressed Classes who are in the legislative bodies now, and presidents of Associations ?—Yes ; various recognised Associations.

70. Associations of any sort ?—Depressed Classes Associations.

71. And what about Indian Christians ? Would you do that in the same way ?—Yes.

72. And Moslems ?—Moslems, Indian Christians and Europeans.

73. They would all be on a common principle ? —Yes.

74. You want reservation of seats continued to the non-Brahmins—No. 5 on page 208 ?—Yes, we want that to continue.

75. Now you come to your interesting suggestions for the relations between the two Houses. Would you like to tell us something about your new Senate ?

—We do not want to press it so much ; it is only a safeguard.

76. But still, you are in favour, are you not, of a Senate ?—Yes, we are in favour of it. If provincial autonomy is given, we want that safeguard.

77. That is to say, if any form of dyarchy is continued, you do not want a Second Chamber ?—We want a Second Chamber, but we do not want dyarchy to continue as a mere safeguard.

78. Is there anything else to which you wish to draw attention ?—Here in our Presidency we want to draw attention to one thing, communal representation in the public services.

79. What page ?—Page 217, No. 20 : " Communal " representation in public services is guaranteed, " provided qualified applicants are available. No " one community shall be allowed to monopolise any " particular service." That is a most important thing for our province.

80. What proportions ?—According to the proportions of the population. Now the conditions existing are not at all desirable. This has been felt not by us only, the present politicians. Even at the time of the East India Company this was felt by the Government itself. Communal representation was embodied in a Standing Order in 1854.

81. That applies to Moslems, of course, as well as to the others ?—To everybody.

82. Everybody in proportion to their numbers in the population ?—Yes.

83. In the province, of course ?—Yes. Will you please refer to page 216 : " One other " important circumstance, which makes the need " for a federation of provinces absolutely inevitable " in India, may be mentioned here. There are " provinces in which social tyranny, religious oppres- " sion and political dominance of a single community " over majority communities are intolerably " prevalent."

84. I see you say ; " The Brahmin community, " known as the ' Monopolist Community,' whose " population is 8 per cent., whose tax paying capacity " is very little, and whose aggregate property is " negligible, for all practical purposes, occupies a " position in politics and in the public services, " which is unknown in the history of the world, save, " perhaps, that of the Magyars in Hungary." You also say that the influence of the priestcraft " is " infinitely more than what is said to have been " exercised by the Jesuits over the Roman Catholics " of the seventeenth century."—No one from outside can understand the difficulty about the caste system in India. Our people are so caste-tight and community-tight that there is nothing in common except that they are born in India. So if one community comes into power it is likely that that community will tyrannise over the other communities ; so to keep up equality among all the communities, even as long ago as 1854, when the East India Company was here, they passed a Standing Order that all the communities should be represented in the public services.

85. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : If these are your fears, why do you want provincial autonomy at all ? —No, no ; we want not only provincial autonomy, but Dominion Status for India, provided social and economic conditions are safeguarded. We want the highest status we can get under the British Empire, but with sufficient safeguards for things, social and economic.

86. The Chairman : Mr. Hartshorn wants to clear up one matter in this book on the services, where it is laid down in regard to the services in this Presidency that the proportions in communal terms are to be 40 per cent. non-Brahmins, 20 Muhammadans, 20 Brahmins, 10 Anglo-Indians and Indian Christians and 10 Depressed Classes and others. Mr. Hartshorn wants to know whether that is the proportion you were thinking of ?—That is the proportion we want now, but that is more broken than observed.

87. It is honoured more in the breach than in the observance ?—Yes. (Mr. Naidu) As an illustration of what the present position is I may state that amongst the gazetted officers, who are about 1,625 in number, 600 are Brahmins ; three per cent. of the population holding so many appointments ; so that you will be able to see the disparity of the proportion of appointments between these communities, and so it is that we say that communal representation should be so vouchsafed and so insisted upon that we shall be able to have the interests of the majority communities taken care of. (Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) May I say one word here. The Brahmins form three per cent. of the population, and they hold about thirty-six per cent. of the appointments of gazetted officials (that is, officials drawing salaries ranging from Rs250 to Rs750). Seventy per cent. of the population, non-Brahmins, have got only seventeen per cent. The Depressed Classes are 16 per cent. of the population, and they are nowhere in this grade ; and the Muhammadans get less than their proportion, and so with other communities. Even in appointments of Rs100 and above the Brahmins who are three per cent. have fifty per cent. ; the non-Brahmins, who form seventy per cent. of the population, have only twenty-eight per cent. of appointments. In the case of the Depressed Classes, it is 0.07 per cent. ; they are fifteen per cent. of the population ; and then in the lower-paid positions the Brahmins get forty-nine per cent. and the Depressed Classes are getting only 0.2 per cent. of the appointments.

88. Lord Burnham : I take it I may sum up the whole thing you put before us in your own words on page 216 that each province should be at liberty to effect such reforms as are essential for emancipation from social tyranny, religious bondage and political domination ?—Yes. I want also to add that we want reservation of seats in the Assembly. Now very few non-Brahmins are able to get elected to the Assembly. Another thing that I want to press upon the Commission is that District Board Presidents ought not to be members of the Legislative Council. That should be a disqualification. Now a Governor calls a chief minister and asks him to appoint other ministers. The minister who becomes the local self-government minister is generally the chief minister, and to him are attached all the District Board Presidents, who become members of the Legislative Council. So, of course, he is sure of seven or eight District Board Presidents who are in the Legislative Council. But then these people are quasi-officials. They are, in fact, executive officers as far as their districts are concerned, and they carry on propaganda work for the ministry. So the will of the people never prevails in the Legislative Council, but it is the will of the District Board Presidents that influences the people. So, among the disqualifications, being a District Board President should be one. If a man is a District Board President he ought not to be elected to the Legislative Council, rather he ought not to be allowed to stand for the Legislative Council. He should resign and get into the Council. That is a very strong point we want to urge. Another is the reservation of seats for the Assembly, and yet another is communal representation in Services according to population, as also reservation of seats in the Legislative Council. Those are the points which we want to impress.

89. Major Attlee : I should like to put a few questions mainly with regard to your idea of provincial autonomy. Just set aside for the moment the question of the constitution of the province. Let us assume that it is a representative unitary Government in the province, and I want to get exactly what your ideas are with regard to provincial autonomy, which I gather you want to be completely free from the control of the Central Government. You say on page 216, that, " there are provinces in which " social tyranny, religious oppression and political " dominance of a single community over majority " communities are intolerably prevalent." There might be equally provinces in which there might be a danger of a majority community tyrannising over a minority ? It is quite possible, is it not, that you might have a majority community tyrannising over a minority ?—Quite possible.

90. And you say that if you have provincial autonomy each province will then be at liberty to effect such reforms as are essential for emancipation from social tyranny, religious bondage and political domination ?—Yes.

91. Then also equally a majority community might inflict on a minority social tyranny, religious oppression and political dominance ?—Yes.

92. It seems to me that these two points you make on page 216 in favour of provincial autonomy are all in favour of having some All-India control, which must be superior to a province to prevent any tyranny of a particular majority of the province ?—How would it be possible for All-India people to do it ? We want communal representation, but in the Assembly we are not able to put it forward, because other provinces are not able to understand our difficulties.

93. Suppose there are two provinces, A and B, and a particular community is in the majority in province A and a minority in B, and you give provincial autonomy. Suppose that the minority community in province B is being oppressed, as is possible under your provincial autonomy, and in province A you have a dominant majority of the same community. Then is there not the danger of retaliation if they have nothing above them and they are allowed to go their own sweet way for themselves ?—(Mr. Naidu) That is why we suggest reservation of seats.

94. But that would not get over the difficulty. If there is a majority you cannot make them a minority. Your whole point is that you want majority rule ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) The majority people will be represented in the Federal Government.

95. Yes, but the Federal Government have no power. You take away all power from the Federal Government. You leave everything to the province and restrict the power of the Central Government ?—But we are giving the Central Government power to make laws. At least there should be somebody to move for the minority interests.

96. You are very careful in demarcating the fields of power of the Central Government and the Provincial Government in order that the Central Government shall have no concern with Provincial affairs. That is the whole point. I call your attention to that danger. The next question is with regard to finance. You want the province to have control of its own finance ?—Yes.

97. You say nothing as to what power the Central Government is to have with regard to this money. Is it to have power of taxation in the province ?—No.

98. Then where does it get its money from ?—There are Central subjects, like Posts and Telegraphs, Salt and Railways. All these are Central subjects. They will get money from them.

99. Assuming everything as it is now and you are given complete control over the province, then do you exclude the right of the Central Government to raise any more revenue from the provinces ?—Yes.

100. Then where is the Central Government to get more money from if it wanted it ?—We will contribute.

101. On page 216 you are very strongly against that. You say : " In a highly centralised govern- " ment, it is impossible for the provinces to refuse " calls for payment from above, even in ordinary " years. No province can be sure of its own " resources," and so on.—Because we were made to feel it. According to the Meston Settlement our province had to pay Rs 348 lakhs every year to the Central Government.

102. Yes, I know you object to that. But you suggest that you are prepared to make contributions to the Central Government ?—Equal contributions. Let it be in proportion to the revenue or something like that. No one province should be unduly penalised, other provinces being allowed to go scot-free. (Mr. Naidu) We have stated on page 211 the number of subjects which we consider ought to be Central, and if the income from them is not sufficient I suppose every province will contribute.

103. I see on page 212 that you want your provincial legislature to have power to make constitutional changes in matters affecting franchise, electoral divisions and the like. If so, it is an illusory suggestion that your minority is going to be protected in your constitution ?—We are providing for the franchise of the minorities. We are asking them to have their own separate electorates.

104. But at the same time you are giving the provincial legislature the power to change it ?—We will make sufficient safeguards for them.

105. You not only want provincial autonomy, but you also give the province power to make organic changes ?—In the fundamental rights we are insisting on certain guarantees.

106. It seems to me that your fundamental guarantees are quite illusory.—(Mr. Naidu) With sufficient safeguards as in the case of the States Governments in Australia. That is our idea.

107. I think you are aware that the case of recent years in Australia has been a steady encroaching of the Central Government on the autonomy of the provinces because of the difficulty of extreme provincial autonomy. I think that has been the case of late years. Let me call your attention to one other point. I am not quite clear about your proposals on page 212. You suggest for the House of Representatives that " all those whose wage-earning capacity " is assessed at Rs 80 per mensem shall be eligible " to vote." How do you know that a person's earning capacity is so much ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) The local people will have to find it out. The revenue inspectors are there to find out the wage-earning capacity.

108. It is rather a hypothetical thing ?—(Mr. Naidu) At present, for example, in municipalities we have got what is called a profession tax, and the minimum income for a man to be assessed to profession tax is, I think. Rs100 a month. A list of persons liable to such tax is actually being prepared by certain Municipalities. Instead of the tax being Rs100 it should be say Rs30. And somebody will have to find out whether one has that Rs30 qualification.

109. Mr. Hartshorn : We were told yesterday that the income on which the professional tax was paid in the city was Rs30 per month. You now say it is Rs100.—It is Rs100.

110. Major Attlee : The professional tax is only in the town. How are you going to tell about the earning capacity of anybody else ? Are you going to have a poll tax ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) No. There are the revenue inspectors going about and they will find out the wage-earning capacity of various people.

111. You are dealing with a very big electorate in a population of 260 millions ?—It is the revenue inspectors who find out whether a man has to pay a tax of Rs10 or more or less.

112. I will leave that point. Just one point on reservation of seats. As a matter of practice in Madras non-Brahmins have their quota and more than their quota. So, why do you still want reservation of seats ?—We have got our own fears about it. We are in a majority, but yet we have got our fear. Generally the voters are influenced by the officials or by those that are in power. Before the Reforms out of ten legislative council members only one was a non-Brahmin and nine were Brahmins.

113. Major Attlee : That is an old story now.—How we are able to get a majority now is like this. At the time the non-Brahmins stood for the council just after the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms there was non-co-operation in the country, and Brahmin gentlemen did not to a large extent stand as candidates. And when once the non-Brahmins came into the council and the non-Brahmin ministry was formed these non-Brahmins became powerful. In fact the party which fought for communal representation and reservation of seats became powerful, and when it became powerful it had the presidents of District Boards and the nomination on District Boards and everything in their hands. So they were able to keep up the majority.

114. I do not see how a Minister can secure that the Local Boards shall elect a non-Brahmin or Brahmin ?—The Local Self-Government Minister has got power over the District Board Members. He has power in the matter of nomination of District Board members. In fact, the party which fought for communal representation had nearly 60 members in the first Council; in the next Council it was reduced to, I believe, 40, although non-Brahmins came in large numbers. Now they have got only 20 members. That shows that in the reservation of seats the people that are of the persuasion of the party which wanted communal representation did not come in, but other non-Brahmins, who are in favour of the other party which opposes communal representation, came into the council.

115. Is your point in fact that the majority of the Members of the Council are returned owing to the influence of the Presidents of Local Boards ?—Yes. The Presidents are executive officers. If there is an executive officer separately appointed in the District Boards, then we have no quarrel with the District Board Presidents coming as members of the Legislative Council. As it is, he is the executive officer, and he commands influence.

116. You mean when a Minister comes from a certain party, he takes care to nominate members of his own party ?—Yes. Any Minister comes in and he gets the allegiance of the District Board members. The District Board members get attached to that Minister, and then that continues. So it is only the will of the Minister or of the District Board members that prevails, and not the will of the people.

117. Lord Strathcona: It seems to me running through your document that the point on which you lay stress is that Ministers and Members, and Ministers in particular, shall have the power of selection of people in the Services. Do you lay great stress on Ministers having that power ?—Yes. If subordinates do not obey, what is the use of Ministers existing ?

118. In Great Britain when a Minister takes over a department, he finds the Civil Service in being ?—I do not think there are Secretaries in Great Britain who go against the will of the Ministers, or who will go beyond the will of the Ministers. The Ministers there have got absolute power, and so they are obeyed. It is not so here.

119. On page 213 you say that "the question of "the security of the All-India Services will be "sufficiently met by giving an appeal to the Secretary "of State against dismissals," and so forth. Do you think the safeguards you hold out for the Services in that paragraph will be regarded as satisfactory by all the members of the All-India Services ?—Yes, we believe so.

120. You realise that the members of the All-India Services are both Indian and English, and that they feel they must have certain safeguards in the matter of security of tenure, etc. Do you think that the provisions given there are ample ?—I think so.

121. And then you read out from that paragraph :—"If, however, the new constitution is confronted "with more serious problems concerning the Services, "a Commission similar to the Lee Commission might "be appointed . . ." You think that the working of the Lee Commission Report is not satisfactory ?—There we are talking of the conditions that might be brought about under the new Reforms in future. Supposing Provincial Autonomy is given, and if the Lee Commission Report would not adjust itself with the new Reforms, then we say a fresh Commission might be appointed.

122. On pages 213 and 214 you point out very clearly that what you desire to have is a Federation, and then you say that the strongest reason for a Federal system of Constitution for India lies in the existence of Native States, and that the solution of the problem of the unification of India lies in the working out of a system in which the Native States can be brought into line with the provinces of this country; and then half-way down at page 216 you say: "Then will the States find it desirable in their "own interests to make common cause with the "adjoining provinces and acquire a longing for "becoming real and effective partners in the great "Commonwealth of India." Have you any reason to suppose, or do you know at all, that the Native States are prepared or are anxious to come under some Federation ?—Of course, if they are anxious, let them come in; it will only strengthen their position if they come into the Federation. The several States will then be brought together. But if they are not willing to come, we have no quarrel with them, but it is better that they come into the Federation, so that there will be one India.

123. On the very first page of your document, you point out that you do not want to make these proposals unless you have unanimity in the people of India, and then you go on to say: "We do wish "to follow the precedent set up in the Preamble to "the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, "wherein we find 'Whereas the people of New "South Wales, etc., have agreed to unite' and so forth"; and then you say: "Thus, the Preamble "to the Government of India Act, 1929, may begin "as 'Whereas the people of the various provinces "in British India have agreed to give up the unitary "government under which they are hitherto governed "and to unite in one indissoluble Federal Common-"wealth'" and so forth. You have just been pointing out the great difficulty in India due to the necessity for communal representation in services, etc., which you say is demanded by a large section of the people in India. You have also stated that in your opinion the Native States also would be prepared to come into this Federation. But do you not think that it will be more important for India as a whole to try and get rid of these communal difficulties before you set up anything like the constitution you propose ?—These communal difficulties exist all over the world, though not to such an extent as we have. They are in England, and in Ireland (for example, the Ulster difficulty); and in Canada we have got difficulties of the various communities. So we say, with sufficient safeguards to the various communities, let us unite as Indians.

124. You have yourself admitted the existence of these communal difficulties in India, and it seems to me that the more statesmanlike course would be for you to try and get rid of the disruptive elements in India first, and then form a Federation ?—It is not possible for all the different elements in India to come together for centuries, because they were in existence for two thousand years and more. Now the only possibility is to have all the highest privileges which the British Empire can give us, and with sufficient safeguards for the various communities, bearing in mind the varied social and economic conditions of our place, we want to have a responsible Government, and we will not wait till these things disappear. The social conditions will never disappear for two hundred years and more, and we cannot wait for such a long time.

125. Then your argument is that it is possible under present conditions to work up to that indissoluble Federation which you want ?—It is possible. We are going on with the Government of Madras now. We are satisfying all the communities and we are getting on well. The sort of communal troubles which exists somewhere else in India do not exist in Madras now.

Lord Strathcona: It is a matter of argument, and I do not want to put any more questions about it.

126. Sir Sakaran Nair: I would like you to define yourself. There are no Brahmins amongst you belonging to your Association ?—No.

127. There are no Depressed Classes amongst you ?—There are.

128. You represent them also ?—Yes.

129. Amongst the non-Brahmins have they any other Association ? We have heard of another Association also ?—Yes.

130. What is the name of that Association ?—The South Indian Liberal Federation.

131. Is that distinct from you ?—We are one wing of the South Indian Liberal Federation ; they are the other wing.

132. What is the difference between the two politically ?—Politically this is the difference. The South Indian Liberal Federation is an institution whose creed was constitutional co-operation with the Government. In a confederation held in July, 1927, it passed a resolution of non-confidence in the Governor and passed another resolution of non-acceptance of office. We are for acceptance of office.

133. That is a great difference ?—That is the difference between us. And then, last time when this Commission came, they said they would not co-operate.

134. You are for co-operation, while they are not for co-operation ?—Now they are coming in for co-operation.

135. You are for acceptance of office ; they are not ?—Yes.

136. Which is the most numerous party, your wing or the other ?—My party was formed after the elections were over——.

137. That is another thing ?—We have the country with us. Although our party was formed after the elections ; the next elections will show what we are.

138. You are, then, more numerous ?—I think we are the more numerous. All the districts are with us.

139. What are the other chief political Associations in Madras ? One is the Non-co-operation Party ?—Yes.

140. That consists generally of Brahmins ?—Generally of Brahmins, I think.

141. You think ? You cannot speak definitely ?—Some non-Brahmins are also there.

142. Which is the other political Association ?—There is the Liberal League.

143. Who are the prominent members there ?—Sir C. P. Ramaswami Ayyar and the Honourable Mr. G. A. Natesan.

144. And they are non-co-operators, too ?—They are non-co-operators with this Commission.

145. They are more numerous, or you ?—In this Presidency we are certainly far more numerous.

146. Sir Arthur Froom : You feel confident that the system of self-government that you propose for the Madras Presidency would be an unqualified success ?—I think so.

147. Do you think that it will be equally successful in Bengal, for instance ?—We do not want to speak for that province, but I think circumstances will adjust themselves when provincial autonomy is given to them.

148. You do not care to speak about it ?—No.

149. In proposing a form of Government for Madras, are you making any recommendations with regard to the Central Government ?—To safeguard our own interests.

150. But then you are not quite sure that full self-government will work well or not in Bengal, or in Assam or in the Central Provinces ?—We are suggesting certain things and, if all those things are put together, our idea is it will work well.

151. My point is this, while you are proposing extension of Reforms to those in Madras, you leave the Central Government alone for the time being. Do you think that it will be a reasonable suggestion ?—Of course, in certain affairs we want our interests to be safeguarded in the Central Government also, and we are proposing certain things.

152. But your interest there is rather very small ?—There are certain things controlled by the Central Government, too, now ; for example, Defence, Stamps, Salt ; all those things are in the Central Government

153. Your opinion is that with these very radical changes you propose in Madras, it would not be at all a gamble which might change the Central Government ?—No. We propose only certain things which we think are necessary to safeguard our interest in the Central Government.

154. You do not think that you are making any undue distinction at the same time ?—I do not think so.

Sir Arthur Froom : You are putting all your eggs in one basket.

155. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : On page 204, paragraph 10, you say : " In no civilised country in " which the system of responsible Government " obtains is a Governor allowed to act against the " advice of the Ministers. * * * " By this you want to remove the veto of the Governor ? Are you aware that the Canadian Governor has the right of veto ?—We say he may refuse to act, but he will not act against the advice of his ministers.

156. That means he will have no right of veto ?—Vetoing is quite different. He may refuse to act ; he may not oppose a minister ; the minister says something and the Governor does something else.

157. You will allow veto then.—No.

158. Supposing, as you say at page 206, the minister is given authority to select and appoint his own I.C.S. and I.M.S. officers, will you allow those Service men to appeal direct to the Governor in case of difference of opinion between them and the minister ?—No ; to the Secretary of State ; otherwise what is the use of the minister existing ?

159 Lord Burnham : You speak of the development of indigenous medicine. That is your school of medicine, is it not ?—There is a school opened now. The old system of medicine is being revived now by the Madras Government.

160. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : On page 208, paragraph 9, you suggest that there should be two advisers to the ministry generally chosen from the Civil Service in regard to the two subjects of Finance and Law and Order ?—Yes, simply as advisers to the Government.

161. Do you think that the ministers themselves will not be able to carry on these subjects ?—If Law and Order and Finance were transferred to ministers, the experience gained by these officials will be useful to the ministers for some time.

162. Do you think that any self-respecting I.C.S. man will be prepared to work in the position you are assigning to him ?—If he is not willing to work, we do not want him.

163. You are not giving him any vote ?—But he is getting his pay for the position he occupies. The experience gained by the I.C.S. officers will be valuable to the ministry. They gain experience in this country and we do not want to let that experience go in vain.

164. What will be the position of those officers if their advice is disregarded by the minister ?—I do not think the advice of experienced people like that will be disregarded by the ministry, but they have got a right to do so.

165. On page 208, paragraph 5, you say : " Reserva- " tion of seats now allowed to the non-Brahmins " in the provinces of Madras and Bombay shall " continue." Are you speaking for Bombay also ?—No, mostly for Madras ; but similar conditions prevail in Bombay too, because in our Federation the Bombay people are also included.

166. Are you aware that a considerable portion of the non-Brahmins in Bombay do not welcome reservation of seats ?—Then we do not want to speak for Bombay ; let us confine ourselves to Madras.

167. Sir Hari Singh Gour : I wish to ask you a few questions, because there is a great deal more there that I have not been able to understand, and I shall concentrate upon points on which I have not been able to understand you. At page 208, paragraph 12, you say : " We want the residuary powers in the "provinces." That is a very significant scheme. You want, therefore, a complete system of federation in which the provinces will be independent of the Central Government?—Yes.

168. If you have that system and you find that there is a conflict between the Governor and the members of your Cabinet, what will be the situation? Where is the general referee?—The Cabinet.

169. The Cabinet is the final authority?—Yes.

170. If there are inter-provincial questions, supposing you set up a tariff board against Bombay and Bombay sets up a tariff board against you?—In that case the Central Government.

171. But the residuary powers are in the Government of the province and not in the Central Government. The residuary powers must rest in the Central Government which can control the various Federal Governments. The Central Government will be the ultimate authority. Otherwise you will have independent States like Siam and Cochin-China and Japan. Therefore, would you have the residuary power vested in the Central Government?—Yes.

172. You agree with me there? I am going to the framework of your constitution?—Will you please look to page 217? There we have stated that: "The "respective governments may owe certain duties "to each other, but that is different from subordina- "tion or dependence."

173. That is a pious hope. I am not dealing with pious generalities. I am dealing with hard facts, namely, if there is a difference between a province and province, if there is a conflict between the Governor and Cabinet, if there is a question when the whole machinery of your provincial Government may tumble down, when there is such a serious disturbance as to call in the aid of the central army, or you may pass, for instance, a certain kind of legislation which may so upset the whole province that it may be necessary to maintain law and order by calling in the military; in all these cases you must give the power to the Central Government. The Central Government must be the fountain-head of all residuary power and without that residuary power vested in the Central Government, I cannot conceive of any organisation in the province?—We have stated in clause (3) at page 217; "The legislative "powers of the Federal Parliament shall be ex- "clusive, as also those of the provincial legislatures. "There may also be concurrent powers, but, in case of "conflict, the law of the Commonwealth shall "prevail."

174. These are quotations which I am familiar with. Some of them, I know, are from the Australian Commonwealth. Having made the statements as your own I want you to define your scheme vis-à-vis the Government of India. We are not concerned with Australia or Canada. We have got our own problems here which are acute. We are the people of India and we have to consider Indian problems?—What applies there may apply here also.

175. It does not?—Why not?

176. Australia has not got the frontier question; Australia has not got the communal question. Australia has not got the cataclysmic disturbances which occur in various parts of India for reasons best known to God. There are no Depressed Classes there; no Hindus, no Brahmins, no non-Brahmins and so on?—We can adopt that with some adjustments.

177. You start on the basis of residuary powers with the provincial Government?—On page 217, paragraph 3, we say that in case of conflict the law of the Commonwealth shall prevail.

178. There must be one supreme authority in all these cases. If you give the residuary powers to the Government of India I can understand your Constitution; otherwise I cannot?—We explain it in paragraph 3 on page 217.

179. You do not. Is it your statement that you would give the residuary powers to the Central Government?—In extraordinary cases, yes.

180. Residuary means that. You exercise them only after all the powers under the Statute have been exercised. The Central Government would, therefore, be the supreme authority in that sense?—Yes.

181. You agree with that, and your Federation agrees with that?—(Mr. Pillai) We do not. It is possible to define the powers of the Central Legislature and also the powers of the Provincial Legislature, and leave the residuary powers either with the Central Government or the Provincial Government, and we prefer to leave them with the Provincial Government. The supreme authority is one thing and the residuary powers are another. Whenever there is nothing defined you can have the Central Government to exercise its residuary powers. It is possible to define the residuary powers in the Provincial Government.

182. You are dealing with residuary powers in regard to provincial subjects. I am dealing with the residuary powers after you get your provincial autonomy, and I put to your chief spokesman the question dealing with the wider constitutional problem, namely, in all cases of federation there must be a central authority in whom are vested the final residuary powers?—In that we entirely agree. But the powers not defined in any Act will rest with the Provincial Government.

183. The next point is this. On page 217 you have the declaration of fundamental rights. Is it a fundamental right which is to endure for all time—remembering you are making this constitution for all time—that "communal representation in public "Services is guaranteed, provided qualified applicants "are available; no one community shall be allowed "to monopolise any particular Service"? How can you possibly build up a democratic form of Government—and you have stated more than once that your objective is to establish a form of democracy in your province—if you want to apportion the political and public services according to the claims of the communities? Is the communal claim and the enunciation of those things as a fundamental right consistent with the democratic form of government?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) Yes. For instance, take the Depressed Classes. Six millions of them are in the worst condition possible. Unless we set apart certain appointments for them and give them encouragement, how is it possible for them to come up?

184. But those are only transitory provisions. They are palliatives for a disease which exists, and as soon as the disease ceases to exist, they should not be regarded as fundamental rights?—In our province it appears that they will never cease, or they may cease after fifty or one hundred years.

185. But, fundamental rights cannot be changed after fifty years?—Do you expect that communal differences will disappear in India or in Madras? We presume that communities will exist and these things will be there.

186. There is another thing that I have not been able to understand. You are dealing with franchise. You want to establish a democracy. Can you give me an example where the franchise you have mentioned on page 208 is consistent with the broad principle of democracy? You want separate electorates; you want apportionment of public services. You want the balance of power to be kept with this community and that community. You were speaking of the Australian Commonwealth, and other things. Do you know any country in the world where you have known of democracy consistently with the sort of franchise which you have stated here?—My conviction is that there is no country in the world with such compartments of castes and communities as in India, and especially our province.

187. Then the question comes to this: What you are really asking the Conference to give you is not a democratic form of government, but a representative government?—A democratic form of government with safeguards for the various communities.

188. So what you are asking this Conference to give you is not a democratic form of government but a representative government ?—I do not think democracy will disappear by giving separate electorates.

189. I suppose I have made myself clear. There is a clear and radical distinction between a representative form of government and a democratic form of government, and you want that form of government to be adopted to a country where democratic form of government is an impossibility ?—We want modified democracy. I do not want to call it representative. It is modified democracy suited to our conditions here.

190. The whole book, almost verbatim, is from the constitution of the Australian Commonwealth, and you have contrasted the Australian Commonwealth with the Canadian constitution, and you have preferred the former. I am only pointing out that analogy does not apply at all here ?—We want the Australian constitution to be adopted here, with certain modifications to suit our local conditions here.

191. Another thing I would like to ask you is this. You said that you want two members of the Civil Service to help you in matters of Finance and Law and Order, and their salary will be equivalent to the salary of the ministers. Why should you not have the Finance Member an expert in finance and not necessarily a member of the Civil Service ? —The I.C.S. man comes with all the experience he gathers from the lowest to the highest.

192. He is not necessarily a financial expert ? —Many of the I.C.S. officers are financial experts.

193. Many of them are not ?—We will choose the best among them and we will have the advantage of their experience in India.

194. If you have provincial autonomy, the I.C.S. officers will disappear ?—No ; we are not interfering with I.C.S. officers at all.

195. It will be an expiring Service ?—We are not against their remaining. We are in favour of foreign labour coming to India and giving us their help and advice.

196. Lord Burnham : Borrowing foreigners where you can use them most advantageously ?—Yes.

197. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You have stated that you want the Governor to be drawn from the Public Services in England. You say at present you have got no man in your own province who will fill the post of Governor ?—We do not say there is no man. There may be men. But taking the present conconditions, communal, social and economic, into consideration, that is our suggestion ; not that we have no people here fit to govern us. But the present conditions are such that we will have to wait and see.

198. I want to see whether I have correctly understood your scheme, apart from the fact whether I have been able to see eye to eye with you or not. Your scheme seems to be this. You have first of all at the head of the administration, a Governor. That Governor is not to preside at the meeting of the Cabinet. The responsibility of the Government is to be joint, and the Cabinet must be responsible to the legislature. That is the framework of your local constitution. The question of foreign relations and other excepted subjects will be dealt with by the Central Government, and in all other matters your Government will be paramount within the limits fixed by the Statute ? That is your scheme ?—Yes.

199. As regards the public Services, you point out on page 206 that " the reservation of certain posts " in the transferred departments to the Indian Civil " Service has also caused some inconvenience." You want all members of the public Services to be appointed by the Provincial Government and be answerable to the Provincial Government ?—Yes.

200. As regards the High Court, do you want the High Court to remain under the Madras Government or to be centralised ?—It must be under the Madras Government.

201. Do you not think that in view of the communal claims and the fact that the High Court is more or less regarded as a representative institution, it is better that it should be centralised and removed from the stress and storm in the province and placed in a more placid atmosphere ?—I want that it should be under us. (Mr. V. S. Mudaliar) The subordinate judicial Service in this Presidency under the existing conditions is working satisfactorily, and I do not see why there should be any fear for making the High Court subordinate to the Provincial Government.

202. As regards the secretaries, you have pointed that there are three very serious defects. One is that the Secretary has access to the Governor (pages 205-6). You want to remove that ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) Yes.

203. Then you want to abolish certain superfluous posts (page 206, paragraph 32). Tell us what posts you have in mind that you would like to be abolished ? —The posts recommended by the Retrenchment Committee.

204. Specify them ?—(Mr. V. S. Mudaliar) For instance, we want the head of the Co-operative department to be a provincial man.

205. That is not the abolition of superfluous posts ; that is the appointment of low paid men ?—We simply say that if a Minister finds that there are superfluous posts he should have the power to abolish them.

206. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : I would like you to clear up one point. I would refer you to page 208, paragraph 9, wherein you say that there shall be no executive councillors in the sense in which they exist at present. Then in paragraph 10 you say : " There shall be an executive council to advise the " Governor in the government of the province, and " the members of the Council shall be chosen and " summoned by the Governor and sworn as executive " councillors, and shall hold office during his pleasure." In paragraph 3 you say that the Governor should act entirely on the advice of his Ministers. How are these two ideas compatible with each other ? —(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) The executive councillors will be only advisers ; they will be honorary and unpaid.

207. These executive councillors will sit in the Cabinet ?—Yes.*

208. Will they have a vote in the Cabinet ?—Yes, they may have a vote.*

209. Would their number be equal to that of the Ministers, or more or less ?—That is a detail for the Governor to decide. The Governor may select any one whom he thinks would be of help to him.

210. So these executive councillors will have a right of vote, and will be appointed by the Governor ? —They will be appointed by the Governor, but will have no vote.

211. Supposing their number is more than that of the Ministers, it means that the whole power would go into the hands of the Governor and his honorary unpaid executive councillors ?—(Mr. N. G. Menon) They are purely advisory ; they will have no right of vote.

212. But the chief spokesman of the deputation said a little while ago that they will have a right of vote ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) They will be mere advisers.

213. Great stress has been laid on the fact that all the interests in the province should be represented in the Services. I would like to know your idea about the Ministry, whether all interests should be represented in the Ministry ?—As far as possible, if people are available.

214. The Chief Minister shall select the other Ministers from each community ?—Not necessarily ; if he likes he may.

215. Rao Bahadur Rajah : With reference to the declaration of fundamental rights you want communal representation in the public Services, and your theory is that the government of the province should be administered by all sections of the people of the province, and not by one section only. Is not that so ?—Yes.

* The witness changed these answers to " No." See also Q. 212.

216. You are afraid that if this is not embodied in the Statute, one section of the people will monopolise, and there will be no chance for other communities ?—Yes.

217. You want a democratic form of administration, that is to say, all the communities joining together, and carrying on the administration of the country ?—Yes.

218. You are not for further extension of the franchise at present ?—No, except in the case of minority communities and the Depressed Classes.

219. So you are for lowering the franchise for Depressed Classes and for minority communities ?—Certainly.

220. You are also for giving separate electorates for the Depressed Classes ?—Yes.

221. From your experience can you kindly tell me whether the candidates who represent the Madras University in the Legislative Council have specialized themselves in university matters or educational matters ?—They have all been vakils.

222. May I ask you whether these Specialists who were supposed to represent the Madras University take part in politics ?—Yes.

223. As regards the landholders' constituency, the landholders are allowed to exercise their franchise both in the general constituency and in the special constituency ?—Yes.

224. What is your opinion ? Do you think that the present system should be continued ? That is, that the landholders should have two votes ?—They may have votes, but their representation should be confined to the landholders' constituency.

225. Sir A. P. Patro : Will you kindly tell me whether the Constitutionalist wing is also called the Justice Party ?—Yes. Until you rescind your resolution about non-acceptance of office we differ.

226. Non-acceptance of office was only conditional ; it was dependent on certain changes being made in the Government ?—Anyhow, the Federation has to rescind its resolution.

227. I will not press the point. You want to exclude the elected presidents of district boards from becoming eligible for membership to the Legislative Council. Would you extend that principle to municipal chairmen, taluk board presidents and union presidents ?—No. If in a district board there is an executive officer appointed who does the executive work, then the district board president may come in ; if in a municipality there is a president and an executive officer, the municipal president may come in. But if a district board president officiates as an executive officer, I think there is danger then.

228. May I remind you that in the district board the executive work of various departments is being carried on by heads of departments. The engineering work is carried on by the district board engineer, and public health work by the public health officer, the road works by the roads engineer and so on ? —Yes, but all these people are under the district board president, who is the executive head.

229. I shall have to correct your knowledge ?—I have got enough of knowledge.

230. The district board engineer is a person appointed by the Governor ; he is a Provincial Service man ?—But he works under the president of the district board.

231. I would leave the point at that. You have suggested a democratic constitution on the Australian basis. Will you explain what you exactly mean in paragraph 10 on page 208 ?—(Mr. N. G. Menon) : The executive council is purely advisory, something like the Privy Council. The executive councillors will have no right to vote. Whenever the Governor feels that the advice of ex-ministers and men who have held positions of responsibility in the government on any matter would be valuable he can always summon his executive council. This executive council is purely honorary and unpaid ; the ministers will be ex-officio executive council members. The executive councillors will not carry on the administration of the province ; they would merely offer advice to the Governor.

232. Am I correct in understanding you that if responsible government is introduced in the provinces such responsible government should be free to choose its own officers ?—Yes.

233. The door against Europeans will not be closed ?—Certainly not.

234. As regards reservation of seats in the legislative council, the South Indian Liberal Federation did not ask for reservation of seats before the Joint Parliamentary Committee. They wanted separate electorates and not reservation of seats ?—Yes. We wanted separate electorates ; in the alternative, reservation of seats.

235. Do the circumstances of this province now justify your asking for reservation of seats ?—Certainly.

236. Do you not think it is inconsistent with full responsible government to ask for reservation of seats ?—Do you not see the conditions of our province ? The conditions of our province were such that we had to send our representatives to England to present our case before the Joint Parliamentary Committee ; they fought for it and they got it.

237. With regard to the representation in the Assembly you said that the present system of election from the districts is unsatisfactory. Would you suggest any alternative proposal for proper and adequate representation of this province in the Assembly ?—Reservation of seats for non-Brahmins.

238. Supposing reservation is not granted ?—That is the best method ; in the alternative separate electorate.

239. Do you not think that indirect election can give better and effective representation ?—I do not think so.

240. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-lah Sahib : You just now said that you want reservation of seats for the non-Brahmins. What is it due to ? Is it your apprehension that you will not be returned in sufficient numbers ? —As it is we are not returned.

241. I am not talking of the Assembly ; I am talking of the Provincial Council. Does the experience of the past 10 years confirm the apprehension that you entertained before that period that you might not be returned in sufficient numbers ?—I have to repeat what I already said that when the new Legislative Council was formed many of the Brahmins did not stand for election, because they were all non-Co-operators, and so a number of non-Brahmins got in. A non-Brahmin Ministry was formed and the non-Brahmins became powerful. But now they are gradually being reduced. They were 60 in the first council ; they became 40, and they are now 20. We lost the Ministry. So we want non-Brahmins who will support communal representation. If reservation is taken away we fear that other communities will come in.

242. Mr. Siva Rao : Will you kindly turn to page 203 of your Memorandum wherein you have defined provincial autonomy as being freedom from external restraint. You are not merely advocating in that Memorandum freedom from external restraint, but also full responsiblity to the provinces, is it not ? —Yes.

243. May I ask you whether the non-Brahmin Federation represents Muhammadans, Christians, and the Depressed Classes ?—Yes.

244. Have they not got their own Associations ? —They have got, but they are merged in our Federation ; we have members of all communities.

245. With regard to the reservation of seats for non-Brahmins, both in the Provincial Legislature and in the Central Legislature, are you aware that the South Indian Liberal Federation have not asked for reservation of seats ?—I have not got a copy of their Memorandum.

246. So far as your information goes they have not asked for it ?—I do not know.

247. You said you ask for separate electorates or, in the alternative, for reservation of seats, because you apprehend that Brahmins would monopolise the whole lot of seats if there were no reservation ?—Of course, we say all these things not because we are against any community, but for the elevation of our country. In fact, Brahmins are one of us.

248. One of you, no doubt; but I want to ask you this. You know the results of the elections in 1920, 1923, and 1926, and that they brought in a sufficiently large number of non-Brahmins ?—Yes. Even the Brahmins put up non-Brahmins.

249. Much more than the proportion reserved for you. These elections have brought in a very large number of non-Brahmins ?—Yes. Those people that were opposed to our getting reservation, they did not come in themselves, but put in non-Brahmins in the field, and so in the Council we have not got non-Brahmins of the persuasion of those people who asked for communal representation, but other non-Brahmins.

250. But they have come in in larger numbers ?—Yes; but if this reservation is taken away we will be swamped.

251. I want to ask you whether in the general electorate, both for the provincial Legislative Council and for the Indian Legislative Council, there are about 95 per cent. non-Brahmins according to your calculation, and whether you feel still apprehensive that the non-Brahmins will not be able to get in ?—Look at the power the Brahmins hold. All the appointments are with them. If they take it into their heads to see that the electorate votes for them they will succeed.

252. Kindly turn to page 208 of your Memorandum. You want some executive government; the provincial government assisted by some advisory council. Is that your proposal ?—Yes.

253. You suggest two advisers to the ministry, generally chosen from the Civil Service ?—Yes.

254. Now we have got heads of departments who could be relied upon for giving experienced opinion. So why do you want these advisers, who have no vote ? You want to pay them amply, but not to give them a vote ?—We want I.C.S. officers of equal status to sit in the Cabinet and give advice.

255. If you want only advice, I am suggesting to you that you could have that advice from the heads of departments who represent the Services ?—Heads of departments cannot sit in the Cabinet and discuss questions with other people.

256. Even these honorary unpaid executive councillors will have no vote ?—No.

257. You say that communal representation should be reserved as a fundamental right provided qualified candidates are available and that no one community should be allowed to monopolise the Services. Will you be satisfied with a general declaration of policy that adequate representation of communities should be provided, or would you insist on a percentage of reservation; for instance, 20 per cent. to Muhammadans, 20 per cent. to others, and so on ? Would you fix a definite proportion ?—Yes, a definite proportion should be fixed. It is fixed in the Government Order.

258. You want the percentages fixed according to your population ?—Almost according to the population. The majority community does not get so much as it should have. The majority community sacrifices something of its privileges and gives to other communities, according to the Government Order.

259. You have been suggesting that one class of people, namely the Brahmins, has a monopoly of these posts in the several departments of Government. Have you taken care to consider whether that community, known as the monopolist community in Southern India, are educationally more advanced than the other Hindu communities ?—Educationally advanced. But where are the opportunities given to the other communities ? One community politically, socially and religiously is strong and was destroying the other communities, and so we are taking advantage of the British Government now to lift ourselves.

260. Could you suggest any reason whatever why the British Government should have overlooked so far the claims of these non-Brahmin Hindu communities if they were otherwise qualified ?—The British Government never overlooked. They have been trying their best from 1854 to enforce this. The Board's Order was passed in 1854.

261. Then what was the difficulty ?—The Government could not succeed. Now a movement has been formed and that movement is advocating the cause of the masses.

262. Is it not the reason that they could not have been educationally qualified persons ?—Now, there are non-Brahmin M.A., M.L.'s who have gone to Rangoon to get a Rs30 appointment.

263. With the introduction of provincial autonomy do you not expect that there will be a majority of non-Brahmins returned to the Council ?—We cannot be certain.

264. Would you not trust the new reformed Government with the discretion to hold the scales even between one community and another ?—What does anybody lose by having reservation ? Let there be reservation as a safeguard.

265. You want to introduce a bi-cameral system in the provinces. Do you not find that, as a matter of fact, in the provincial Council every interest almost is represented ?—Yes.

266. Then why do you want another Chamber ?—We thought it would be a safeguard.

267. You do not press it ?—(Mr. N. G. Menon) May I just say a word with regard to bi-cameral legislation. There is a danger sometimes of a majority community trying to trample down a minority community. So if that system is introduced into the province it will be a safeguard against any such legislation. We also say that the Upper Chamber should consist of fifty per cent. nominated members.

268. There is the constitutional veto of the Governor.—We do not want the Governor to exercise the constitutional veto as far as possible.

269. On page 213, Mr. Mudaliar, you recommend that the services should be placed under the entire control and direction of the Central and Provincial Governments and Legislatures in India. You do not want the Secretary of State to continue to recruit for the Provincial Services in India ?—(Dr. C. N. Mudaliar) No.

270. In other words you advocate provincialisation of all the Provincial Services ?—Yes. Provincialisation is better and more economical, but if experts are wanted we will have to recruit from Great Britain.

271. Mr. Siva Raj: Mr. Natesa Mudaliar, one finds now that there are certain non-official organisations which are working for the improvement of the Depressed Classes ?—Yes.

272. But I think it is still necessary that for a long time to come the Government must do a lot to provide social amenities for the Depressed Classes ?—Yes.

273. If that is so, would you be satisfied with the present number of their representatives in the Legislative Council ? Do you think their number is adequate ?—Their number must increase. That is what we said.

274. Now it is not adequate ?—No.

275. Would you secure that representation through separate electorates with separate electoral qualifications ?—Yes.

276. I find you were not able to give exactly the number of voters who would constitute the separate electorates ?—No.

277. I rather thought you suggested the idea of selecting these representatives from certain Associations ?—No. The members of the Legislative Council and the members of the Legislative Assembly from the Depressed Classes and the representatives of the various recognised Associations will settle the question among themselves, I said.

278. Suppose the future Provincial Government did not safeguard the interests of the Depressed Classes ? We have been finding that, in spite of the statutory provision, in the actual working of these provisions real benefit is not conferred on the Depressed Classes. You agree with me there ?—Yes.

279. As a matter of fact the machinery is worked by certain people who are affected by caste prejudices. For instance, it is just possible that a sub-assistant surgeon may have a caste prejudice. If he is in charge of a hospital, and there is a Depressed Class patient suffering, say from fever or anything of the kind, he may merely prescribe the medicine without actually touching the man. So you will find in such cases that even in spite of these statutory safeguards, in spite of these declarations, in practice they will not help the Depressed Classes.—If there are statutory safeguards, why not ?

280. In actual working ?—It may.

281. At some time of stress, supposing it happens that the Provincial Government, whatever its constitution, is against the interests of the Depressed Classes, supposing there is a reaction against social legislation, which authority would you trust for the improvement or safeguarding of the interests of the Depressed Classes ?—The Council is there. The Minister wants your vote. Without that he cannot get on. If 15 of you join together he will be defeated. There will be minority communities joining you.

282. I am only providing for certain contingencies which might happen in the future. In that case what safeguards would you provide ?—If you want a Depressed Classes Commissioner, let there be a Depressed Classes Commissioner, or somebody to take care of the Depressed Classes.

283. Not amenable to the Provincial Government ? —Under the Provincial Government.

284. Not responsible to the Provincial Government ?—Why not ?

285. You said that the Ministries that have been existing in Madras were supported by various District Board Presidents. Was that the case during the last Ministry of Dr. Subbarayan ?—I do not want to name any Ministry. Any Ministry will do that. On principle we do not want a District Board President to be in the Legislative Council.

286. The Opposition contained more District Board Presidents than the Government ?—Even a few District Board Presidents on the Government side will be bad.

287. I thought you said that the University representative takes part in party politics ?—Yes.

Mr. Siva Raj : I merely wanted to draw your attention to the fact that even representatives of the Cambridge and Oxford Universities take political sides.

288. Kumara Raja of Venkatagiri : You think it fit to advise the landholders to confine themselves to special electorates ?—I have got this difficulty. The Zamindars are very rich people, and with their influence they can alter any constituency. That is the fear we have.

289. What do you mean by saying that they can alter a constituency ?—They can influence.

290. Then you place a ban on wealth ?—The influence of the zamindars. We have no particular objection. In fact, we have in you an excellent zamindar representing the ratepayers. But we should have a safeguard.

291. Are you aware that in three cases zamindars have been defeated when they stood for election and in only four could they be returned in spite of their wealth and influence ? —But there was an attempt to have zamindars as candidates for almost all the districts in the last Ministry.

292. Did that fructify ?—No, it did not. But that is the fear we have.

293. Mr. Thomas : Would you agree that there should be separate representation by means of separate electorates for Christians ?—Certainly.

294. In the present Legislative Council whatever representation there may be for the minority communities, still the Mussulmans and Indian Christians in numbers are much smaller than the non-Brahmin communities ?—Yes.

295. In that case would you agree that the members of the Christian and Mussulman electorates may be allowed to vote in the non-Brahmin electorates without the right of contesting such elections ? —No.

296. You see that at present the non-Brahmin members are not in touch with the minority communities.—Yes ; they are.

297. What I suggest to you is that apart from the separate representation given to the Mussulmans and Indian Christians, would you have any objection to allow the voters of the Mussulman and Indian Christian communities merely to vote in the non-Brahmin elections ?—Yes ; I have.

298. The corresponding difficulty would be that whereas a minority community cannot influence the result of the election, to divert it from the general sense of the community, in the case of the other the non-communal voters will swamp the communal voters.—I am not for it now.

299. Do you not think there is a difference between Indian Christians and Mussulmans being allowed to vote in general constituencies ?—There is some meaning, but I am not prepared to accept it at present.

300. Diwan Bahadur Reddiyar : In your statement to the Chairman I understood you to say that district board presidents are likely to be the agents of the Local Self-Government Department ?—Yes.

301. Do you know how many District Board Presidents there are in the present Legislative Council ?—I do not know. Seven or eight.

302. About a dozen ?—Yes.

303. When this Ministry was formed do you know how many district board presidents sat with the Ministers as their party ?—About five or six.

304. One only sat with the Ministry. You may take it from me. If that was so would you still consider them as agents for canvassing for the Ministry ?—The present Ministry is quite different. Do you not think that the District Board Presidents will attach themselves to the Minister ?

305. You know that several motions of no-confidence were brought against the present Ministers ?—Yes.

306. And the first of them was moved by a district board president and supported by all the district board presidents except one ?—The conditions existing with the present Ministry are quite different, because the district board presidents were yet expecting the previous Ministry to come back into power.

307. They were expecting another Ministry ?—The previous Ministry to come into power once more.

308. Again in August, 1927, there was another motion against the Ministry. Even after the Coimbatore resolution almost all the district board presidents voted against the Ministers ?—Although the Justice Ministry was lost the, Justice leader was holding the whole power in the Legislative Council. So these presidents were following him.

309. Yours is a non-Brahmin organisation ?—Yes.

310. All the district board presidents at present are non-Brahmins ?—Yes.

311. Is there any district board president in your organisation at present ?—No.

Memorandum submitted by the United Planters' Association of Southern India.

(INCORPORATED).

I. Introduction.

In presenting our Memorandum to the Statutory Commission we have to explain that we are an homogeneous body existing under somewhat unusual circumstances, and we must emphasize that any alteration in our peculiar political position will disrupt our Association in such a manner that we shall not be able to watch and ward our combined interests in the way we have done for the past 36 years.

We are an Association of Planters and we represent Producers of Tea, Coffee, Rubber, Pepper, Cinchona and Cardamoms.

In our constitution we are not an association of Europeans, but practically in effect we are, for the simple reason that Indians in the same walk of life as ourselves have not felt themselves able to follow us in the self-taxation we have imposed in order to develop and protect our industry, though, incidentally, the Indians and the few Europeans who are aloof from our Association have reaped almost full benefits therefrom.

We work and have our domicile under five different Governments but, because we are a body incorporated in Madras, we have had for the past 34 years political representation in the Legislative Council of Fort St. George. The effect of this has been that our members living under the Governments of Their Highnesses of Mysore, Travancore and Cochin, as well as in the Province of Coorg, have all been represented in the Legislative Council of Madras. This anomaly cannot be overlooked by the Statutory Commission, but we ask for its continuance for the following reasons.

We have developed some 206, 670 acres of cultivation representing roughly £16,000,000 of Capital, mostly British, and we are steadily developing the 177,000 acres of reserve land that we own. We pay taxes, direct and indirect, to the Government, amounting to many lakhs annually derived from Land Tax, special Income Tax on Tea Companies, employees salaries and house Income Tax, Import Duties and in the case of many of our members a very heavy export tax on Tea. We draw attention to this as we believe that Tea is the most heavily taxed dry land product of India. We employ more than a quarter of a million Indian labourers and staff, practically all of them drawn from the Depressed Classes, and of whom 84 per cent. are recruited in British India. Our self-taxation amounts to about 5 lakhs per annum, exclusive of about 8 lakhs a year which we spend on the medical needs of our employees. If by any chance we became politically separated, the value of our Association as an element of progress both social and productive would be lost to the country. Individually our scattered members are not able to take a close interest in general politics, but from the nature of their work they are brought into the closest touch with that class of our fellow subjects which is completely inarticulate, and we consider that our care for them, our provision of hospitals, medical comforts, schools and creches, unaided by Government, entitle us to claim an insight into their needs better than any other save, perhaps, a district officer's.

II. General Principles.

We accept the declaration of the 20th August, 1917, as being an obligation binding on the British Government, and are in sympathy with Indian aspirations. Although the results of the opportunities for self-government given by the Government of India Act, 1919, have been disappointing to all parties and classes, we are of the opinion that the inherent defects of Dyarchy are largely the cause of this failure.

We believe that the only way to cure the irresponsibility that has been so marked in Indian Legislative Councils is by giving responsibility, and we are prepared to give Indian politicians an opportunity of exercising genuine control in the Government of India, if adequate safeguards are provided to protect British interests in India and to prevent chaos in the event of a breakdown in local Government. We therefore recommend the grant of full responsible autonomy to the Province of Madras provided :—

(a) that the position of the Government of India vis-à-vis the Legislative Assembly is strengthened ;

(b) that the Central Government is given powers of intervention in the event of a breakdown in Government in any Province;

(c) that Second Chambers are set up in the Provinces ;

(d) that a clause is inserted in the new Government of India Act forbidding discrimination against British industry and commerce in Central and Provincial legislation and taxation, and in the taxes and by-laws of the local self-governing bodies (Municipalities, District Boards, etc.), and providing for relief or appeal in the event of discriminatory legislation being passed.

We can make no suggestion as regards other Provinces as it may be held necessary to provide for Provisional constitutions with varying degrees of responsibility, and the recommendations we do make must be distinctly understood as having no special reference to provinces which do not come within the purview of our Association.

We wish to emphasise that the views expressed in this memorandum are particularly applicable to the Provinces of Madras, but, owing to the peculiar formation of the United Planters' Association of Southern India, they must to some extent apply to the Province of Coorg, as well as to the Indian States of Mysore, Travancore, and Cochin, so far as is consistent with the relations between these states and the Paramount Power and with their rights and obligations as fixed by treaty or usage.

III. Provincial Governments.

While we recognize the ingenuity of Dyarchy as a temporary expedient for training Indians in the task of self-government, it has now exhausted its possibilities, and has largely failed to achieve its intended purpose, so that, apart from its unpopularity in India, we consider it advisable to abolish it entirely when introducing the new constitution.

Owing to the persistent efforts of a large party in Council to make Dyarchy unworkable, the Governor has been to some extent compelled to adopt a policy of assisting the ministers for the moment in office against the efforts of other elected members of the council to eject them. It has therefore resulted that the Ministers have not been wholly responsible to the elected members of the Legislature, and consequently, in the eyes of many Indians, they have been regarded to some extent as a subsidiary branch of the Bureaucratic Government.

While fully alive to the risk involved in any such policy, we are prepared to recommend the abolition of the Executive Council and the transfer to a Ministry responsible to the Provincial Legislature of all subjects (except the control of the Special Police) now administered by either half of the Government. Official nominated members should be withdrawn, and should be returned to their natural role of Civil Servants. The Ministry should be wholly responsible for carrying on the Government and should neither receive the support nor incur the control of an Executive Council nominated from outside.

The Governor should continue to preside over the Ministry, and should select his ministers from amongst those members of the Assembly who might be expected to control a majority. If and when the Ministry lost the confidence of the Legislature and was defeated, the Ministry would resign, and the Governor would form a new Ministry, presumably resting on the support of a somewhat different coalition of groups. We do not think that any definite rule can be laid down now as to joint responsibility owing to the existence of a number of small political groups, though it is desirable that a foundation should be laid for the growth of some convention of responsibility.

IV. LAW AND ORDER.

Although we sympathise with the apprehension of other European communities should the control of the Police be entrusted to a Minister responsible to the Legislature at the present juncture, and although we recognise that there are many difficulties on both sides of this question, we feel that we cannot be party to a proposal which pretends to give Provincial autonomy but yet would transfer the very basis of autonomy, Law and Order, entirely to the Central Government. Certain legislation conceivably might lead to breaches of the peace, and we consider that those responsible for the passing of such legislation should also be responsible for its ultimate outcome.

But we also hold the view that wherever a Special Police Force has been established for extra security or for a definite reason (for instance the Malabar Special Police because of the frequent armed rebellion of the Moplahs against His Majesty) such forces should be under the direct control and administration of the Central Government.

Should it be for any technical reason, of which we are ignorant, administratively impracticable to place such Special Police Forces under the Central Government, we suggest that their duties might be taken over by the Army.

We must, however, very strongly emphasise our objection to Special Police Forces being controlled by a minister of a Provincial Government.

V. PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION.

We do not recommend any drastic changes in the legal powers or composition of Provincial Councils, except the withdrawal of all nominated official members; nor are we prepared to express any opinion upon the franchise, but we object to any general lowering of the present qualifications, and we are very strongly opposed to any standard of education being accepted as a qualification, except in the case of a recognised University Constituency. Extremist views held by the half educated have done a deal of harm to sound progressive Government elsewhere, and without due caution the same fate will fall on India. Actually an illiterate voter with only a small property qualification is the better citizen.

We are, however, strongly in favour of Communal Representation both for minorities and for special constituencies such as our own. Further, though the qualification for the franchise is already too low, a large majority of the people still remain without the power to vote. In the past the interests of these depressed and backward classes may be said to have been represented, and ably represented by the official members of the Council. The proposed exclusion of all official nominees clearly necessitates the extension of the system of nomination in order that the depressed and backward millions may not lose the representation they have now, even though it be indirect. For this purpose we recommend nominations be made to represent these people by members of their own class; for men of good education and ability can be found in every community, and we believe that a man who has won a position in life in spite of the disabilities of birth, is likely to prove of value and a steadying influence in any Legislature.

In all nomination, the actual representative value of the nominee should be the chief aim in selection, and his nomination should not merely be a matter of expediency, as has been the tendency hitherto owing to the need for additional Government support. Our recommendations, if accepted, will alter this state of affairs, and the pressure of necessity being removed (except, perhaps, in the Central Government) there should be no inducements for nominations to be made from any other considerations than the representative value of the nominee. This will be the better ensured if the power of nomination to both houses of the Provincial Legislature resides in the Governor acting on his own initiative. The difficulties in the way of this procedure should not prove serious with the assistance of a Permanent Patronage Secretary to the Governor.

Although the legal powers of the Councils would not be altered, their political power will be immensely increased when the whole Government is made responsible to them. When the bureaucracy is no longer involved in trying to work the political machine, political feeling will no longer be roused against it, and Indian politics may be expected to take on the wholesome character of rivalry between Indian groups. For the first time members of the Provincial Councils will realise that the responsibility for maintaining Government in office will rest upon themselves alone. Therefore, we recommend that with the grant of full responsibility to the Legislature the powers of certification of the Governor be abolished. These have been inevitable so long as he had a special responsibility to discharge to the Secretary of State, but once the responsibility rests upon the Council we think he will be able to surrender the exceptional powers needed to enable him to discharge his responsibility.

VI. SECOND CHAMBERS.

If this very radical reform is carried out, we consider it essential for a Second Chamber of a conservative character to be created to act as a check on the popular House. We do not feel confident to make any detailed suggestions as to the exact powers or composition of this Second Chamber, but we recommend that its composition should be partly by election with substantial property-holding and other high qualifications somewhat on the lines defined for electors to the Council of State, and partly by the nomination of non-officials whose judgment, experience and social positions would make them valuable members of the Legislature.

VII. REPRESENTATION IN THE MADRAS LEGISLATURE.

The number of planting interests and individual planters represented by our Association is steadily increasing, largely owing to the yearly extension of further areas being planted up with Tea. Hence the necessity for a continuation of our representation as a minority community in the Madras Council is stronger now than ever before; and, with the possibility of the establishment of a Second Chamber, we feel that our just claim for representation in the Upper House as well should not be overlooked.

VIII. PUBLIC SERVICES COMMISSION.

Although we are not in favour of the introduction of Provincial Public Services Commissions, we do consider it necessary to relieve the Ministers of the onerous duty of being responsible for all appointments to and promotions in the Provincial Services. To meet this need we suggest that Provincial Committees be formed to deal with the recruitment and all disciplinary action in the provinces, to which Committee any aggrieved official may appeal. Only the Chairman of this Committee would have a full time appointment, and this post might with advantage be combined with that of the Permanent Patronage Secretary to the Governor.

The existing Public Services Commission for all India should continue to function as now, at any rate as regards recruitments for the Superior or Imperial Services.

IX. INTERVENTION BY THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

While desirous of making recommendations of so liberal a character as to meet all legitimate Indian aspirations, we are not blind to the possibility of the new constitution being faced by deliberate opposition or obstruction on the part of some party or coalition in the Council. We therefore consider that provision must be made to meet the danger of a breakdown of Government in any Province, and recommend that the Governor-General-in-Council be given power to intervene in case of necessity and to suspend the constitution, so that the Governor may carry on a day to day administration on his own responsibility subject to the general supervision of the Governor-General-in-Council.

X. THE GOVERNORS.

With the abolition of the Provincial Executive Councils, the appointment of suitable Governors becomes a matter for serious consideration. We certainly consider that members of the Indian Civil Service should be eligible, but we would be loath to name one class only for such appointments. We agree that some first-hand knowledge of affairs in India is necessary for a Governor deprived of his official Executive. A man with exceptional qualifications may be found in any walk of life, official or otherwise, and we would like to see any young Briton of birth and education, with a political bent, win his spurs in Indian Politics, and then, perhaps after some useful years of Parliamentary work, find himself a Governor.

XI. THE CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.

We are only prepared to favour the grant of Provincial autonomy on condition that the Government of India remains unaltered in composition and that its position vis-à-vis the Legislative Assembly be strengthened. The Government of India is required to carry on the administration under difficulties which we believe no other Government in the world is called upon to face, as it has to work through an Assembly in which it is in a permanent minority. We therefore consider it essential that the Government should control an absolute majority in the Central Legislature.

As a further safeguard, we consider that the Viceroy's Executive Council should be predominantly British. We are of the opinion that the Commander-in-Chief's place on the Executive should be taken by a special Military Member, but that he should remain as an extraordinary member of that Council as was the custom in former years. The Commander-in-Chief should have no seat in either the Legislative Assembly or the Council of State.

XII. INDIRECT ELECTION.

We believe that the Legislative Assembly would be composed of more reasonable men and would be more truly representative of the country if they were elected by the Provincial Legislatures rather than by primary electors in the constituencies, and we consider that the election of provincial representatives to the Assembly should be made by the two Provincial Houses voting together.

XIII. LOCAL SELF-GOVERNING BODIES.

We recommend that the principles of nomination, set forth in Section V. above, be extended in Municipalities and Local Boards, etc., and believe that this would lead to such bodies becoming good schools for administrative and executive work, instead of the political debating societies so many of them are at present, to the detriment of progress and improvement in local needs. The fact that the Government of Madras is now contemplating the abolition of all Taluk Boards, and for District Boards to take over all the functions of the smaller bodies, proves that the latter have generally failed in administration and this, we contend, is mainly due to their constitution not being truly representative of the bulk of the population in rural areas.

XIV. STATUTORY SAFEGUARD AGAINST DISCRIMINATORY LEGISLATION.

We are greatly concerned at the tendency shown by the Government of India to introduce legislation discriminating against British producers established in India. For nearly a century planters in Southern India have been steadily bringing into cultivation large areas from undeveloped and unremunerative jungle, and in so doing have provided work and good wages to many thousands of the depressed classes in particular. The bulk of this has been achieved by the investment of British Capital, and by the industry and initiative of British pioneers. We ask for no special favours, but we do claim on grounds of justice and expediency that the Indian Legislatures shall not be in a position to discriminate against British planting and commercial interests so long as Britain does not in any way discriminate against India. Such provision is a familiar clause in commercial treaties between two fully sovereign countries.

We suggest that this safeguard should take the form of a clause inserted in the next Government of India Act which will be an integral part of the statute creating the Indian constitution, and which would compel the Courts to treat as ultra vires any measure of a Legislature or local governing body which has the effect of imposing discriminatory legislation or taxation.

We believe that the next step towards making India a Federation of autonomous Provinces and States must necessarily include a Supreme Court to interpret that constitution, and to adjudicate upon the reciprocal rights and obligations of the Central with Provincial Governments and Indian States, and of the Provincial Governments and States inter se. Thus the ultimate tribunal in India for interpreting this clause would be the Supreme Court, subject to an appeal lying as of right to H.M. the King in Council. This clause should extend to Acts passed by Central or Provincial Legislatures and to all bye-laws or regulations passed by Local Self-Governing bodies as well.

XV. FEDERATION OF INDIA.

We are of the opinion that the social and political developments in India are tending to compel a federation of the whole of India including Indian States, and are convinced that it would be to the advantage of the whole country if some constitution could be agreed upon which would at least make geographical India into one Fiscal Union. Any constitution for British India which from its inception does not take into account and at least provide for the inclusion of the Indian States, must necessarily prove a failure in the effort to lay the foundation of a complete and stable Federation.

Deputation from the United Planters' Association of Southern India.

312. The Chairman (Lord Burnham) : In this deputation we have (1) Mr. R. Lescher, O.B.E., Chairman, (Spokesman), (2) Mr. F. E. James, O.B.E., M.L.C., Planting Member, and (3) Mr. H. Waddington, Secretary. I have put into my hands a short statement in regard to your Association giving facts and figures forming the basis of your constitution. May I ask you whether the Association was founded as a result of the conference between the different Planters' Associations held at Bangalore in 1893 ?—(Mr. Lescher) : That is so.

313. As everybody has got the statement before them, I will ask you whether there are any particular clauses in it which you would like to emphasise ?—No, sir.

314. You think it speaks for itself ?—Yes.

315. Are you appearing here as the result of any special resolution passed by your body ?—No, except that we are appearing here to answer any questions put to us from our memorandum.

316. You represent both the European and the Indian planters ?—We have a few Indians as members.

317. I see that other Indians hold 101,020 acres, but I am not sure whether they form part of your Association ?—They are not included.

318. You speak for the European planters practically ?—Yes.

319. It is said that the European planters hold a total of 240,167 acres of tea, rubber or coffee, that is 74 per cent. Does that mean that they are all members of your Association ?—Yes, they are.

320. You have also stated that : " areas cultivated " by Indian proprietors include a very large pro- " portion of small gardens the areas of which vary " between a few cents. and an acre or two." Would you like to add anything to this statement ?—We have nothing to add, sir.

321. Colonel Lane-Fox : At page 231 of your memorandum you have agreed to grant full provincial autonomy to the province of Madras on certain conditions. The first is that the position of the Government of India vis-à-vis the Legislative Assembly is strengthened. Have you any definite suggestions to make how that is to be strengthened ?—I think that we can only suggest that the executive should be strengthened at the expense of the legislature. But exactly how that can be done we are not in a position to suggest in any detail. We have no definite proposals to make as to how it should be done.

322. Then in the same paragraph you say in clause (b) : " that the Central Government is given powers " of intervention in the event of a breakdown of " Government in any province." Again, have you any suggestions to make as to how that should be done assuming that the Governor is there ?—We think that the Governor should be given certain powers by the Central Government to enable him to overcome a deadlock and to carry on the administration.

323. You have no scheme by which he should do it ?—No.

324. On page 232 you agree to the transfer of Law and Order with the exception of the Special Police. What is your particular reason for that ?—The Special Police are practically regular troops to all intents and purposes. I think I am correct in saying that there is only one Special Police Force left in the Presidency and that is in Malabar, and they are primarily to look after the Moplahs and it would be extremely dangerous to remove them.

325. The Chairman (Lord Burnham) : Does that include the Criminal Intelligence Department ?—No. We do not want to alter their present powers. (Mr. James) : I do not think it was the intention of the Association when they drew up this memorandum that the Criminal Intelligence Department should be handed over. I think when they were considering the question of Police, they were not considering the question of the Criminal Intelligence Department at all. Their particular concern was about the Special Police in the Moplah part of the Presidency. But I think that if we were asked a definite question as to whether the Association would favour the handing over of the Criminal Intelligence Department, our answer would be in the negative. And as for the Special Police, they are police only in name ; they are practically regular troops.

326. Why should the Special Police be maintained in a district rather than for the province ?—(Mr. Lescher) : They do not do the usual police duties ; they are only maintained to prevent Moplah outbreaks. (Mr. James) : The fear behind this recommendation is possibly that the force as it exists at present is actually necessary for security and should not be cut down in any possible way, and therefore if they were to be handed over to the Provincial Government it might perhaps be reduced on political considerations.

327. You are not confident that the Provincial Government will maintain the force ?—(Mr. James) : That is the fear in regard to this particular branch of the force.

328. Lord Strathcona : At page 232 of your memorandum you have explained why you do not recommend powers of certification to the Governor. And then you go on to say : " If this very radical " reform is carried out, we consider it essential " for a Second Chamber * * *" These two things taken together, I gather what you mean is, that the power of certification goes provided there is really a satisfactory Second Chamber set up ?—(Mr. Lescher) : Yes.

329. On the same page lower down you say on the question of Public Services Commission : " Although we are not in favour of the introduction of Provincial Public Services Commissions * * *" And then you go on to say that you favour the formation of provincial committees to deal with recruitment and all disciplinary action in the provinces. I do not see what difference there is ?—Expense chiefly.

330. On page 233 you deal with the question of statutory safeguards against discriminatory legislation. Have you anything further to say about that ?—We have not.

331. Sir A. P. Patro : In regard to indirect election to the Legislative Assembly you say at page 5, paragraph XII : " We believe that the " Legislative Assembly would be composed of more " reasonable men and would be more truly represen- " tative of the country if they were elected by the " Provincial Legislatures rather than by primary " electors in the constituencies, and we consider that " the election of provincial representatives to the " Assembly should be made by the two Provincial " Houses voting together." Would that strengthen the Central Legislature instead of having direct election ?—We think it would.

332. But supposing in the Provincial Legislature they have got a definite section of a party ; then naturally men of that party will be elected to the Central Legislature, and that will not strengthen the Central Legislature at all ?—(Mr. James) : I think the view of the Association was that probably by the method of indirect election the Assembly would be more representative of the provinces than it is now, and the question of strengthening the Central Government is another question altogether.

333. But do you not think it would be more representative if there is direct election ? The present constituencies are very unwieldy, and supposing you reduce the size of these electorates for representation to the Legislative Assembly, that would be far more effective and it would bring in better representatives of the agricultural classes to the Legislative Assembly than the system proposed, namely, election through legislative councils ?—That is an alternative I should think. The members of our Association did not, however, consider the question.

334. Colonel Lane-Fox : Sir A. P. Patro, how many representatives do you consider would be required for the Legislative Assembly ?

Sir A. P. Patro : I have suggested in the Memorandum of the Ganjam District People's Association that I do not want to make the whole thing unwieldly. I have suggested that in order to strengthen the Legislative Assembly and to have better form of representation of the real agricultural classes of people, there should be a revised system of election, and I have also suggested that some portion of it may be represented by the Legislative Councils. The other should be by direct election. I do not want to strengthen the Legislative Assembly very much, or make it more than double of what it is. If we have got, say, 200 or 250 members in the Legislative Assembly sent up in accordance with the population of the provinces, then Madras, or Bombay or Bengal will get according to their population a larger number of seats. Then we elect a portion through the Legislative Councils. It may be that the party in power in a Legislative Council may be the moderate party and they will be able to send in representatives who will be able to strengthen the hands of the Central Government in the Assembly. And again, if we have got a better class of representatives than we have now, that will also go to strengthen the hands of the Central Government. That is why I have proposed that there should be both direct and indirect election by reforming the electorates for the Assembly. I agree with this Memorandum that it is very necessary that the Central Legislature should be reformed and strengthened. How best it could be strengthened is a matter which we have been considering. I have given my own views in my Memorandum and we have to work out the details; namely, under the present system we are all agreed that the representatives from this province at least have not been really representing the interest of the people. There is absolutely no connection between what they are doing there and what the people think about it here. So, while you have suggested that there should be representation through the Legislative Council in order to get a better class of representatives who will be in touch with the people, do you not think that there should be direct election also to the Assembly ?

The Witness (Mr. James) : The Association is prepared to support any other method which is equally efficacious.

335. Mr. Siva Raj : At page 233, about discriminatory legislation, would you, for instance consider any legislation affecting the lot of your labouring class discriminatory ?—(Mr. Lescher) Not necessarily.

336. Mr. Thomas : May I know if there is any Association among the Indian planters corresponding to yours ?—(Mr. Lescher) No, not that I know of.

337. May I know if the interests of the Indian planters are identical with yours or is there any room for conflict between their interests and your interests ?—They are identical.

338. With reference to this question of discriminatory legislation, you know that under the Instrument of Instructions to the Provincial Governors there is a clause which enjoins on them the duty of safeguarding the interests of all communities and sections of the people. Do you think that is a sufficient safeguard for you ?—No, I do not.

339. Do you realise that the constitution of a Second Chamber might lead to conflicts and frictions between the two Chambers ?—That is quite likely.

340. You know that in the history of England there have been periods in which serious crises were apprehended consequent on friction and difference of opinion between the House of Commons and the House of Lords ?—Yes.

341. And it is on account of the good sense of Englishmen and the spirit of compromise that tragic conflicts were avoided ?—Yes.

342. Lord Burnham (from the Chair) : In your Memorandum in regard to the Governor's powers of certification, you wish them wholly to be abolished. He has got different powers with regard to expenditure and legislation ?—We have recommended that on condition there is a Second Chamber.

343. In the Second Chamber you should have equal powers in regard to the money Bills ; otherwise that would not cover the Governor's prerogative ? —We do contemplate that.

344. In case of emergency, say, at the time of a crisis in this province, do you wish the Governor to be deprived of his power of suspending the constitution ?—We suggest that the Governor-General in Council may be given that power.

345. " So that the Governor may carry on a day-" to-day administration on his own responsibility " subject to the general supervision of the Governor-" General in Council " ? You wish to transfer to the Governor-General the powers the Governor has now in that respect ?—That is so.

346. That, of course, militates against what is called autonomy ?—To that extent it does.

347. You say, lower down, that you wish to see the Viceroy's Executive Council predominantly British. Will you tell me exactly what you mean by that ?—In the proportion it is at present, four Europeans and three Indians.

348. I understand that you consider it essential that the Government should control an absolute majority in the Central Legislature ?—Yes.

349. And you have no fear for the future of this province under the scheme which you have set out ? —No.

350. Is there anything else which you would like to say ?—We have nothing more to add.

Memorandum submitted by the Madras Presidency Oriya Association, Berhampore (Ganjam).

Sir,

I have the honour to forward the Memorandum of Evidence hereto annexed, submitted by the Madras Presidency Oriya Association for favourable consideration of the Indian Statutory Commission.

2. In doing so, pursuant to the instructions issued, I have the honour to state that the Madras Presidency Oriya Association is the only institution of its kind among the Oriyas of the Madras Presidency —its creed being the promotion of the welfare of the Oriya community by strictly peaceful and constitutional means. Both by reason of the largeness of the area which it is intended to serve and the varied nature of the activities which it aims at, it is also the biggest socio-political organization of the Oriyas now extant in Southern India. It has now on its rolls about one thousand Oriyas representing all classes and ranks who have applied for its membership and signed its creed, and it is gaining ground rapidly especially among the people living in rural areas. The Association has also keenly interested itself in the question of constitutional Reforms for India and—I may be permitted to mention—had the privilege of being among the first to extend its greetings to the Indian Statutory Commission. It will be also within your easy recollection that the Association had the honour of receiving the distinguished President and the other members of the Commission at the railway station at Berhampore on 22nd February last on their way from Calcutta to Guntur.

3. I beg to add that owing to shortness of time and the delay that occurred in obtaining certain information and data, the Association could not incorporate in the Memorandum its considered opinion in regard to such vital questions as the functioning of the Local Self-Governing bodies, the growth of Education, Social Progress, the Services and the idea of Federation as applied to India. The Association, however, is applying itself to a consideration of these problems, and, ere long, will be in a position to formulate its views in regard to them. The Association will feel obliged if an opportunity is afforded to it to tender oral evidence in respect of the above questions as also in support of the several points raised in its Memorandum. The Association has elected the undersigned for the purpose, and any communication sent in that behalf may be addressed to Bhuvaneswar Ruth, B.A., B.L. Secretary, The Madras Presidency Oriya Association Berhampore (Ganjam Dt.).

4. Any other communications which may be desired to be sent may also kindly be forwarded to the above address.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,

Berhampur, 30–5–1928. B. S. RUTH.

The Goal.

1. The goal enunciated in the Announcement of August 20, 1917, and subsequently embodied in the Preamble to the Government of India Act, is the only goal that can be aimed at for India's political advance, having regard to the past history of the country and the present day position of its peoples. The other two radically different ideals which have been proposed in regard to India's future polity, namely, a benevolent autocracy on the one hand, and complete self-government with power to break away from the Empire on the other, are equally impracticable, and are fraught with calamitous consequences to India's political future. The reactionary view which prescribes for India an absolute system of government is based on the argument that democracy is inherently unsuitable to a country like India—with its innumerable divisions and sub-divisions of community and caste. This theory is given the lie direct alike by India's history and actual present-day experience. Democratic ideas and forms of government had attained high degrees of perfection even in India's ancient past, and the abilities and aptitude exhibited by the people of India in carrying on the popular system of Government—so far as has been established under the Reforms—has won admiration and praise from the most competent quarters. Moreover, especially since the World War, there has come over India a tremendous desire for democratic government, and to ignore altogether out of account this Time-Spirit would prove perilous to the peaceful administration of the country and the contentment of the people. The proposal to frame India's constitution as a full-fledged Self-governing Dominion with the constituent power secured to the people in a Declaration of Rights so that they might sever the Imperial connection any day they might choose, is even far more dangerous. The argument that has been advanced in support of this extreme claim is the old sentimental sophistry, namely, that absolute independence is the natural condition of every people and that the effects of dependence, whether perceptible or not, are injurious to its ultimate interests, the fallacies of which reasoning have been long exposed. But the ideal of independence which is urged to be held in view in framing India's polity is not sought to be rejected on the ground of the fallacious logic on which it is based, but because of the dire disasters which would be in store for the country if it were to be adopted. India is a conglomeration of different nationalities with conflicting interests and aspirations which are now held together only because of the existence of the superior British Power which rigorously holds them under common sway and obedience, and which jealously guards and guarantees to each denomination and section its respective rights. The moment that super-imposed restriction is removed, India is sure to split up into petty principalities and tribal states levying war on one another, as was the state of the country on the eve of the British conquest. What is more portentous an evil, is the prospect of a fresh foreign domination of an intolerable type to which India may find herself subjected, if the rigour of the Imperial tie is relaxed as demanded by the radical idealists. The presence of seven hundred Native States scattered all over the country, the deep differences of ideals and aspirations that now divide the Hindus and Mussulmans, the existence of a long corridor of Mussulman States overlooking across the Frontier with pan-Islamic ambitions, the onslaught of the Bolshevik menace that is becoming so increasingly irresistible, the Yellow Peril which has always remained a source of anxiety to India's peace, are all dormant dangers that will burst forth any day and rob India of her honour and prosperity and place her under the thraldom of the foreign invader the moment the protecting arm of Britain is withdrawn. Responsible Government and British connection accordingly appear to be like two wheels to the coach of India's political progress, and the one is essential to the proper functioning of the other. This essential connection between the two must be firmly seized in mind, and every fresh provision made, and every amendment effected, in the existing constitution must be in strict relation to the goal in view. The powers and privileges enjoyed by the Self-Governing Dominions should be fully ensured to India, but if Dominion status has come to connote the liberty to pack out of the Empire component commonwealth at its sweet will and pleasure, such a mischievous possibility should be expressly precluded from the provisions of India's future constitution. Instead "Swaraj within the Empire" should be specifically postulated in the preamble to the Government of India Act which will set at rest vague, indefinite aspirations now entertained on the one hand, and undue alarm and anxiety felt on the other, and pave the way for the sure and steady march of political progress.

A FEW MORE SUCCESSIVE STAGES.

2. If full Responsible Government within the British Empire is the ideal of India's political endeavour, its progressive realisation is the condition of its success. The task is so difficult of achievement and the consequences of any false step so disastrous that if success is to be permanent, the goal cannot be reached by one or two strides at a stretch, as has been often sought to be effected. The immense masses of three hundred and twenty millions of India's peoples are extremely poor who do not get even one square meal a day and a sufficient piece of cloth to cover their nakedness. They are scattered over five lakhs of villages and hamlets separated from one another by distances, thick woods and jungles and unbridged waterways. Being mostly agricultural in occupation they remain tied to the land all round the year, and have little leisure or opportunity to think of anything except the operations of their industry and their petty domestic concerns. About ninety per cent. of them are again illiterate and the vast bulk have no means of knowing anything about what is happening abroad. They are divided and subdivided into a veritable million of communities and castes, there being among them cleavages crosswise again of race, language and religion. They are extremely conservative and most of them possess peculiarly crude customs and manners. They have been accustomed to look up to the Government as the Mabab and generally accept with unquestioning obedience all administrative measures alike—whether good, bad or indifferent. Though during the Hindu period of their history, the people enjoyed democratic forms of Government, seven centuries of Mussulman autocracy has brought about wholly different ideas and associations in their minds and they have now come to regard the Government as something external to themselves, whose interests are opposed to theirs. The reformed mechanism of the Government has been to the vast bulk of them an unmeaning mystery and the vote and the ballot-box an unheard-of innovation. These ten years have been all too little to impress on the people the significance of the vote and its ultimate relation to their own wants and requirements. Owing to the novelty of the experiment and want of experience on the part of the people, elections are now being conducted amidst extremely crude conditions so much so that a deal is detracted from the seriousness of the business. The sacredness of the franchise is not at all realised, and the trust is openly encroached upon. Government officials, landlords, moneylenders, village and caste heads and even religious preceptors and preachers, in spite of election law, all expect that those who are subordinate to them or in any way under their authority or influence, owe it to them, as a matter of courtesy, to exercise their franchise in favour of persons of their nominee. The voters themselves regard this as nothing out of the way, and yield implicitly to the pressure of their respective superiors. They do not care whether they have to cast their vote for X or Y or whether the man for whom they vote succeeded at all, as often they have precious little personal knowledge and dealings with them. They are reluctantly driven to the polling booth—often fed and entertained on the way—and since most of them cannot read or write, or even if they are capable of that feat, cannot mark the vote correctly —they are made to blurt out the name which had been insistently instilled into them so that the polling officer marks for them on the ballot paper. Sometimes where superior influence does not come into play, voting is done as per factions, villages or mostly castes. If the people of one faction voted in favour of one particular candidate, those belonging to the opposite faction invariably vote for his rival. Similarly, with villages and castes are divided between the candidates. The merits of the respective candidates and the policies and principles, if any, which they represent come in nowhere in this operation. The candidates, who are generally men with English education, are not much above the game either. They stand for no particular set of principles or policy and carry on no propaganda. They hold no meetings, deliver no lectures, distribute no pamphlets, or make no addresses to the electorates through the press. They just tap the sources of influence, and the flow of votes becomes easy. The parties in the legislatures are also formed not on political principles, but on primitive distinctions of caste, community or religion. They have no organisations to speak of, and there are few rules of discipline obtaining among them for the regulation of conduct on the part of their members. Crossing the floor is one of the commonest of occurrences and admittance into a party is no difficult affair at all. Moreover, there is no such thing yet obtaining as a common political understanding among the parties in the country which constitutes the sheet anchor of Parliamentary Government. There is observed no connection between the member and the constituency after the election is once over. Neither the members ever write to or otherwise ascertain the wishes of the electorate on any of the burning questions of the day, nor does the constituency care to keep the member informed about its particular requirements and views. Inasmuch as the vast bulk of the voters are illiterate and ignorant, they are not in a position to know anything of the activities of their representatives in the legislatures. Election pledges—if they are ever made—are violated even the day after the poll is over, either because the member considers a change in the programme and policy necessary in his own individual interests, or out of deference to the command of any external political body—in either case without any reference to the constituency by which the member has been returned. The dismal state of conditions which these facts disclose and which is due largely to the poverty, paucity of education and want of previous training in democratic ways of conducting government on the part of the people cannot be improved all in a day, and the spread of education and political experience among the people and their economic upliftment are processes which require time and patient endeavour for accomplishment. Control from the above cannot, however, be relaxed until and unless there is the agency from below ready and fit to take charge of it, and this, as things are situate, means that progress towards full responsible government within the Empire, though sure, must necessarily be in a few more successive stages.

THE PRESENT POSITION.

3. The present constitutional position in India is very largely what was brought into being in the year 1921. No great advance has been made since then, and no important stage of development reached which calls for further Reforms of a radical character in the direction of responsibility. The operation of the Reforms Act of 1919 was inaugurated under the most unfavourable of auspices. Owing to the universal feelings of exasperation and resentment caused by the unfortunate happenings in the Punjab, and the ignominious way in which the atrocious conduct of certain officials had been whitewashed, the Reforms—which in a more normal state of things would have been hailed as a great concession—had failed actually to satisfy Indian Nationalist opinion. The Indian National Congress, which was then far more representative of the country than it is at present—though, even by then, the great Liberals, as a body, had seceded from its fold—had declared them at Amritsar, in 1919, as "inadequate, unsatisfactory and disappointing," but had pledged itself to work them for what they were worth. Subsequent events, however, upset expectations in this regard, and, at the special session of the Congress in Calcutta in September, 1920, the Non-Co-operation Resolution of Mr. Gandhi was adopted which placed the Reforms under a ban. In the elections held for the Reformed Legislative Councils towards the end of the year, the Non-co-operators did not offer themselves as candidates, though they could not prevent the vast bulk of the voters from participating in the poll. The Liberals were the only organised political party who came returned to the legislatures and had to pilot the Reforms single-handed against heavy odds of popular opprobrium and ridicule. The Non-co-operation policy of the Congress politicians had placed a premium on communal politics and its unhealthy manifestations and effects operated as heavy handicaps for the Liberal Party in the country in the working of the Reforms in the spirit in which they had been intended. Financial disabilities also rendered the pace of progress necessarily slow. India had not yet recouped from the effects of the financial strain to which she had been subjected, in common with the other countries, during the war. The Meston award enjoining on the provinces to contribute to the Central Government a certain quota of their revenues in the shape of fixed sums was a new arrangement to which most Provincial Governments could not easily adjust, partly owing to inexperience and partly due to the increased expenditure which the upkeep of the new machinery necessarily entailed. There were hardly any funds to speak of forthcoming, in the circumstances, which could be released for developing the nation-building departments transferred to the charge of the Ministers. Further, the period between 1921 and 1923 witnessed the height of the Non-co-operation agitation when a general spirit of lawlessness pervaded the country and deliberate defiance of the legally constituted authority was the order of the day. This unprecedented political upheaval in the country necessitated all the resources and energy of the several Governments—both Central and Provincial—in order to discharge their primary obligations—namely the maintenance of law and the preservation of order. Very little attention, indeed, could be spared to be devoted to the political progress of the people amidst these pre-occupations. The second term of the decade which began with the year 1923, was not destined to be much more fruitful in gaining political education and experience on the part of the people. One gratifying feature of the period was that the Swarajists—abandoning the policy of nihilism came into the legislatures in large numbers. But this advantage was more than counterbalanced by the fact that the Liberals had been completely routed at the polls owing to the villifying propaganda which had been systematically carried on against them by their opponents on account of their acceptance of office and entry into the councils during the Non-co-operation Movement. The Swarajists, moreover, came with the policy of offering opposition to the Government from within the Councils, and wrecking the administrative machinery—if possible, by creating constitutional difficulties and deadlocks. It was hardly to be expected that any political education could be achieved under the circumstances. What little chance there might have been for co-operative endeavour in this direction was utterly blasted by the recrudescence of Hindu-Muhammadan squabbles which broke out all over Northern India during the period in thick succession, and engendered much suspicion and ill-feeling between Hindus and Mussulmans generally. In Southern India, where Hindu-Moslem frictions were, as is generally the case, few and far between, disintegration of national effort was effected by the communal rivalries between Brahmins and Non-Brahmins. The third term of the Reformed regime which is now progressing, began in 1927, but it has been fully pre-occupied with discussions about the Statutory Commission—though it has to be stated with satisfaction that a certain amount of peaceful progress in parliamentary government has been recorded in some of the Provinces. Extensive possibilities, however, lie unexplored within the scope of the Montagu-Chelmsford changes introduced into the Constitution which, if properly utilised, would have helped forward India a great distance on the road to responsible government. Ideas and practices of responsible government would have been widely and intensely diffused among the people and heaps of constitutional precedents piled up which would have justified the demand for a large stride of progress in the direction of responsibility. As it is, in point of political education and experience, India is not much farther than from where she started seven years ago when the Reforms were inaugurated.

CHANGES IN IMMEDIATE FUTURE.

4. It has been widely asserted that the conditions of co-operation and the growth of the sense of responsibility on the part of the people which are contemplated in the Preamble to the Government of India Act, have been completely fulfilled, and that the time is fully arrived when the final steps in the process of progressive realisation should be taken and that India should be granted at once the full self-governing status enjoyed by the other Dominions in the Empire. It has been very competently argued with a certain degree of subtleness, in this connection, " that the expression ' successive stages ' as used in the second clause of the Preamble, cannot possibly exclude the stages of progress already achieved by India up to the moment when the Act of 1919 was passed, and it would be wholly unwarranted to hold, that for purposes of the realisation of Responsible Government, the first stage must be deemed to have commenced with the passing of the Act of 1919." Whether the clause in question is legally capable of bearing this construction that is sought to be put upon it or not, it certainly seems a little too much to hold that that was what the Parliament had in mind when it laid it down the condition of progress therein embodied, and what is even of greater moment, that the stern political fact about India is that she is not yet in such a position as to render it safe to grant her full Responsible Government in the next instalment. There are among India's politicians men who would compare favourably with the very best in any country in the world, but the vast bulk of India's millions, on whom after all, the success or failure of democratic government must depend, are yet so ill-equipped for the task, that the day when India will have to be asked to take charge of her affairs entirely has to be put off a little yet. The analogy which is often instituted between the state of England when the First Reform Bill was passed and India's present day condition is false and misleading. Though in point of percentage of education the condition of the Indian people might compare favourably with the state of people in England in 1832, England had by then long centuries of Parliamentary Government behind which is wholly lacking in the case of India. The next immediate step in India's constitutional progress accordingly cannot consist in the establishment of the full responsible government in the country. Reform should proceed rather in the direction of relaxing control over certain departments of state activity in the centre and over further others in the Provinces, in removing the defects from the existing machinery as disclosed in its practical working in the past, and what is even of more immediate importance in remedying certain long-felt grievances mostly of an administrative character. With the necessary changes and improvements effected, the existing system will have to be further worked out, its possibilities fully explored, and the dangers that might lie ahead clearly discerned before the last forward move is undertaken.

RE-DISTRIBUTION OF PROVINCES ON LINGUISTIC BASIS.

5. One of the reforms immediately needed in the existing constitution is the re-distribution of the provinces on linguistic basis. The nine major Provincial Governments, and the six minor Administrations into which British India—apart from British Burma—is at present divided, are in the nature of historical accidents, arising out of the exigencies of conquest and annexation rather than territorial divisions devised in pursuance of any plan or principle. The country came under British suzerainity piecemeal, and as each bit was acquired, it was tacked on to the adjacent tract which had already been under occupation and continued to be administered as a part and parcel of the old area by the existing Provincial Government. The sole idea which guided the administrators at that time was that the country was secured firmly under British supremacy and that the people settled down to peaceful avocations and pursuits admitting of the establishment of ordinary civil government. The grouping of the people into separate provincial governments in accordance with their linguistic and ethnological requirements was not part of the administrative policy. The same state of things has been allowed to continue down to this day with a few modifications here and there undertaken with a view to meet the exigencies of the moment. The lapse of time, however, has disclosed to view defects inherent in the present territorial arrangement. It has been found that the promiscuous herding together of peoples of different linguistic and racial denominations has resulted in innumerable administrative difficulties, and has hampered the healthy growth and progress of the people themselves by stifling the expression of the genius peculiar to each race and the development of its distinctive culture and civilisation. Moreover, the system has given rise to unhealthy racial rivalries and animosities among the several communities making up the population in each provincial area, the effect of which has been ultimately injurious to the interests of the body politic. The need for the re-organisation of the provinces as per one or the other of the recognised scientific principles has been accordingly felt and that principle, it is now universally agreed, should be the principle of language. The Indian National Congress has formally set the seal of its approval on this principle and its work is now organised on the basis of linguistic provincial units. The other political parties in the country also have accepted the linguistic principle as being at once scientific and practicable, and the desire to redistribute the provinces on linguistic basis is one of the few common planks on which all Indian politicians stand united at the present day. As regards the question whether the linguistic principle should be the sole and exclusive determining factor in carving out provincial areas for the future, there does not exist, however, such absolute unanimity of opinion. On a universal and even-handed application of the principle, there will spring into existence nineteen administrations in all—four more than the present number. These would be the administrations of (1) Bengal, (2) Bihar (including the Hindi-speaking area of the Central Provinces), (3) U.P., (4) The Punjab, (5) North-West Frontier Province, (6) British Baluchistan, (7) Ajmere-Merwara, (8) Delhi, (9) Assam, (10) Orissa, (11) Andhra, (12) Madras (comprising the Tamil-speaking Districts of the present Presidency), (13) Karnataka (consisting of North Canera Districts of Madras and South Canera District of Bombay), (14) Kerala (Malabar), (15) Coorg, (16) Andamans and Nicobars, (17) Bombay (consisting of the Marati-speaking tracts of Berar, Central Provinces and Bombay), (18) Gujerat and (19) Sindh. Of these, the immediate creation of the administrations of Orissa, Andhra and Karnataka, has now been agreed to on all hands, and definite schemes have been formulated in furtherance of the proposal. The application of the principle in the case of Malayalees, Marathi-speaking people of Bombay, Berar, and Central Provinces and the Gujeratis, though formally recognised by the Indian National Congress, no definite suggestions—so far as is known—yet been evolved in detail. The case of Sindh, however, has been the bone of contention between the Hindu Mahasabha and the Moslem League. The peculiar position of the people of Sindh had always elicited general public approval for their claim for a separate province. But the recrudescence of Hindu-Moslem dissensions in recent years and the Moslem demand for introduction of Reforms into the North West Frontier Province, and British Baluchistan simultaneously with the constitution of Sindh into a separate administrative unit as a condition precedent to the abolition of their separate electorates, has brought about a revulsion in Hindu opinion, and the Hindu Mahasabha has now definitely set its face against the proposal for separating Sindh from Bombay. The Mahasabha regards the creation of three new full-fledged self-governing Moslem provinces adjacent to India's Frontier, in addition to the two Moslem predominated provinces already existing, namely, The Punjab, and Bengal, as practically tantamount to surrendering India to Moslem supremacy and agreeing to the eternal subordination of the Hindus. The practical possibilities arising under the circumstances would accordingly appear to be that Orissa, Andhra and Karnataka should at once be created into three independent provinces. The claims of Malayalees, Gujeratis and the Marathi-speaking population now scattered over Berar, Central Provinces and Bombay should also be investigated and, if possible, separate provinces for them also should be established simultaneously with the creation of Orissa, Andhra and Karnataka provinces. The Hindi-speaking area of Central Provinces should be amalgamated with Bihar which, divested of its present alliance with Orissa, should be an independent provincial unit by itself. So far as Sindh is concerned, it should be constituted into a sub-province under Bombay so as to assuage Hindu opposition in the matter. If Provincial Governments are not to continue as the peculiar concern of nobody—which, indeed, they are at present—and, if an adequate sense of responsibility for the proper propelling and preservation of the state mechanism is to be developed among the people on whom fresh opportunities and power will be conferred increasingly in future, it is of the utmost importance that the re-grouping of the peoples, as above indicated, should be effected before fresh constitutional changes are undertaken in other directions.

THE SPECIAL CASE OF THE ORIYAS.

6. In connection with the question of the formation of linguistic provinces, the case of the Oriyas arises for special consideration. No other people in the whole of India have been subjected to such acute suffering, and in no other case, such complete rout of national prosperity has resulted, owing to the policy of indiscriminate enfoldment of the peoples as has occurred in the unfortunate instance of the Oriyas. If only a cursory comparison is instituted between the state of the people in the past before they were brought under British Rule and their present day condition, the truth of this assertion will be thrown into relief. The Oriyas are an ancient Aryan community and the record of their achievements—alike in arts of peace and of war—has been one of the richest in the annals of India. Beginning from a tiny strip of territory in the region north of the Chilka Lake they had, by their military strength and prowess, established at one time an empire extending from the Ganges in the north to the Godavary in the south. In the domain of architecture, which was the art that made particular appeal to their genius, their achievements as testified to by the temples of Jagannath and Bhuvaneswar and the magnificent ruins at Konark near Puri, have been the wonder of all the world. The Oriyas were one of the richest people of India and arts and industries freely flourished among them. On account of the advantage of a long line of sea coast which nature has conferred on their country, the Oriyas had commercial connections extending far and wide across the seas and, besides raw minerals and agricultural produce, used to export abroad, every year, richly embroidered fine fabrics both of silk and cotton and highly ornamented silver and other metallic wares on quite a large scale. The agricultural prosperity of the country had been such that one of its districts—Ganjam—had been named " Granary of the North " by Dutch merchants who frequented its coasts in connection with commerce. The economic prosperity of the Oriya people found reflection in the affluence of its Ruling Princes, who, according to the historian, " derived such large revenues as to be able, besides meeting the normal expenditure of the civil government, to maintain a peasant militia of 300,000 men, and a regular army of 50,000 foot, 10,000 horse and 2,500 elephants. Thirty or forty thousand pounds, it would seem, were not considered by these monarchs an extravagant allowance for an ordinary temple, and it is stated of one monarch that his own individual accummulations amounted to £1,296,750–, out of which he set apart £406,250– for the holy edifice of Jagannath at Puri. In point of the spread of education and knowledge, Orissa had been one of the recognised shrines of Sanskrit culture, and the ancient vernacular literature of the country reveals the high degree of perfection and prosperity to which it had once attained. In the department of religion, Orissa had attained unexampled spiritual eminence, and Puri—where its Lord Jagannath is enshrined—has always remained the religious capital of Hindu India. Such a nation finds itself now sunk in the veritable bottoms of death and dilapidation. They are the poorest of peoples, famine and pestilence are chronic among them, and they are in so illiterate and ignorant a condition that they have been officially recognised as a " backward community " in some provinces of British India. It is not for a moment pretended that Orissa was in the ideal state of prosperity as indicated above by the time it came under the British Rule. But although the power of its Princes had greatly fallen, that the economic condition of the people and their general civilisation and culture had not far gone down is found to be borne out by its history. Indeed the process of decline through which the people have passed under the present system of administration is perceptible fairly distinctly. Orissa came under British sway long after most other provinces had been acquired, and the country was conquered piecemeal. In pursuance of the policy adverted to already, her territory was parcelled out among different Provincial Governments, everywhere forming a tiny tithe of the total area. This disadvantage combined with the circumstance that the Oriyas were in the nature of things absolutely behindhand in the matter of English education, relegated them altogether to the background, and imposed upon them a sort of subordinate supremacy on the part of the predominant people of each province. These " intermediary rulers " with a view to perpetuate their position, kept the Oriya tracts in an undeveloped and backward condition and sufficient facilities were not provided for the Oriya people to progress. Positioned as the Oriyas invariably have been, away from the Provincial headquarters, their difficulties and disadvantages could never come under the notice of the Government at the centre. The administrative inconveniences and handicaps to which the Oriyas have been subjected, under the circumstances are simply innumerable. Their educational needs and requirements have been administered to with a most niggardly hand, and the teaching of their language and literature has not been adequately provided for in the schools and colleges managed or aided by the Government. In prescribing the syllabus of studies in the schools in the Oriya areas no heed is ever paid to the peculiar needs and aptitudes of the Oriya pupils and they are being crammed according to a curriculum which has been devised as being suitable to the children belonging to the predominant community of the province. In the Courts and Government Offices, in spite of reiterated G.O.'s laid down by the Provincial Governments concerned, the Oriya language is not given the currency which is its due, and Oriya litigants and ryots are being placed at the mercy of middle men as the language of the predominant community which is prevalent is foreign to them. What with the paucity of qualified hands artificially brought about, and what with want of backing and support at the seats of authority, Oriyas have been most sparsely represented in the public services in every province in which they are situate, and their territories are being administered by officers of the predominant race who are, as a rule, unacquainted with their language, habits and customs and their particular needs and requirements. In the municipalities, local bodies and legislatures of the country—except now in Bihar and Orissa—nowhere do the Oriyas succeed in getting their due share of representation owing to the power and influence wielded adversely by the people of the predominant communities. The economic well-being of the Oriyas is altogether unattended to, and the abounding forest and mineral resources of the country lie unexplored which, if developed, would have greatly augmented the average income of the people. Their one-time agricultural prosperity has been utterly ruined owing to paucity of irrigational facilities in some parts of the country and the chronic inundation and floods caused by overflow of rainwater in other parts. The Provincial Governments concerned have not also paid any heed to the upkeep and encouragement of the indigenous arts and industries among the people which provided the means of sustenance to a large section of the population. The Oriyas in every province have been reduced to the utmost shifts of poverty, and, day by day, their country is being depopulated owing to emigration of its inhabitants in increasingly large numbers to distant Burma or Assam in search of labour and sustenance. What is by far the most menacing feature is that the fragmentation of the Oriyas over four different administrative areas—and amidst communities with whom they have nothing in common whether in race, language or culture—has very seriously affected the maintenance and preservation of their national integrity, and has exposed them to the hazard of being absorbed and assimilated by the predominant peoples of the provinces in which they live. It is these peculiar administrative evils by which they are being gradually ground down, and it is this peculiar risk of racial annihilation and absorbtion which they are running every day of their existence that constitute the case of the Oriyas in every sense unique and unparalleled. It is a mistake to regard the Oriya demand merely as one of the several claims for the formation of linguistic provinces such as that of the Andhras and dispose of the question in common with the rest. The Andhras have been grouped all under one Government, namely, Madras. They have not been the victim of any process of racial disintegration and dilapidation as has unfortunately happened in the case of the Oriyas. They are not ailing from any administrative evils of aggravated character. Of the twenty-six districts comprising the Madras Presidency they claim to their credit nearly thirteen. Madras, the capital of the Presidency, is also situated more centrally to them than in relation to the other communities. Owing to their numerical strength in the provincial population, they have always shared half the attention of the authorities, and the proximity of the capital has enabled them to avail themselves fully of the higher educational facilities and other amenities provided by the Government. If the Andhras want a province of their own under the circumstances, it is with a view to the fuller expression of their distinctive genius and culture, and not to escape the dire fate of racial annihilation. The other communities asking for independent provincial administrations are not as fortunately positioned as the Andhras, but they are not in such dilapidated and disintegrated a condition as the Oriyas are at present. The Malayalees have been concentrated all within the bounds of the Madras Presidency. Sindh is exclusively under Bombay. Similarly circumstanced are the Gujeratis. The Canarese population is divided only between Bombay and Madras. The Marathi speaking population now in Bombay, Central Provinces and Berar are only under two Provincial Governments, and they are not insignificant minorities in their respective provinces as the Oriyas have been in Madras, Bengal, Bihar and Central Provinces. The problem of the Oriyas is surrounded by special aggravating circumstances and a separate province in their case is a peculiar necessity.

HISTORY AND DYNAMIC NATURE OF THE ORIYA DEMAND.

7. The demand for a separate province for the Oriyas is also, in its origin, a very old one, and there has developed behind it an immense volume of public opinion which invests it with an urgency all its own. The claim of the other communities for separate provinces are comparatively of a later date, and have been in pursuance of the ideal first perceived and proclaimed by the Oriyas. The Andhra demand was first formulated only in or about the year 1912, when the Andhra Conference came into existence. The other movements in the direction are even of later origin. The need for reform in the existing arrangement was in a sense forced upon the Oriyas early on account of the evils inherent in their peculiarly fragmented position. Ever since the seventies of the last century, the Oriyas have been pointing out the pernicious effects of the present system of administration on their national growth and development and agitating for their re-union. In 1903 a national organisation called the Utkal Union Conference was brought into being with a view to carry on continued agitation in this direction, and this body has been, ever since, urging on the authorities the necessity for the much needed reform. It is a significant circumstance to be mentioned in this connection that the name of the Utkal Union Conference, embodying as it does, the ideal which the people have so passionately at heart, evokes unique enthusiasm among the Oriyas, and its hold on them is universal and supreme, far surpassing that exercised by the Indian National Congress itself. In other Associations and Conferences of the people—periodical or permanent—resolutions have been always adopted advocating their amalgamation under a single government. In the vernacular press of the country reunion is the constant theme of discussion and quite a body of literature has grown around the subject. The evil effects of the present dis-membered state of the Oriyas could not long escape the attention of the Government and consequent on the failure on the part of the Bengal Government to grapple with the famine in Orissa in 1866, Sir Stafford Northcote, as early as 1886, appears to have made the suggestion to bring under one separate administration the country of Orissa. In 1895, Mr. Cooke, Commissioner of Orissa, in his Administration Report of the Orissa Division published in the Calcutta Gazette Supplement dated 23rd October, 1895, page 2357, after a detailed examination of the problem, made recommendations to the same effect. In 1903, again when Lord Curzon, the Viceroy, cast his reforming eye on the political map of India, the anomalous grouping of the Oriyas was the first to arrest his attention, and in the letter No. 3678, dated December 3, 1903, which Mr. H. H. Risley—Home Secretary to the Government of India—addressed to the Secretary to the Government of Bengal, the Government of India formulated proposals for bringing together all the Oriya-speaking tracts under the Government of Bengal, though the creation of a separate province for the Oriyas was not perhaps then considered feasible. Copies of the proposals were forwarded to the Provincial Governments concerned for opinion, and the Madras Government, at the instance of the predominant peoples of the Presidency, who stood immediately to lose, opposed the transfer of the Ganjam District and the Vizag Agency to Bengal. When the question came up for final decision by the Government of India, Lord Ampthill who, as Governor of Madras had opposed the proposals, happened to be acting as Governor-General and Viceroy in the temporary absence of Lord Curzon in England on leave. He knocked on the head the proposal to dislodge Ganjam and Vizagaptam Agency tracts from Madras, and the Government of India by Resolution No. 2491, dated 19th July, 1905, ordered only the transfer of the Sambalpur District from Central Provinces to Bengal. The Oriyas, however, continued the agitation with unabated enthusiasm, and, when by the Royal boon at the Delhi Durbar the formation of a new province for Behar was announced, the Oriyas put forth their demand asking that, at least, a Chief Commissionership should be given to them. They mooted the matter even in the British Parliament, and during the passage of the Government of India Bill, constituting the new province, in the House of Lords, Lord Curzon made a vigorous stand for the administrative union of the Oriya tracts declaring that "the interests of the Oriyas had been sacrificed without compunction" and that the callous indifference for Oriya interests had been due to the fact that the Oriyas are a non-agitating people." Lord Crewe, the then Secretary of State for India, expressed his appreciation of the desire on the part of the Oriyas for a separate administration of their own, but nothing beneficial resulted to the Oriyas; and the Oriya-speaking tracts under Bengal, except the portions in the Midnapur District, were bodily made over to Bihar avowedly with the object of presenting the new province with a seaboard. When the Montagu-Chelmsford inquiry was instituted during the winter 1917–1918, the Oriyas duly presented their demand for a separate province. The illustrious authors of the Reforms now in vogue, in their Report, recognised the force of the claim put forward by the Oriyas, but consistent with the policy of not embarking on the reorganisation of the provinces on linguistic basis simultaneously with the experimental innovations in the direction of responsibility, they refrained from effecting the reunion of Orissa. While reserving, however, the question of the formation of linguistic provinces to the reformed legislatures, they, in para. 246 of the Report, expressed the opinion that "In Orissa and Berar, at all events, it seemed to them that the possibilities of instituting sub-provinces need not be excluded from consideration at a very early date." The Oriyas sustained severe disappointment at this niggardly way of disposing of their national demand, but they remained undaunted. They took up the idea of a sub-province in earnest, and agitated for its early establishment in the old Imperial Legislative Council and the Legislative Council of Behar and Orissa. But the Government of India, putting a peculiar interpretation of their own upon the language of para. 246 of the Montford Report, refused to move in the matter before the Reforms were inaugurated. After the introduction of the Reforms, however, the Oriyas find that they have flown from the frying pan into the fire. They find that so far as the Provincial Governments are concerned, the solution of their problem has been placed largely in the hands of the predominant communities who have been all along opposed to their aspirations. In the Central Legislative, too, indifference and apathy towards matters relating to Orissa has characterised the attitude of the generality of members, and the disposition of some has been positively hostile. The Oriya representatives in the Assembly and in the Provincial Legislative Councils of Bihar and Orissa and Madras—who, all told, are less than a dozen in number—have been, however, up and doing, bringing home to the Government the urgency of the problem—but no progress to speak of, has been made towards its solution. The Government of India in response to a resolution moved on the eve of the Reforms in the old Imperial Legislative Council by Mr. (then Hon'ble) Sachidanand Singh—lately of the Executive Council of Bihar and Orissa—had promised to consider the question of the early amalgamation of the Oriya-speaking areas of Ganjam and Vizagapatam in Madras with Bihar and Orissa. Doubts having been raised in the meantime in interested quarters that the desire for amalgamation was confined only to a few politically ambitious persons among the populace, the Government of India, in 1924, appointed the Phillip–Duff Committee to ascertain the exact extent of Oriya opinion in the Districts in question. The popular enthusiasm that was evoked among the Oriyas on the occasion of this inquiry is unsurpassed in the experience of communal agitations in India except perhaps in the instance of the Partition agitation in Bengal. Tens of thousands of Oriyas, with flags and trumpets, and to the accompaniment of their national songs and anthems, greeted the members of the Phillip–Duff Committee wherever they went, and memorials and addresses were presented to them on behalf of local bodies, associations and people of all classes and ranks advocating their immediate re-union with Orissa. The Phillip–Duff Committee made its Report recommending the speedy amalgamation of the Oriyas of Ganjam and Vizag with their Oriya brethren under Bihar, but no substantial steps have been taken by the Government of India in this direction, presumably in view of the present investigation. The Oriyas in the Midnapur District of Bengal and those under the Central Provinces as also the Oriyas in Singhbhum in Chota Nagpur being far more disorganised and backward than the Oriyas of Ganjam and Vizag, no similar agitation with a view to their amalgamation has been able to raise its head, though need for relief in their case is no whit less acute. The Oriyas have been looking forward to the inquiry now on hand as the occasion and opportunity for the final solution of their national problem, and unless their amalgamation under a separate Government is effected as a first preliminary, the grant of further Reforms in the direction of responsibility to India will, far from being beneficial, prove positively injurious to their individual interests as a community.

THE ORIYA PROVINCE OF THE FUTURE.

8. In inviting attention to the Oriya demand in the present connection, it does not appear to be necessary to delineate in detail the parts and functions of the Government mechanism of the future Province of Orissa. It is, however, proposed to piece together certain facts and touch in slight outlines certain features so that the same may prove helpful in visualising broadly the ideal in view. The nucleus of the physical basis of the proposed province will be furnished by the five districts—Puri, Cuttack, Balasore, Sambalpur and Angul—now all comprised in the Orissa Division of the Province of Bihar and Orissa. To this will have to be added the whole of Ganjam District except the Revenue Taluq of Chicacole and the entire agency area of the District of Vizagapatam—both now lying in the Madras Presidency. The Zamindars of Chandrapur, Padmapur, and Malkhorida in the Bilaspur District and those of Phuljhar and Khariar in the Raipur District will have to be taken away from the Central Provinces and tacked on to the aggregate area arrived at as per above. The Contai Subdivision, Dantan, Gopiballbhapur, Narayanaghar, Jharagaon and Biripur Thanas in the Midnapur District in Bengal and the Singhbhum District in the Chota Nagpur Division in the Bihar and Orissa, will have to be separated respectively from their present administrative connections and annexed to the Orissa Province under contemplation so as to complete the scheme of amalgamation of Oriya-speaking tracts. The twenty-four feudatory states of Orissa, the Saraikala and Kharsván States in Chota Nagpur as also the States of Bastar, Saranggarh, Raighar, Udaipur and Jhaspur in the Central Provinces should be placed under the Orissa Government of the future. It is recognised that grouping together of these independent States under Orissa will not in any way augment the material resources of the proposed provincial administration, but by far the vast majority of the population in these States is Oriya, and the relationship of the Oriyas of British India and their brethren in the States in question has been so intimate and vital that they have been both regarded as part and parcel of one whole. Most of these States, again, are petty principalities enjoying varying degrees of power and status, and they have been all along administered by the Commissioner of the Orissa Division acting through a Political Agent on behalf of the Governor-General and Viceroy. It is agreed more or less universally by all concerned namely—the Chiefs, their subjects and the Oriyas of British India proper alike—that the present arrangement should remain unaffected by the constitution of Orissa into an independent administration. The total area of the Oriya Province by piecing together the above territories would be over 89,000 square miles with a population of wellnigh 15,000,000. As regards the capital of the province, it should be located at Cuttack, with Puri or the Mahendra Hills of Ganjam as the summer seat of the Government. The government of the province should be vested in a Governor acting with two Ministers. It is suggested that there should be no Executive Council for the Province, and that the Reserved Subjects should be administered by the Governor himself through Secretaries. The Province should have a single-chambered legislature of thirty-five to forty members partly elected and partly nominated. For purposes of local administration, the province should be divided into ten districts, five more being carved out of the area newly added to the existing Orissa Division. The revenue work and the general administration of these districts should be co-ordinated by a Financial Commissioner whose function and powers should be analogous to those of the Board of Revenue obtaining in some of the bigger provinces. There should be a High Court of Judicature located at Cuttack, consisting of a Chief Justice and two to four puisne Judges. There should be created a University at Cuttack to which the other Colleges in the province will be affiliated. A permanent Public Service Commission should be constituted which shall recruit and regulate the services of the province. By an arrangement with the Government of India, the Feudatory States in the province should be administered through the Governor of Orissa and there should be no separate Political Agent.

THE FINANCIAL BOGEY.

9. Financial insufficiency is the red rag which is sometimes waved in the face of the proposal for a separate Oriya Province. It is alleged that the revenues arising out of the amalgamated Oriya-speaking tracts will not prove sufficient for running an independent Provincial Government. This mistake has proceeded from the fundamental misconception that all the Provincial Governments of India must be of one type and after a single pattern. Those who have raised the fear of this bogey in the way, have based their calculations on the features and paraphernalia prevailing in the existing Provincial Governments, and have judged the sufficiency of the finances of future Orissa in relation to those accidental attributes. No exact estimates of the revenues likely to accrue from the amalgamated Oriya-speaking tracts have been yet made, nor have any authentic figures been arrived at with regard to the expenditure which such an amalgamation under a separate Government will entail, on the lines of the simplified scheme suggested above. The initial outlay in setting up a separate Government for Orissa will not necessarily be overwhelming. If considerations of pomp and paraphernalia do not prevail, the existing Government buildings at Cuttack with slight additions and alterations may prove sufficient for the location of the Provincial Government. Similarly, the existing Ravenshaw College will provide the nucleus for the Oriya University, and much saving of expenditure will be made in that direction. The present Officers of Government, both of the All-India and the Provincial Services, will continue to carry on the administration in the districts as now, and the expenditure incurred on their account and on account of their subordinate officials and establishments has been in no case suggested to exceed the revenues which the districts respectively yield. If the net revenues resulting from these districts is not sufficient for the upkeep of the Provincial Government at the centre, with a High Court and University these last two features of the administration may not be thought of for some time to come till the state of finances improves. By an arrangement come to with the Government of India, and with necessary legislation effected, the High Court of Judicature in Calcutta may be entrusted with the appellate and revisional jurisdiction and the general superintendence over the subordinate courts of the Oriya Province. Similarly, the Calcutta University may be approached to allow affiliation to itself of the Colleges of Orissa till a separate University is instituted for the Province. The development of the mineral and other resources of the country is sure to augment the revenues of the Government, and, if necessary, a pilgrim tax may be levied on the pilgrims of whom there is a heavy flow to Orissa all round the year from the several parts of India. If, in spite of all these measures, balancing of the budget is not found possible, then an all-round reduction in the pay and pensions of the officers and other servants of the Government may be effected to such extent as may be necessary. Temporary loans from the Government of India also may be taken to be liquidated after the province is financially self-sufficient. It is pertinent to mention in this connection that on the eve of the creation of the Province of Bihar and Orissa as well as of Assam, the same question of financial insufficiency had been raised, but after the actual constitution of the Provinces, the difficulty apprehended has been demonstrated to be largely imaginary. What has been the experience with regard to Bihar and Orissa and Assam, will, it is hoped, be found to be reiterated in the instance of Orissa.

SUB-PROVINCE AS A STEPPING STONE.

10. If for financial reasons or due to other causes, the creation of an independent Province for the Oriyas is not found practicable for the present the constitution of a sub-province for them under one or other of the existing Provinces will go a long way towards allaying the grievances of the people. Such a measure will do away with the administrative evils to which the Oriyas have been peculiarly exposed and will afford scope howsoever limited—for the expression of their distinctive civilisation and culture. The safeguard, however, should be guaranteed in the constitution that if in three consecutive terms of its session successively—once in each term—the legislative council of the sub-province passes a resolution demanding a separate province for Orissa the same shall be effected with the consent and approval of the Government of India—which shall always remain a central reserved subject. Other safeguards with regard to matters such as adequate representation of the Oriyas in the public services—if these services are organised on a Provincial basis—will have also to be provided so as to avoid difficulties and friction in the functioning of the constitution. As regards the Province under which the Oriyas should form a sub-provincial unit the claims of Bihar come for consideration first and foremost. The vast bulk of the Oriya people living in the Districts of Puri, Cuttack, Balasore, Sambalpur, Angul, and Singbhum in Chota Nagpur are now enfolded in the province of Bihar and Orissa where they have already formed some connections, and it would be desirable not to disturb them from there if it can be avoided. Bihar, moreover, is yet a "baby" province, and may not be able to sustain such a heavy operation in its parts as the severance of Orissa. Further, Bihar, in case Orissa is separated from it, will go without a seaboard, which consideration has weighed so heavily in the past with the Government in tacking on the Oriya-speaking tracts to its area. There will be again a healthy poise of power and influence maintained between the peoples of the Province, if Oriyas are enfolded in a sub-province along with Bihar. Next to Bihar comes Madras in point of convenience in this connection. In the first place Oriya tracts of Ganjam District and Vizagapatam agency have been under the Madras Government ever since they came under British sway. The Oriyas of these two tracts though they bear no affinity to the other people under the presidency—in race, language or civilisation—have developed a certain attachment for the presidency which they would like to continue if by some device their national integrity is secured safe and their neighbours prevented from committing pillage in their hearth and home. Secondly, the problem of slicing off nicely the Oriya areas from the Telugu populated portions in Ganjam and Vizag, which presents some difficulty, will at once disappear in the event of such a consummation. Thirdly, Madras being one of the most enlightened of provincial administrations in all India, the Oriyas now under Bihar, Bengal and Central Provinces will profit largely by the proposed connection. Fourthly, the Oriyas will find themselves in a richer home in Madras than in any other province. The large financial resources of the southern Presidency will succour several projects of common utility which may not be possible for the Government of future Orissa by itself to undertake. The difficulties of distance between the several parts of the proposed presidency will not seriously arise after the opening of the Waltair-Raipur Railway line, which project is now under accomplishment. But there is a difficulty in the way of Orissa forming a sub-province under Madras which is almost stupendous. The presidency is already unwieldy and the idea of adding to the existing area the entire Oriya-speaking tracts now under Bengal, Bihar and Central Provinces will hardly, as things stand, appear practicable. If, however, Madras is relieved of its burdens on the west coast by the formation of separate provinces for Karnataka (Canara) and Kerala (Malabar) or by the constitution of an amalgamated province of Karnataka and Kerala, the creation of Orissa into a sub-province under Madras would become fairly feasible. As regards Orissa being made a sub-province under Bengal the initial disadvantage is that only the Oriya-speaking tracts in the Midnapur District are now present under Bengal. Besides, the Bengal Government is one of the poorest among the provincial Governments in spite of the affluence and plenty enjoyed by its people. The yoking of Orissa to Bengal under the circumstances may not prove an advantageous alliance to either of the Governments. What is more formidable an objection to such an alliance is that there is so close an affinity in language and culture, habits and manners, between the Oriyas and the Bengalees that the integrity of the former may be injuriously affected in process of time. The risk is all the more great by reason of the circumstances that, compared to the population of Orissa, the population of Bengal is disproportionately larger and the people of Bengal are infinitely richer than the inhabitants of Orissa. The presence of a large sprinkling of Bengalee immigrants in the boundaries of Orissa itself who have been domiciled, also adds to the element of risk. The idea of Orissa being constituted a sub-province under Central Provinces is so far-fetched and unpopular that it does not at all arise for consideration as a practicable proposition. In considering the question of establishing a sub-province of the Oriyas under one or other of the Provinces in the manner above indicated, it is essential to be borne in mind that it will never be acceptable to the Oriyas to have a sub-province in full settlement of their claims. A separate province is, and will ever remain, their ultimate ideal, and they will be content for some time with a sub-province only as a stepping-stone and a stage on the way to its achievement.

JUDICIARY AND ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

11. Next in importance to the redistribution of Provinces on linguistic basis comes the question of reforms in the system of Judiciary and Administration of Justice. The administration of Law and Justice in British India has been one of an ideal type, but the very perfection of the system has thrown into relief certain defects and anomalies, the existence of which has been long felt as a great hardship. One of these anomalies is the exercise of Magisterial powers by the subordinate officials of the Revenue Department. These officials are directly under the subordination of the District Collector on the revenue side and have to look up to him for their promotion and preferment. The District Collector is intimately connected with the administration of Salt Abkari and Forest Departments, and being also the administrative head of the district, the Police is closely connected with him. Many cases come before the subordinate Revenue officials sitting as Magistrates in which the District Collector happens to be indirectly interested in the prosecution. It often becomes a hard thing indeed, under the circumstances, for these officials to exercise absolute independence of judgment which is so essential to the satisfactory discharge of their duties. Again, the judgments of these subordinate Magistrates go in appeal to the District Collector in his capacity as the District Magistrate in many matters in which he himself—though indirectly—is a party to the prosecution. Though owing to the high integrity and honesty exhibited by the members of the Indian Civil Service in the past, there has not been much room for complaint of partiality, the existence of the anomaly has been always felt as a grievance—and Indian public opinion ever since the inception of the Indian National Congress, in the middle of the eighties, has been insistently demanding its removal. Another feature which has been responsible for much irritation and discontent is the racial discrimination that is made in the treatment of Indians and others of European extraction in the administration of the criminal law of the country. This discrimination, which was made in many matters of trial and sentence at one time, has been largely done away with by progressive legislation, but vestiges of preferential treatment still remain which it is essential to abolish without further dilatoriness. The appointment of members of the Indian Civil Service as District Judges has been objected to in certain quarters on the ground that they do not bring to the work any sound knowledge of the law and previous legal training. But civilian Judges in the District have been on the whole satisfactory, and the need that is felt for them during Hindu-Moslem riots by members of both the communities alike, points to the necessity of their continuance. In the High Courts, the invidious distinction that is made between Barristers, Advocates and Pleaders should be put an end to, and Pleaders also should be made eligible for appointment as Chief Justices. The proportion of appointments of High Court Judges as apportioned at present among members of the Civil Service, British Barristers and others, should be allowed to continue for at least some time to come. By far the most important Reform necessary in the system of the Judicial Administration is the creation of a Supreme Court for India. This need is felt both as a part of the equipment of the self-governing status which it is India's aspiration to achieve, and also on account of the many difficulties that are being experienced by the people for want of a higher appellate tribunal than the High Courts in India itself. The self-governing Dominions of Australia, South Africa and Canada have now each a Supreme Court of their own, and with the establishment of a federal system of government in the country, such an institution will be an absolute necessity. As regards the practical inconveniences arising out of the present arrangement due to the desire to cut short the number of appeals to the Privy Council as far as possible, several restrictions have been placed on the right to appeal to that tribunal. This has operated as denial of justice in certain cases. In cases where an appeal is specifically provided for, the people have been put to extraordinarily heavy expenditure in briefing counsel in England. Moreover, situated as they are, six thousand miles away across the seas, they seldom hope to come in personal contact with their solicitor or counsel, and have been put to extra expense and inconvenience on that score. It is recognised freely that the judgments of the Judicial Committee have been generally monuments of legal learning, but, of late, dissatisfaction has been felt in this country in regard to its handling of certain questions of personal law, and the proposal to appoint Indian Judges to remedy this defect is hardly likely to prove successful. All these inconveniences and handicaps to which Indians are being put can be put an end to at one stroke by the creation of a Supreme Court for India. The objections that are urged against the proposal are not of an insurmountable character. It is said that the Privy Council constitutes a link in the chain of Imperial connection and ought not to be interfered with. But the proposal is not to effect a severance of all connection between India and the Privy Council. The supreme prerogative of appeal now enjoyed by the King can never be affected even by the creation of a Supreme Court in India, and it is proposed to provide for a certain class of appeals from the judgments of the Supreme Court to the Privy Council. The other objection that a suitable central place with a bar of adequate standing and standard is not easily available is more in the nature of an exaggeration. If the proposed Supreme Court were to be located in Calcutta, this difficulty will be at once perceived to be imaginary. Lastly, the paucity of legal talent in India for the recruitment of Judges to the Supreme Court which is put forth as an argument against the proposal is a myth, as shown by the records of achievement of eminent Indian Judges and Lawyers. It is true that the Legislative Assembly has twice vetoed the proposal, but that was brought about by the mischievous policy and tactics pursued by the Swarajists which have been severely condemned in the country. Indeed, the constitution of a Supreme Court in India will bring home to the vast majority of the people some of the highest benefits of British Rule, and will knock away a deal from the bottom of the agitation for absolute independence. The proposed Supreme Court should consist of a Chief Justice and such number of other judges—not less than two—as the Indian Legislature may provide. These Justices should be appointed by the King, and shall not be removed from office except on a joint address of both Houses of the Indian Legislature praying for their removal on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity. They shall receive such remuneration and pension as may be provided for by Parliament in the Government of India Act. Every person appointed Justice of the Supreme Court must have served by the date of his appointment as a Judge of any of the High Courts in British India or any other Court of similar grade and status in the United Kingdom or in any of His Majesty's other Dominions. It is proposed that the Supreme Court should be vested with no original jurisdiction so long as the Government of India remains unitary. Appeal should lie to it in civil matters both on questions of law and fact from the High Courts in all suits or proceedings of the value of Rs10,000 or upwards. There should be no further appeal to the Privy Council from the decisions of the Supreme Court on facts. But in cases involving substantial questions of constitutional law or public interest. or in cases of value of one lakh of rupees or upwards, an appeal should lie to the Privy Council, provided the Supreme Court certifies that the particular case is a fit and proper one for the purpose. In criminal matters the Supreme Court should be invested with appellate jurisdiction in a certain class of cases involving extreme penalty of the law.

PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

12. As regards the Provincial Governments, dyarchy should be allowed to continue during the ensuing stage as being the only alternative to the grant of full responsible government, for which, as has already been stated, conditions are not yet fully ripe. Much undeserved opprobrium has been heaped upon this system of duality of responsibility and control, which has been due mostly to ignorance and prejudice. As has been already set out at length, dyarchy was ushered into existence, when the general aspect of things was most unfavourable, and had to pass through a most precarious infancy. It may be safely asserted that nowhere has the system been given the full and fair trial which is its due—though condemnation of it has proceeded from all points of the compass. In the Punjab and Madras, where some honest endeavour has been made at working the system in the spirit in which it had been intended, remarkable results have been attained to the lasting benefit of the people. In the Punjab it is stated that, within three years of its introduction, there has been an increase of forty-seven per cent. in the number of boys and girls attending schools. There is again nothing inherently unworkable about the system at all, as has been so generally the complaint. The two clogs in the way of its successful working have been want of funds and the difficulty in adjusting the relationships between the Ministers and their permanent subordinates of the Indian Civil Service. These obstacles are by no means insurmountable, and by providing adequate safeguards and checks they can be easily got round. Indeed, dyarchy seems to be the only device by which to tide over the period of transition in the evolution of India's polity. But dyarchy, in order that it might satisfy Indian aspirations and function without friction, must undergo radical alterations in its present form. This means, first and foremost, that control that is now exercised from above should be largely relaxed and several subjects, which are now classed as "reserved," should be made over to the "transferred" side. The portfolio of law, justice and police, must remain "reserved" till communal consciousness on the part of the people has completely spent itself, and till informed and organised public opinion has come definitely into existence so as to prevent any abuse of the large powers which this portfolio confers. Similarly must be kept "reserved" the revenue portfolio, which otherwise would lead to abuse of power and patronage in the hands of popularly elected Ministers who—till parties are formed on firmer foundations and party organisations consolidated—will continue to be largely amenable to the wire-pulling of the election agent in the district. Finance should be bodily made over to popular control, as also the other subjects now administered by the Home, Law and the Revenue Members. The expenditure required for the due administration of the subjects which will be "reserved" must, as at present, constitute the first charge on the revenues of the Provincial Government, and it will not depend on the vote of the Provincial Legislature. Fresh powers also must be vested in the Governor of the Province enabling him to sanction any extraordinary expenditure he might deem necessary for the due administration of the Reserved Departments. The subjects transferred to the popular control must be reshuffled and re-grouped on a more scientific principle and such anomalous combinations as education and excise, should not be permitted in the future. The relations between the Ministers and their permanent executive subordinates must be strictly defined—irrespective of the fact whether these subordinates happen to be of the Indian Civil Service or of any other Service—and subject to the limitations imposed by rules on either side, the Ministers should have complete control over the Departments under them. It should be made obligatory on the part of the Governors of the Provinces to hold generally consultations jointly with the Members of the Executive Council and the Ministers in relation to all matters concerning the Province that may come up for consideration by the Government, though, if the matter relates to Reserved subjects only, Executive Members of the Cabinet should have the right to vote and vice versa. Only in exceptional cases it should be open to the Governor to hold separate consultations, in which case he must have to record the special reasons in a minute-book separately maintained, a copy of which should be forwarded by him to the Secretary of State in Council. The Governor of the Province should appoint a Prime Minister, and the other Ministers shall be appointed by him on the advice of the Prime Minister. No person shall be eligible to hold office as Minister unless he is already an elected member of the Provincial Legislature or is elected as such within three months of the date of his appointment. The Ministers should be made to carry on their duties till their successors are appointed. Except for the above alterations proposed, the Provincial Executives must remain such as they are at present. As regards the Legislatures in the Provinces, their present constitution is satisfactory. The idea of establishing Second Chambers in the Provinces is not a happy one, having regard to the backward state of education and political experience among the people. Men of education and public spirit who can take an intelligent interest in the affairs of the country are now absorbed into the existing single-chambered legislature and the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State. There will be hardly available sufficient number of persons of light and learning in the districts—under the circumstances—who can constitute a second chamber consistent with the dignity and prestige of the institution. If, however, the idea would command general acceptance to have Second Chambers in the Provinces out of persons wholly nominated by the Governor among public men in the provinces, without necessarily having regard to the claims of each district to be represented, their creation would prove highly useful as providing a check on hasty action on the part of the popularly-elected Legislative Councils. There is a proposal in some quarters that the strength of the Provincial Legislative Councils should be increased. This does not appear to be at all necessary. On the other hand, the dangers of such an increase are likely to be that the body will become unwieldy for useful work, there will be a greater multiplicity of parties, and men of lesser calibre will come in and gain preponderance. The members of the Provincial Legislatures should continue to be partly elected and partly nominated in the present proportions. The proposal to do away with nomination is impracticable and unsound, as such a step will deprive backward communities and depressed classes in the Provinces altogether of their representation. Such a radical innovation will also deprive the members of the Reserved half of the minimum backing which is essential to them in the Legislatures. There should be no alterations in the powers and procedure in the Provincial Legislatures for the present except such as may be necessary in consequence of the proposed transfer of further subjects to popular control. The limitations to which the Acts of the Provincial Legislatures are subject at present should be maintained intact.

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

13. As regards the Government of India, considerable overhauling and reconstruction are necessary. The changes introduced into it by the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms have been great, but those changes have been defective in that they have afforded ample control over legislation and finance, and the fullest opportunities for criticising and acting as a check on the executive to the popular representatives, without making them realise the hard limitations imposed by actualities. Moreover, political aspirations of the educated and the intelligentsia has been raised to a high pitch, and these have got to be appeased. Inasmuch as, however, owing to the deplorable state of education and political experience among the people, grant of full responsible government at present is altogether out of the question, partial introduction of responsibility into the Government of India appears to be the only way out of the impasse. It is not intended to suggest any hard and fast division between the subjects that should be "reserved" and those that should be "transferred" to popular control. But the broad lines along which division should be effected may here be indicated. In the first place, Defence, External Relations, Relations with Native States, Political charges and Communications should remain unaffected. Similarly the subjects which might interfere with the maintenance by the Government of India of its external relations and relations with the Native States, such as Shipping, and Navigation, Commerce, Posts, Telegraphs, and Telephones, Customs, Cotton Excise duties, income tax, etc., should not be transferred. The subjects now constituting the portfolios of law and finance should also be reserved, as well as certain subjects whose administration by the Reserved half is desirable such as, All-India Services, Ecclesiastical Administration including Administration of European Cemeteries and Territorial changes, etc. The subjects that are proposed to be made over to popular control are only seventeen in number. They are:—(1) Development of Industries; (2) Trading companies and other associations; (3) Immovable property acquired by and maintained at the cost of the Governor-General; (4) Control of cultivation and manufacture of opium and sale of opium for export; (5) Stores and stationery, both imported and indigenous; (6) Control of mineral development; (7) Census and statistics; (8) Copyrights; (9) Inventions and designs; (10) Survey of India; (11) Geological survey; (12) Archeology; (13) Zoological survey; (14) Meteorology; (15) Botanical survey; (16) Mineral Development; (17) Central agencies and institutions for research (including observatories) and for professional or technical training or promotion of special studies. These subjects should be administered by the Governor-General acting on the advice of three Ministers. The Governor-General should appoint a Prime Minister and the other Ministers should be appointed by him on the advice of the Prime Minister. These Ministers should get the same pay and other remuneration as the Members of the Executive Council. No person shall hold office as Minister unless he is already a member of the Legislative Assembly, or is elected thereto within three months of the date of his appointment. The Ministers should be made responsible to the Legislative Assembly for the due administration of the subjects entrusted to their charge. In other respects, the same arrangements as have been made, or may be hereafter introduced, in regard to dyarchy in the Provinces, should be made to apply to the relationships between the Ministers, the Governor General and Members of the Executive Council respectively. This salutary change in the Government of India will wean away most of the All-India politicians from the fruitless path of irresponsible opposition and will have the effect of rendering them more sober and practical in their outlook and criticism as has been the case in the Provinces. It will also provide training to the people of the country in carrying on the administration of All-India matters which they will be one day be called upon to undertake. As regards the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State, there has been a proposal to effect an increase in their respective strengths. It is feared that the acceptance of this proposal will render these bodies unwieldy and will tend to impair its quality and efficiency. If, however, for any reason, any increase in the present strength of the Indian Legislature is deemed necessary, it should be done on the principle of one member for the Assembly for each District, and one representative to the Council of State for every two Districts. There should be, in such a case, a corresponding increase in the numbers of the nominated members, and members representing special interests respectively. Both the Council of State and the Legislative Assembly should consist of members partly elected and partly nominated. The powers and functions of both the chambers should remain the same as they are now except such increase in the power of the Legislative Assembly as may be necessary on account of a part of the executive being made responsible to its authority. As regards the election of the President of the Legislative Assembly, the amendment should be introduced that, if the Legislative Assembly presented an address to the Governor-General expressing its wish that a particular person should be its President after his election has been once disapproved of by the Governor-General, it shall be obligatory on the Governor-General to approve of the election of such person as the President of the Legislative Assembly. It should be provided with regard to the Council of State that its President should be elected by that House whose appointment should be subject to the approval of the Governor-General. The provision also may be made in the Act empowering the Governor-General to appoint from amongst the members of the Assembly, parliamentary secretaries who shall hold office during his pleasure, and discharge such duties in assisting the Ministers as may be assigned to them by the Governor-General, on the recommendations of the Prime Minister. These may be paid such salary or other remuneration as may be provided for them by the Legislative Assembly.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND THE COUNCIL OF INDIA.

14. The powers of the Secretary of State over the Provincial Governments and the Government of India should remain as they are, except such relaxation of control on his part as may be necessary consequent on the widening of popular control in the Provinces and the introduction of partial responsibility into the Government of India. It was at one time widely insisted on that the Council of India which has been attached to the Secretary of State should be abolished on the grounds that it was superfluous and often furnished perverse advice to him in important questions concerning India. Of late, however, the demand has not been so insistent. Apart from it, the retention of that body appears to be desirable in India's best interests —as it provides a Parliamentary Minister with informed opinion and advice without which he will have to depend more and more on the permanent officials of his department whose influence in the decisions of important questions concerning India cannot be expected to be, on the whole, wholesome. One minor improvement in this direction is necessary, and that is, the pay, other allowances and conditions of service in regard to the Indian Members should be made more satisfactory so that the appointments may prove more attractive in this country than at present.

ELECTORATES AND FRANCHISE.

15. There should be no separate electorates for Moslems, Sikhs, Parsis, Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians and Europeans or for any other community in future, and all communities must seek representation through a general electorate. But there should be provided reservation of seats for all these communities in the common electorate. Special electorates must continue as at present for the representation of particular interests, e.g., Landholders, Universities and the like. In the special constituencies the qualifications of the electors must be maintained as they are and no modification or enlargement in regard to them is necessary. In respect of the qualifications of the voters in the general electorate, for the Provincial Legislatures, several suggestions have been put forward. Universal adult suffrage is what should be kept in view, but the day when that goal will be attained is yet far off. It is proposed in certain quarters that literacy should be the sole qualification of the electors in the general electorate. This will confer franchise on 18.6 millions, that is, 11.2 millions more than the number now enjoying the privilege. But such a change in the present state of educational progress of the country will give undue preponderance to the people in Urban areas and will exclude from the electorate large classes of the population who have more substantial stake in the country, and otherwise quite competent to exercise the franchise. There has been a suggestion to reduce the property qualification for a voter, but that will bring into the electorate a large number of people who will be much more helpless in the hands of the landlord and the village moneylender. Till political experience has spread more widely and a regard created among the people for the responsibility and sacredness of the trust, the qualifications insisted on at present, on the whole, would appear to be satisfactory, and it is suggested that they should be retained. It has been proposed that the qualifications for being a voter for the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State elections should be the same as those obtaining in regard to the Provincial Legislatures. But, in view of the fact that the constituencies in the case of Legislative Assembly and the Council of State are necessarily much larger, it is submitted that higher qualifications should be insisted on, on the part of the electors for those bodies. There should, however, be effected a reduction in the amount of property qualification now required which will bring into the electorate a large number of persons without there resulting any corresponding disadvantage. As regards the qualifications of the candidates for the Provincial and Imperial Legislatures, no change in those now in vogue is necessary.

MADRAS.

23rd February, 1929.

PRESENT :

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE AND OF THE MADRAS PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the Madras Presidency Oriya Association, Berhampore (Ganjam).

The deputation consisted of :

Mr. BHUVANESWAR RUTH, B.A., B.L., Secretary.
Mr. BHAGIRATHI RATHO.

1. Major Attlee : How long has your Association been formed ?—(Mr. Ruth) : It was formed on the 15th May, 1927.

2. And what is its membership now ?—1,137.

3. Has it got branches ?—No.

4. I do not want to go in detail through the beginning of your Memorandum, which deals with general questions, nor do I want to go into the general questions of the Oriya-speaking people, because the Conference had a good deal about the general position in Bihar and Orissa. I want to deal with your special case in Ganjam. Will you please turn to page 240. Your general complaint is that whereas other linguistic groups have a majority, or a substantial minority, in at least one province, you are in a minority in all provinces ?—Yes. An insignificant minority in every province.

5. As regards this province, you state at the top of page 240 that "the Oriya language is not given "the currency which is its due, and Oriya litigants "and ryots are being placed at the mercy of middle-"men, as the language of the predominant community "which is prevalent is foreign to them." Is that so, because it has been pointed out by the Madras Government in 1904 that the 1901 census figures were unreliable because there were special privileges given to Oriyas, many Telegus declaring themselves to be Oriyas ?—That is not so. The fact is rather the other way. Owing to the manipulations, we might say, of the Telegu enumerators at the census in 1911, the Oriya population in the district was shown as having considerably decreased. That was also recognised in the census report of Madras, 1911.

6. It is claimed that one community manipulated the census in 1901 and the other community manipulated it in 1911 ?—It cannot be, because if the Commission will call for figures it will be seen that most of the enumerators in the district happened to be non-Oriyas both in the census operations of 1901 and 1911.

7. The other side state exactly the contrary. However, I turn to the next point. You say, a little lower down on page 240, "The economic well-"being of the Oriyas is altogether unattended to, "and the abounding forest and mineral resources "of the country lie unexplored." Is it not a fact that those mineral resources are mainly in the feudatory States of Orissa ?—Not exclusively.

8. Not exclusively, but mainly ?—It may be so, but also they are very largely in the Agency tracts of Ganjam and Vizagapatam which we claim as part of the Oriya country.

9. I want to call your attention to that. You say on the next page, page 241, "The Malayalees have "been concentrated all within the bounds of the "Madras Presidency. Sindh is exclusively under "Bombay. Similarly circumstanced are the Gujer-"atis. The Canarese population is divided only "between Bombay and Madras." As a matter of fact, they are divided between the Indian States and the provinces ?—We were not taking into consideration the Indian States. We had only in mind British India in making that statement.

10. But you are putting forward a claim on the basis of language. I am just pointing out to you the difficulty of a linguistic basis when the linguistic units are divided between Native States and British India ?—Yes, but if in British India any community is large enough to make a province, it should be given a province, apart from the question of some members of the community being within the Native States.

11. Then you trace the course of the Oriya movement, and then on page 242 you put forward proposals for the Oriya Province for the future, and you say that its nucleus would be formed by the five districts of Puri, Cuttack, Balasore, Sambalpore, and Angul, and then you add the whole of Ganjam district except the Revenue Taluq of Chicacole and the entire agency district of Vizagapatam. I will not deal with your other claims, because that is another matter we have to look into. If you include all the Ganjam country you are going to include a large number of Telugus, are you not ?—Yes, but in this connection we beg to point out to the Commission that the total population of Ganjam, including the Agency tracts of Ganjam, Vizagapatam and Godavari is 3,231,920 as per the 1921 census, of which the Telegu population is 1,132,140. The latter figure includes also the Telugu element in Chicacole Taluq in Ganjam, Gudam Taluq in Vizagapatam, and Godavari Agency area, which we do not claim.

12. We have the figures here for Ganjam (Vol. VI, page 7). It is 834,000 Telegu and 931,000 Oriya.—That classification does not take into account the Oriya and the Telugu elements in the Agency tracts. We wish to submit that no such differentiation can be made between the Agency portions and the other portions of the district.

13. It does not make much difference to the Oriyas, because that is the figure of the total Oriyas in Ganjam and the Agency tracts. In the Agency the Oriyas are 600,000, the Khonds 300,000, the Telugus nearly 300,000, and there are various other details. The broad fact is that you are not much more than half in the whole of that area ?—It is not so. Though the census figures show Oriyas proper as six lakhs and odd, the Khonds and Savaras are Oriya-assimilating, and most of them speak Oriya.

14. I know some Telugus speak Oriya, and some Oriyas speak Telugu, but you cannot claim them in exactly the same position as your Oriyas proper, can you ?—But that does not apply to the case of Oriyas (?Savaras) and Khonds, because they have no separate written language, and they have no distinct culture and civilisation of their own. They are assimilating not only to the Oriya language, but also the Oriya civilisation and culture.

15. You mean that they have a culture, but it is passing away in favour of Oriya ?—They have no culture at all.

16. They have got a language, have they not ? —They have got a language, but it is not sufficiently developed and useful, as will be seen from the fact that in all the Government schools in the Ganjam Agency and in the Vizagapatam Agency instruction is given to the aborigines only in Oriya.

17. It is rather a dangerous argument to use, is it not, because I notice you say that in the Bengal area Oriya is so near Bengali that the Oriyas are gradually being absorbed into Bengal. However, I will leave that point. You propose a Governor's Province ?—Yes, we claim a separate province.

18. I do not want to go into financial details, but the broad point is that, put at its best, there is not much balance in Orissa and Ganjam between revenue and expenditure ?—No, that is not so. In this connection I wish to take the Commission into a few details.

19. I do not think it is any good going into details here.—We wish respectfully to contradict that position, when it is said that the Oriya Province in the future will be a deficit province. We emphatically claim that it will be a surplus province.

20. Major Attlee : If you have to have a Governor, a council, a university and a High Court, you agree that the financial position will be difficult ? I think you admit that.

The Chairman : What is the page ?

21. Major Attlee : Page 242. That will be a very heavy burden, will it not ? I do not want to go into the detail of the financial position. You suggest that you might have an arrangement with the High Court of Judicature at Calcutta ?—Yes, for a time. If the finances of the province would not justify us in having a separate High Court of our own, we might be under the jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court, till we are better off.

22. The difficulty there is that in Ganjam you have a different land tenure, different customs ; and different laws have grown up there ?—That is not a difficulty at all. As it is, in the Madras Presidency we have so many systems of land tenure.

23. I do not think you have quite got my point. The High Court in Madras has to know all these systems, but if you suggest that you go on to the Bengal High Court, you are having people who are totally unaccustomed to those systems altogether ? —Orissa proper was for a long time under Bengal, and so as far as the main portion of the province is concerned there will be no difficulty at all. The only difficulty that can arise is in connection with the Madras parts. The Madras Estates Land Act is very largely modelled on the Bengal Tenancy Act, and we do not think there will be any great difficulty in that way.

24. Supposing you do not even get that, and you suggest a sub-province, can you give me your idea of what a sub-province would be ?—But before we venture to do so we may submit to the Commission that the idea of a sub-province, though it had not been discussed in detail in Orissa proper when we presented our Memorandum, has been subsequently discussed at very great length in the Oriya press and on the platform, and the evidence of the witnesses who appeared before the Commission at Patna, advocating the formation of a sub-province for the Oriyas, has not been generally approved of by the Oriya people, and the sub-province idea is now very unpopular. But if the choice is between half a loaf and no bread, we would rather prefer to have half the loaf than go without any bread at all.

25. I want to go into the composition of the half loaf. What is your conception of a sub-province ? —Our conception is very similar to that pointed out by Mr. Lionel Curtis in the scheme suggested by him on the eve of the Montford Reforms.

26. Could you state it, because we have not got it before us. Are you going to have a Lieutenant-Governor, or what ?—Our proposal is that the Oriya-speaking tracts under Madras, Bihar, Central Provinces and Bengal should be amalgamated, and out of these areas a sub-province should be constituted under one or other of the four provincial governments. For the other areas in the province we may have a sub-provincial-government, and over these two governments there will be a provincial government. We would propose that the reserved subjects, which cannot be transferred to the popular control, may be entrusted to the provincial government, but subjects which should be transferred to popular control be entrusted to the government of the Orissa sub-province and the other sub-provincial government respectively.

27. I want to know, what is the Orissa sub-province government ? What would it consist of ? —There should be a Governor with two or three ministers, and a legislative council.

28. Where is the saving as compared with a full province ?—It is generally put forward on the financial ground. The difference is that in certain matters of common interest, they will be administered by the government of the province as a whole, and only certain matters of local concern will be administered by the sub-provincial governments.

29. But from the point of view of expense, what would you say on that ?—From the point of view of expense the large schemes of development, which are of a provincial character, would be undertaken by the central provincial government, and minor schemes pertaining to the particular areas of the sub-province would be under the sub-provincial governments——

30. You have not quite got the point. I was pointing out the difficulty of having a Governor and sub-provincial legislatures in the province. You suggest that it should be much the same in a sub-province as in a province; but with regard to the cost of setting up this government, you do not seem to save anything by setting up a sub-province? —No exact estimation of income and expenditure of an Oriya Province out of the Oriya-speaking tracts has yet been arrived at, but we have been told that the Bihar Government has estimated the expenditure——

31. Sir Hari Singh Gour: That is not the question. The question is, what is the difference between the expenditure of a sub-province and that of an independent province?—The difference would be the cost of administering all the provincial subjects, minus the cost of administering the sub-provincial subjects.

32. No separate secretariat?—Yes, there would be a separate secretariat.

33. No separate governor, no separate ministers, no separate courts?—There would be a separate Deputy-Governor and ministers and separate secretaries, but they would be on a smaller scale.

34. Major Attlee: A cheaper Governor, and so on? —Yes, if we cannot afford the expense, the whole thing should be on a cheaper scale.

35. I do not think there are any other points in this that are not general questions. I would only ask you one other point. In uniting yourself to Orissa, you realise that Orissa is subject to very great dangers by flooding, and consequent famine after flood. Is not that so?—But I do not think you would make out of that an agreement against our amalgamation under a separate administration.

36. But is it so? Is Orissa subject to flood?— I think every province is subject to natural catastrophes. Even the other day down here we had one district subject to such floods.

37. Your answer is Yes, is it not? It is very subject to floods. Is it not proposed that you should have a rather large expenditure in order to save Orissa from flood?—Yes, there is now a scheme under consideration.

38. Would you suggest that that should be done by the Government of India, or that Orissa should do it under its own finances?—We think it should be done by the Government of India or by the Provincial Government, or that a temporary loan should be taken for that purpose.

39. You think you could pay for that temporary loan, pay interest on it?—We have to when we borrow money from others.

40. The point is as to whether Orissa as a financial unit is sufficient to stand by itself?—It can.

41. The Chairman: Supposing your idea of a sub-province, at any rate as a temporary measure, seemed the best idea, with what major province do you wish the sub-province to be associated?—The order of choice, we may respectfully point out, we have indicated in our Memorandum.

42. I see the arguments, and I have read the Memorandum, but I want to know what is the conclusion?—First and foremost we wish to be placed under Bihar and Orissa.

43. Mr. Cadogan: I want to refer to the section in your Memorandum headed "The special case of "the Oriyas" on page 239, in which you set out the poor condition of your peoples in various provinces. You will, I am sure, agree with me that you would only be able to justify amalgamation in the provinces in the sight of your peoples if it brought with it an improved material condition. What you are suggesting, as far as I can see, is the amalgamation, to use your own words, of "the poorest of peoples" among whom "famine and pestilence are chronic," and who are "in so illiterate and ignorant a condition "that they have been officially recognised as a "'backward community'". Well, what would the process be of amalgamating these things? To improve the lot of your peoples, your new government would be up against two very formidable problems, health and education. Then you refer a bit later to the financial side of the question as a "bogey." Taking into consideration the present condition of the Oriya-speaking peoples and what would have to be done in order that their lot should be improved, surely you could hardly refer to the financial question as a bogey? You cannot brush the whole financial question aside: you must agree it is a very serious problem indeed?—It is a very important consideration, though not the primary consideration in the matter.

44. This section on page 240 rather seems to infer that your people are not getting a fair deal. Take this sentence, for instance: "Their educational "needs and requirements have been administered to "with a most niggardly hand"; and then * * * * "Oriyas have been most sparsely "represented in the public services in every province". Are you suggesting that there is some prejudice against your people in this respect?—Not exactly prejudice. The people in whose hands the making of appointments lies belong to communities other than Oriyas, and it is very natural for them that they should fill in those vacancies by choosing men of their own communities, and not us.

45. Sir A. P. Patro: The Oriyas do not want a sub-province, do they?—I would not put it exactly like that. I would prefer to say that we want a separate province of our own, but if for financial reasons or other causes such a course is not feasible just at present, we would prefer a sub-province rather than be in the present position.

46. That is to say, the Oriyas want a separate province to be formed out of all the different parts that are scattered under various governments?— Yes.

47. And in your Memorandum you say that you prefer to have the sub-province tacked on to Madras, because it is a rich province, and you will be able to carry on the administration satisfactorily if the sub-province is to be formed?—Yes, that would be one very important consideration in our being tacked on to Madras, but we would prefer to be tacked on to Bihar and Orissa. Failing that, we should be tacked on to Madras.

48. Sir Hari Singh Gour: Has your Memorandum been presented to the Oriya Association?—Yes, it was submitted to a session of the Association.

49. And how many people were present there?— About 200 odd.

50. And they approved of it?—Yes.

51. As regards the constitution of a sub-province or of an independent province, you have looked at the question from the theoretical point of view, the point of view of sentiment of Oriya-speaking peoples, as is very natural indeed; but take the practical side of it. If your province costs something like 4 crores of rupees, and you make only in the neighbourhood of 2 crores of rupees, you go begging for the other 2 crores?—We would not say so. We would rather prefer to live within means than go begging of others.

52. But you cannot do that; that is exactly your trouble. You are too proud to beg, and too poor to exist?—The first part of your assumption may be true, but the second part is surely not.

53. That is the position?—No, it is not so.

54. In Madras they say, "We have our own commitments." They do not want to adopt you You go and beg next door. Bihar and Orissa will say, "It is a deficit province. It has a very inelastic income."—Yes. At present it has.

55. And a proportion of the elasticity is shared by your province?—Yes.

56. And there is the splitting up of your province into various tributary and feudatory states?—Yes.

57. Now you have an inelastic income, and Bihar and Orissa says, "We are poor people; we cannot afford to keep another poor kinsman of ours"; so Bihar and Orissa will not take you?—I beg your pardon. I cannot understand how Bihar can say that they cannot keep Orissa. It must be Bihar that must say so. Bihar and Orissa cannot say that.

58. Supposing Bihar says, "We are quite ready to get rid of you, but we are by no means prepared to receive you with all your encumbrances, and you are loading yourself and your incumbrances by taking odds and ends from the Central Provinces and Madras." That is what the Bihar and Orissa people say: "We are a deficit province; we just manage to exist, but we cannot have you with all your impediments, with all your belongings and additions." What have you got to say to Bihar?—Bihar has not said so.

59. I speak for Bihar and say so?—That impression seems to be, I would submit, not correct, for one reason, that in a debate held in the Legislative Assembly on 8th February, 1927, on a motion made by Mr. Nilakantha Das, the Bihar representative, Mr. Gayaprasad Singh, fought the whole battle with the Oriya member to have all the Oriya-speaking tracts under Bihar.

60. We always do that. We have done that consistently for nine years, so long that we have no responsibility.—Again, in 1921, a resolution was adopted in the Bihar Legislative Council agreeing to the adoption of all the Oriya-speaking peoples.

61. I agree with you on sentiment that you should be united under one province. The question on the theoretical ground we all admit. I want you to convince the Conference that you have got the ways and means, that it is a practical proposition?—Yes, that it is.

62. You must establish to the satisfaction of the Conference that it is a practical proposition within the next five or six years, or ten years, and I am simply drawing your attention to that.—What we wish to submit is that prima facie the burden of proving that we should be a deficit province should be on those who make that allegation against us. Our contention is that no figures of revenue and expenditure of the Oriya-speaking tracts have been arrived at, yet it is said we are a deficit province. We have enough evidence to show that we should not be a deficit province though we have not definite figures calculated in rupees, annas and pies.

63. You say on page 242 that "No exact estimates "of the revenues likely to accrue from the amal- "gamated Oriya-speaking tracts have been yet "made, nor have any authentic figures been arrived "at with regard to the expenditure which such an "amalgamation under a separate Government "will entail, on the lines of the simplified scheme "suggested above." Apart from the question whether your simplified scheme will work, as we will assume, will your province have the same administrative organisation as the neighbouring province?—Yes.

64. On that basis you have yourself admitted that you have not gone into the rough figures.—We have got rough figures. Subsequently we have worked them out.

65. You might get your representatives to interrogate the Government, and ask what would be the situation if the Oriya-speaking tracts were placed under one government, whether as a separate province or as a sub-province. That you have not done?—I cannot agree exactly that we have not done that, because only the other day we had elicited some figures about the revenue and expenditure of Ganjam from the Government of Madras, and more or less we have done so elsewhere also. But other means are available to us of estimating the revenue and expenditure of the future province.

66. As regards the formation of a sub-province, the Oriya people who came before the Bihar conference said they would consider the question and would submit a supplementary Memorandum. The suggestion given to them was that an Oriya Minister should be in charge of the Oriya tracts for the Oriya-speaking peoples. The Orissa representatives in the Legislative Council would form an Orissa Legislative Committee, who would deal with Orissa on the basis that it is a sub-province. In that way there would be administrative saving in the cost of the Legislative Council, the cost of the secretariat, the cost of the High Court and the cost of a separate establishment, like ministers and members, and so on. That was the suggestion made. What you have worked out here does not answer that suggestion at all?—That may be, but we consider that such an idea as you suggest is an unpractical idea.

67. Then there are two pages in your Memorandum which have greatly fascinated me, and that is in regard to the establishment of a Supreme Court in India?—Yes.

68. Has the establishment of the Supreme Court in India, which you mention on pages 244 the consensus of opinion of your Association?—Yes.

Memorandum submitted by Rao Sahib N. RAMAMURTI, Rtd. Deputy Collector and President, Ganjam Defence League, Berhampur, Ganjam Dt.

As it is stated in the Statesman of Calcutta that the report of Messrs. C. L. Philip and A. C. Duff on the proposed Excision of the Ganjam District from the Madras Presidency has been referred to the Government of Madras for opinion, I send herewith a copy of the Memorandum prepared by the Executive Committee of the Ganjam Defence League for consideration in arriving at the opinion called for by the Government of India. This Memorandum was prepared before the publication of the report of Messrs. C. L. Philip and A. C. Duff. The remarks made in the report in dealing with the tracts where the Telugus preponderate will strike every impartial reader as extraordinary. While the authors of the report admit the artificial nature of the Oriya movement so far as the masses are concerned, they apply different principles to the tracts where the Oriyas and Telugus are respectively in majority. Their statements that "comparatively few Oriyas (in the Parlakimedi Taluk) know Telugu, the language difficulty for them is, therefore, real. But very many of the Telugus know Oriya" are quite incorrect. In fact, they are the reverse of the truth. On the other hand, in the southern part of the District including the Parlakimedi taluk, the Oriyas, as a rule, know Telugu, while the Telugus, as a rule do not know Oriya. I request that the correctness of this statement may be verified by a reference to the District authorities. The Collector of Ganjam reported to the Government in his letter, R. Dis., No. 9112/21, dated 15/11/21, that "the Oriyas in these Estates "(Parlakimedi, Tekkali, Tarla, Mandasa, Jalantra "and Budarasingi), practically all know Telugu well." Messrs. C. L. Philip and A. C. Duff, while stating in paragraph 11 of their report that they have "consistently avoided the expression of any opinion "regarding the feasibility or desirability of amal- "gamation," go out of their way and state as follows in paragraph 6 of their report and support the statement by most astounding assertations: "In "fine, if the major portion of Ganjam including most "of the Zamindary areas is taken from Madras it is "only natural that the Parlakimedi Estate should "go with the majority, and we cannot find that "the Telugu inhabitants anticipate much in[illegible] "venience from the possible change." The T[illegible] of this District protest against this vie[illegible] far as the masses are concerned, the Tel[illegible] Ganjam are not "more intelligent, more pu[illegible] "and better cultivators, more capable of adapting "themselves to possible changes" than the Oriyas.

MEMORANDUM.

RE-BIFURCATION OF GANJAM DISTRICT.

I. HISTORY OF THE ORIYA MOVEMENT.

It is not due to any instance of administrative ineptitude or inefficiency, any miscarriage of justice, any social or economic disaster or hardship, or any kind of failure under the Madras Government that the Oriya leaders of Ganjam are agitating for its excision from the Madras Presidency. The idea is foreign in its inception. In the old days the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal governed not only the whole of Bengal but also Assam, Bihar, Chota Nagpur and Orissa. Owing to its enormous charge, the Bengal Government could not cope efficiently with the great famine in Orissa in 1866 when half a million of people perished. Then the Secretary of State suggested the advisability of relieving the Bengal Government by separating Assam and Orissa. Ten years later, the idea of uniting all the Oriya tracts under one administration struck the leaders of Orissa. It took 25 years longer before this idea penetrated into Ganjam. It was there engineered by persons who came from Cuttack. One Mr. Nalamoni Vidya Ratno of Cuttack, started an Oriya weekly at Rambha and propagated the idea. The incorrect language census statistics of 1901 which will be discussed presently, gave impetus to the movement and a petition was presented to the Government of India in 1903. It was on the strength of the incorrect statistics of 1901 that the Government of India made a reference to the Government of Madras in December, 1903. In 1904 the Government of Madras strongly protested against the proposal which was dropped by the Government of India. On 30th December, 1903, the Congress also passed a resolution deprecating the separation of the District of Ganjam and the Agency Tracts of Ganjam and Vizagapatam from the Madras Presidency on the ground that long standing territorial divisions which were closely united by ethnological, legislative, social and administrative relations should not be broken up. In 1912 the Oriya leaders renewed the agitation after the annulment of the partition of Bengal and the creation of the province of Bihar and Orissa. Lord Hardinge declared that the proposed union of Ganjam with Orissa was "unnecessary and undesirable." The Oriyas approached Sir Arthur Lawley and Lords Carmichael and Pentland and were informed that the question would not be re-opened. When Mr. Montagu visited India, in 1918, they presented a memorial quoting the statistics of 1901 census and ignoring those of 1911. It is said that the report of Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford on the Indian Constitutional Reforms favours the redistribution of Provinces on a linguistic basis, but we find nothing in it in support of this view. In paragraphs 245 and 246, the distinguished authors discuss the proposal that existing Provinces should be sub-divided into a limited number of smaller areas on a linguistic or racial basis. Even with regard to this limited proposal, they state as follows:—"In [illegible]f the evidence which has [illegible]stence in parts of India of [illegible]nities which are anxious [illegible]r administrative units of [illegible], we feel sure that any [illegible]hical partition would [illegible]n as would be fatal [illegible]cally speaking, we may "describe provincial patriotism as sensitively zealous "of its territorial integrity. Divisions of territory "which are not made in response to a popular demand "are apt to provoke wide and deep-seated dis- "satisfaction." Even their expression as to the consideration of the possibility of instituting sub-provinces in Orissa and Bihar relates to the existing province as it is. The authors have not at all taken into consideration the position of a District like Ganjam in relation to the constitution of a sub-province. Even for the constitution of sub-provinces there must be a popular demand. It must be by a process of consent necessarily by all classes of people affected and must not be imposed on the people by official action. If a considerable proportion or even a strong minority is against the proposal, it cannot be said that there is a popular demand.

2. SCOPE OF THE PRESENT ENQUIRY OF MESSRS. PHILIP & DUFF.

Though the proposal to separate Ganjam from the Madras Presidency was discussed and negatived on several occasions, it was apparently re-opened in the latter part of the last year and a committee consisting of Messrs. Philip and Duff was appointed to ascertain the genuine desire of the Oriyas of the District on the subject. The enquiry was limited and one-sided in its scope. From the communiques issued on the subject we were given to understand that the Telugus and other communities had no part or lot in the enquiry. Consequently, the Andhras avoided any counter deputations and demonstrations which might embarrass the committee and might strain the cordial relations existing between the two communities. The Ganjam Defence League, an association working with the avowed object of opposing the transfer of Ganjam from the Madras Presidency, thought it advisable not to present any considered memorandum on its behalf. The Oriya leaders organised meetings, processions and other demonstrations and tried to show to the Committee as if they emanated from the people, while the real truth is that the masses are either indifferent or averse to the proposed transfer. In any case, no action can be taken on the report of the Committee without giving the Telugus and other communities an opportunity to state their case.

III. CENSUS STATISTICS.

Whenever the Oriya leaders speak or write about this subject, they ignore the available Census Statistics of population by race and caste and even with regard to language, they quote the Census figures of 1901 ignoring those of the later Censuses of 1911 and 1921 ; and by their speeches and writings, they try to mislead the authorities and the general public who have no time to study the census reports into the erroneous belief that Ganjam, with the exception of the southernmost Taluk of Chicacole, is Oriya country. A careful enquiry will, however, show that Telugus who live in all parts of the District, far exceed the Oriyas. The following statement shows the total population and the number of Oriya speaking people of the Ganjam District (plains) according to the last five censuses :—

Year	Total population	Number of Oriya speaking people.	Percentage of Oriyas to the total population
1891	1,589,477	797
1901	1,689,142	1,27
1911	1,870,823	9
1921	1,835,562

A glance at the above figures will at once show that the number of Oriya-speaking people returned in 1901 is extraordinary as compared with the figures returned at the two earlier and at the two later censuses ; and it was on the strength of this extraordinary figure that the Government of India started their enquiry, in 1903. Commenting on the incorrectness of the "language" figures of 1901 census, the Government of Madras reported in 1904 as follows :—"The first cause of the inaccuracy of the Census Statistics is the desire of the Telugus to share in the special advantages accorded by Government to Oriyas. The school fees charged for the education of the children of the Oriyas are half of those paid by Telugus and others. As the Government desire to employ Oriyas in the public offices to a greater extent than at present, it is thus believed to be easier for an Oriya than for a Telugu to enter the services of the Government. The second cause is that, as most of the enumerators in 1901 were Oriyas, it is probable that they entered as "Oriya-speaking" all persons who answered their questions in Oriya. This error would have a great effect, as, in tracts where there are both Oriyas and Telugus, a large proportion of the population can speak both languages. Thirdly, several Telugu castes, such as kapus, komatis, kalingis, reddikis, etc., who live in tracts where Oriya is the prevailing language, and speak Oriya as well as their mother tongue Telugu, were probably entered as speaking the Oriya language, the enumerators making no enquiries as to the language spoken by them at home. An example of this was noticed before the Census report was published. The Deputy Superintendent of Census Operations, Berhampore, states that at the time of tabulation he found that a large number of Reddikas (a Telugu caste which finds no place in Table XIII Castes) had been returned by the enumerators as speaking Oriya. As, to his own knowledge, this was contrary to the facts, he made a reference to the Provincial Census Superintendent, who issued orders for the tabulation to proceed in accordance with the Schedules. The Collector of Ganjam reports that there is reason to believe that the movement in favour of the proposed transfer was on foot in a quiet way before the last census, and thus may have influenced some of the Oriya enumerators in entering in the returns particulars of the parent tongue. In a tract where Oriya and Telugu are widely spoken, it is natural to expect that the mother tongue of the Oriya castes will be Oriya, and that of Telugu castes will be Telugu. The statistics showing the distribution of the population by castes should, therefore, furnish some indication of the prevalence of the two languages. On examining these statistics, it is found that 63,034 Pallis, who speak Telugu and reside on the coast, have been treated as Tamils by caste. Adding these to the recorded population of Telugu caste we find that the number of Telugus by race in 1901, including the Telugu-speaking Pallis was 818,417, and the number of Oriyas was 766,712. The inference from these figures is that Telugu should be more prevailing in the Ganjam District as a parent tongue than Oriya." The Census reports of 1881 and 1891 do not show the population of the District according to race and caste. They were shown for the first time in the Census report of 1901. According to this report, the actual figures are noted below :—

Year.	No. of persons according to race and caste.
	Telugus.	Oriyas.
.. .. ..	755,383	766,712

Census figures of 1911 and 1921 do not include castes which contribute less than one per cent. of the population. They are, however, approximate enough for purposes of comparison. These figures are quoted below :—

Year.	No. of persons according to race and caste.
	Telugus.	Oriyas.
1911	842,415	475,729
1921	844,620	405,996

From the above figures it is clear that the Telugus in the District number about double the Oriyas. It is further believed that, in the northern parts of the District, Kalingas, Komatis, Velamas, Kapus, Kalingis, Reddikis, etc., who are really Telugus have been returned as Oriyas. In his report on the Census of 1901, Mr. Stuart states as follows :—"In the matter of affording information as to the nationality of the people, the language returns are as a rule inferior to the caste and birthplace statistics, for a man drops the language of his mother country more easily than he loses his nationality." We beg to submit that in deciding the proper locale of a people, the race they belong to is more important than the language they talk. The latter is an accident; it may change under changed circumstances. The former is a vital and essential matter of blood, tradition, and custom, and cannot be adopted or discarded at will. One may repudiate his language, but not his birth. Hence the argument in favour of race should prevail over that of language.

4. HISTORICAL CONSIDERATIONS.

The Northern Circars came under the British rule in 1766, while Orissa was under the Mahratta rule and did not come under the British sway until 1803. The Ganjam District was a part of the Northern Circars throughout the British rule and prior to 1766, under the short-lived French rule as well as under the Muhammadan rule. Ganjam was a part of the Chicacole Circars and was controlled by Mussulman authority from Hyderabad for about one hundred and eighty years, from about 1571 to 1753, when the Chicacole Circar, with the other districts of the Northern Circars, were granted to the French by Salabut Jang, the same Nizam who ceded this country to the English six years later, though they did not take actual possession of it for seven years longer. It will thus be seen that Ganjam has for at least three centuries and a half been an organic or integral part of the Northern Circars. Any disturbance of the prescription of such a long period will be keenly felt by us. Even under the Hindu rule, Orissa and Ganjam appear to have been separate entities, though the demarcation of provinces was not then so distinct as it was since the advent of the Muhammadan rule. Orissa and Ganjam formed parts of the ancient kingdom of Kalinga and subsequently of the dominions of the Kesari and Gajapati lines of Kings as they do now of British India. The mountain spurs which run down to the sea on the south of the Chilka lake have always formed a well-defined natural boundary between Orissa and Ganjam. Hunter states on page 172 of his Orissa, Vol. I :—" The native Government of Orissa practically acknowledged the natural boundary as the political one, treating as foreigners all devotees who came from the southern side of the Ganjam river, levying a ten per cent. higher tax from them. This distinction found legislative recognition in our earliest Pilgrim Law, three years after the country had passed under British rule." It will also be seen from pages 317–319 of Hunter's Orissa, Vol. I, that under the Gajapati Dynasty (1132 to 1532 A.D.) the country south of Chilka formed a separate division distinct from Orissa and that this southern division refused to pay tribute and that the administration of the Ganjetic line continued to be merely nominal over it. The following reference also appears on page 997 of Maltby's District Manual of Ganjam :—" The wild nature of the country in Ganjam rendered their administration however merely nominal, and they were probably induced by these considerations to establish their own servants as Rajas or Lords of the Marches to keep the wild aboriginal tribes of Khonds and Savaras in check." In the above circumstances, expressions such as " Dismemberment of Orissa," " A limb separated from the body," " Re-union of Ganjam with Orissa," and the assertion that Ganjam is the native home of Oriyas and Telugus are domiciled settlers, are opposed to historical facts. No Oriya has been able to state when, how and by whom Ganjam was separated from Orissa.

5. ADMINISTRATIVE AND LEGAL DIFFICULTIES.

If the suggested change be carried out the law of personal rights, the common law of land tenures the enactments relating to the rights of Zamindars, Jaghirdars, Shrotriemdars, Proprietors, Ryotwari pattadars, Inamdars and Tenants, the laws relating to rent and revenue, all other special and local laws enacted by the Madras Government with special reference to local conditions and habits of the people living in this Presidency, including Ganjam, the methods of administration to some extent and many other matters specially suited to the localities, will have to be dislocated. Again, the common and cutomary law of land tenures obtaining in Orissa differs from that obtaining in Ganjam. The Ryotwari system of Ganjam requires a special knowledge of the regulations relating to remission, irrigation, the village system, and other matters closely touching the daily life of the ryot. If the system is to be administered to the contentment of the people, it must be by officers imbued with its principles and trained throughout their service in its methods. The form of temporary settlements prevailing in Orissa is unknown in Madras. The Revenue and Rent Recovery Acts of Orissa and Madras vary. Acts relating to the administration of Municipalities and District Boards are different, as also those relating to hereditary village servants, the land cess and water cess, etc. What is more, Ganjam with its peculiar laws and customs would form but a small proportion of the Province of Bihar and Orissa, and for the administration of this small area the officers of that Province would have to acquire a special knowledge of the laws and customs and would, in any case, lack that practical experience which is required for their proper administration. Further, there is the danger of the laws, etc., becoming stereotyped unless the modifications introduced from time to time by the Madras Legislature, as also the bye-laws, circular orders, etc., be also extended to Ganjam as they are made. This would in effect mean administration of Ganjam by Bihar and Orissa second-hand through Madras. If, again, such new measures or modifications do not commend themselves to the Government of Bihar and Orissa, they will have to enact such modifications as in their opinion are necessary in the interests of Ganjam for the efficient administration of which they will be responsible, and this would again add to the labours of the Government of Bihar and Orissa. The large number of Telugus throughout the tract and the fact that the bulk of the Government records have been kept in Telugu will render it essential for the officers employed to acquire a knowledge of Telugu, which is far more difficult to learn than Oriya.

6. IMPRACTICABILITY OF AMALGAMATION.

Some of us do not know how the redistribution of India into Provinces on a linguistic basis would help to unify India or to consolidate its people into one great nation. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that such a redistribution will bring about the prosperity, contentment, and happiness of the people, no case can be made out for the proposed transfer of the Ganjam District to an Oriya Province. It is said that overwhelming majorities shall be the chief criterion, but bare majorities should yield to administrative convenience. So far as Ganjam District is concerned, the Telugus are in a majority. With regard to the occupation of territory, the whole length of the 100 miles of the sea coast is inhabited by the Telugus, and the hills and slopes are occupied by Khonds and Savaras, who, in common with the Telugus, are of the Dravidian (Turanian) stock. The tract of the country between is Oriya to the extreme north, mixed at the middle, and Telugu to the south. As for the languages, the Oriyas residing in parts of the District like Parlakimedi, Tekkali and Sompeta Taluks, speak both Oriya and Telugu, while the Telugus that live in parts of the District like Goomsur, Purushottapur, Aska and Surada, speak both the languages. In fact, the intermingling of the races has advanced so far that one not only has been speaking the language of the other but has also adopted the habits, customs, and manners of the other. Thus, the division of Ganjam on the basis of race or language presents insurmountable difficulties. Again, if Taluks are taken into consideration, the Telugus are in a great majority in the Taluks of Parlakimedi, Tekkali and Sompeta, while it is understood that many Zamindars and other Oriyas have consented to the proposed transfer under the influence of the Raja of Kanika and other leaders of Orissa on the assumption that the whole of the District, with the single exception of Chicacole Taluk, will be transferred to Orissa. Again, between the Rushikulya and Bahuda rivers, Telugus are in a majority in the towns of Berhampur, Ichchhapuram, Chatrapur and Gopalpur. The Telugus have developed these four towns to their present importance, have sunk much capital, and have the largest stake in them. If a referendum be made to the residents of these four towns to ascertain their wishes, it is certain that the residents will, by an overwhelming majority, vote against amalgamation with Orissa. Again, more than half the estates owned by the Oriya Zamindars and Proprietors are mostly peopled by the Telugus. The Maharajahs of Vizianagaram and Bobbili, and the Rani of Wadhwan of the Vizagapatam District possess large landed estates in this district. Besides, there are other Telugu landed proprietors even in the northern part of the district. In this part of the district, which lies to the north of the Rushikulya, Telugu communities, like the military class of Telagas, the mercantile class of Kalinga, Komatis, etc., have large vested interests. In these parts there are a large number of villages containing a fairly good proportion of Telugus. The Government of Madras spent about 50 lakhs of rupees on the Rushikulya project. The project has not hitherto been a paying concern, and it would be a calamity to allow it to pass to another Government when several improvements are contemplated and it is likely to prove remunerative on the completion of these improvements. If the proposed change be carried into effect, Ganjam will have to be split up into two portions, one under the Madras Government and the other under the Government of Bihar and Orissa and the effect of this will be to efface altogether memories and even the name of a district which was lovingly cherished by the people for a long time. Such a transfer will entail a charge in the locales of official and business centres of the district causing immense loss in a variety of ways.

7. TRANSFER NOT BENEFICIAL TO ORIYAS.

Orissa is, admittedly, a very poor country. It is subject to frequent visitations of famines and floods. Union of Ganjam with such a poor country is not likely to prove beneficial to the Oriyas or other communities inhabiting the district. The contemplated improvements to the Rushikulya project may not be executed for a long time. The Government of Madras have always evinced special interest in the solution of the Oriya problem by the adoption of liberal measures, such as charging only half fees in schools and colleges, instituting scholarships for the special benefit of the Oriyas, and preferring the Oriyas in the distribution of official patronage. In the last generation they have made rapid strides in their education in English and vernacular and in their representation in public services and local boards and councils. The fact that Oriya language was recognised by the University of Madras as long ago as 1873, while the University of Calcutta ignored it until 1903, shows the interest taken by the Madras authorities in the progress of Oriyas. Between the year 1906–07 and 1922–23 the number of schoolboys reading Oriya in the Madras Presidency rose from 32,715 in 1906–07, to 66,714 in 1922–23. In 1890, there were only two Oriya officials, the Oriya Translator and the Khond Interpreter. Now, nearly half of the office staff is manned by Oriyas. Within the last decade they have risen to the posts of Deputy Collector, District Munsiff, District Educational Officer, District Health Officer and other positions of trust and responsibility. Two of the three elected members from the district in the Provincial Legislative Council are Oriyas. If the district be transferred to Orissa, the Oriyas of the district will lose the special concessions they now enjoy under the Madras Government, as their distinction would be lost among the rest of the Oriya population and they would not have that incentive and facilities for availing themselves of the higher education which they now have. The ryots of all communities are likely to lose in course of time the occupancy rights which have been secured to them by the Madras Estates Land Act 1, of 1908.

8. TRANSFER HIGHLY INJURIOUS TO OTHER COMMUNITIES.

For the proper administration of a country, the Government should possess a special knowledge of its people; their language, customs and manners. Whereas the Madras Government has grown used to the administration of the Oriyas, the Government of Bihar and Orissa possess no knowledge of the Telugus who will be completely out of their element in that Province, and it is not likely that their language will be recognised by that Government. The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal opposed the transfer of Ganjam, in 1904, on the ground that the necessity of administering to the interests of the large population of Telugus in the district would give rise to immense difficulties under a new Government. The Oriyas number 15,73,942 in the Madras Presidency. Their language is recognised in courts and other public offices and in the daily traffic of social and commercial life. They, their rulers, and their neighbours have known one another for centuries. If in these circumstances the Oriyas consider themselves to be a foreign unit and a neglected body, it is not difficult to forecast the fate of the little less than one million of Telegus of Ganjam and the Vizagapatam agency if they be transferred to Bihar and Orissa, where they will, in point of numbers, be scarcely appreciable amongst the millions of the Bihar and Orissa population. We beg to submit that it could never be the wish or intention of the Government of India to inflict such a serious injury on their Telugu subjects, who have as counsellors, as Civil Servants, and as soldiers rendered loyal and conspicuous service to Government in this very district, and have helped not a little in the arduous labours by which the Madras Government have evolved order and law out of the state of lawless disorder in which Ganjam was handed to the British Power. Telugu is universally spoken along the littoral, and the chief trade and commerce of the district is carried on by Telugu-speaking people. The traders and merchants who visit the hill tracts are mostly Telugus by caste. Most of the trade from Aska and Goomsur side is to Vizianagram, Vizagapatam and other places in the Northern Circars; and in view of the opening of the Vizagapatam harbour, the transfer of any portion of the district will seriously jeopardise the commercial and industrial interests of the district as a whole. The important silk cloth industry of the district is in the hands of the Telugu weavers. A Medical College and an Engineering College have been established at Vizagapatam. An Andhra University, also, will be established soon. The Telugus of the district cannot take advantage of these institutions if the district be transferred. If the district be tacked on to a poor province, it will suffer much by way of paucity of funds for the improvement of the communications in the district, for the spread of education amongst the masses, for improving the sanitation in rural areas and for providing more irrigational facilities.

9. CONCLUSION.

We have not touched the question of the Agency, as the Government of Madras gave several weighty reasons in their report of 1904 as to why the Agency should not be transferred, and it is difficult to add to them. Oriyas and Telugus have been living together amicably for centuries, maintaining most cordial relations, and a bifurcation of the district will intensify the dissensions, disputes, and bickerings which the present agitation has introduced, and will stimulate similar agitations in several parts of India. We humbly submit that no disturbance of the status quo is warranted by historical, administrative and other considerations and that any change in the existing order of things is fraught with serious difficulties for the administrators and is disadvantageous to the people, and that it will provoke wide and deep-seated dissatisfaction and discontent leading to prolonged, continuous and much stronger agitation from the other communities, who are considerable in numbers, who have large and varied vested interests and who have greatly helped in the all-sided development of the district.

Deputation from the Ganjam Defence League.

The deputation consisted of :—

Rao Sahib N. RAMAMURTI NAYUDU, B.A., Retired Deputy Collector and Landholder.
Rao Sahib M. V. APPARAO PANTULU, Retired Extra Assistant Registrar, Co-operative Credit Societies and Landholder.
Mr. G. V. KRISHNAMURTI PANTULU, B.A., M.L., High Court Vakil and Landholder.

The Chairman : We understand you represent the Ganjam Defence League. * * * I am going to ask my colleague, Major Attlee, to put a few questions to you.

69. Major Attlee : When was the Ganjam Defence League started ?—(Rao Sahib Ramamurti Nayudu) About 1903 or 1904.

70. When first you thought there was an agitation for the Oriya movement ?—Yes.

71. Can you tell me how many members you have ?—About three or four hundred members. It has branches throughout the district.

72. Are they drawn mainly from the northern area of Ganjam ? Where are your branches, for instance ? Your headquarters are at Berhampore ? —Yes.

73. Where are the branches ?—(1) Sompeta, (2) Baruva, (3) Ichchhapuram, (4) Chakapur, (5) Aska, (6) Russellkonda. And after the recent Duff agitation, even (7) Parlakimedi and (8) Tekkali have joined. They never expected that their case would come under review.

74. You make the point first of all, I think, that the Philip-Duff Report was one to consider the views of the Oriyas, and that the views of the Telugus did not come before them ?—The Philip-Duff Committee was appointed in order to find out whether the Oriyas had a genuine desire for the amalgamation of Ganjam with Orissa. The Telugus were not heard, and Messrs. Philip and Duff said they were not going to hear the Telugus, though, afterwards, it seems that they did hear some Telugus. The Ganjam Defence League did not appear before the Philip and Duff Committee. They state in their Report : " We have ourselves consistently avoided " the expression of any opinion regarding the feasi- " bility or desirability of amalgamation of Ganjam " with Orissa." However, they made some side remarks about the Telugu tracts which were quite unwarranted and extraordinary.

75. We have got that further on ?—I base myself on the census figures. If you will allow me to speak I will do so.

76. I was going to take you shortly through these points. I will take the first point first, if I may. There is a question which you raise with regard to how far the people are bi-lingual. You say in the southern part of the district the Oriyas do know Telugu ?—Yes. In the northern part, the Telugus do know Oriya for the most part.

77. And the Oriyas know Telugu ?—In the northern part the Telugus know Oriya for the most part, and in the southern part the Oriyas know Telugu well.

78. You have a statement at page 251, I see, in which it is said that the Parlakimedi Estate should go with the majority ?—Certainly. Its Oriya population is only 18 per cent. My contention is that race and caste form a more important factor than language. A person may discard his language, but he cannot discard his race and caste, and I am going to show from census statistics that the Telugus are about double the Oriyas in the Ganjam district.

79. We have got that figure. I am coming to that point.—I have got extra figures than those given in the Memorandum. That was prepared long ago.

80. I am taking the language question first. On that question of language, you say that the census statistics of 1901 were incorrect ?—Incorrect ; that is clear.

81. The Oriyas say that the later statistics were incorrect ?—I will give my reasons for that.

82. What are the reasons ?—Of course, the census statistics of 1901 showed that 75 per cent. of the population were Oriya-speaking. The previous two censuses of 1881 and 1891 showed about 50 per cent. Oriyas and 50 per cent. Telugus. Even the census figures of 1901 showed that the Telugus and Oriyas were about half and half, but there is one mistake. 63,034 Telugu Pallis were returned wrongly as Tamils. If you add these 63,034, the Telugus numbered 818,417, as against 766,712 Oriyas. I have a statement showing the figures of Telugu and Oriya population according to the last five census returns——

83. I do not think it is any good our trying to thrash out detailed figures here. We have got the general picture. It does not matter whether it sways a little one way or the other, but in the whole of Ganjam you might say that they vary round half and half. One side says it is more the one way, and the other side says it is more the other way.—I say that the Telugus number double the Oriyas in 1911 and 1921.

84. That is not the figure we have got here ?—I have got the figure.

85. We have a census figure here which shows the total population 1,835,000 ; number of Oriya-speaking people, 931,000 ; and you say Telugus 834,000 odd, Oriyas 405,000 odd. That adds up to 1,200,000. What has become of the odd 600,000 that disappears ?—That is the population of castes, which are less than one per cent of the population. For the purposes of comparison there are excluded, both from Telugus and Oriyas, castes of persons who number less than one per mille. Even Mr. Molony in his census report says that Telugu castes in 1911 were 473 per 1,000 of the population, and Oriya castes 262 per 1,000.

86. The question I am asking you is this. The two figures you have given me amount to just over 1,200,000. The total population is, you say, rather over 1,800,000. What has become of the 600,000 ? —They are Mussulmans and Tamils, and castes which number less than one per mille of the population excluded from these figures.

87. The census figure is 931,000 Oriya speakers for 1921 ?—Yes.

88. You say there are only 405,000 Oriyas ?—That is language. This is on account of race or caste.

89. Is your point that there are 500,000 Oriyaspeaking people who, although they speak Oriya, are not Oriyas by caste ?—Yes. They include also castes which are less than one per mille of the population, besides Tamils, Mussulmans and Animists who live in the plains.

90. You want to make caste the distinction and not language ?—Yes. Mr. Stuart says, on page 97 of his Report, paragraph 22 : "In the matter of "affording information as to the nationality of the "people, the language returns are, as a rule, inferior "to the caste and birth-place statistics, for a man "drops the language of his mother country more "easily than he loses his nationality." Race and caste are more important than language in determining a question of this nature.

91. You have given me Telugu castes 840,000 ; Oriya castes 405,000. What castes are the odd 500,000, these elusive people ?—I have already answered this question.

92. But who are they ? They are not Telugu castes ; they are not Oriya castes ?—As I have already told you, they may be Moslems, Tamils, Animists, and also Telugu and Oriya castes who number less than one per mille of the population.

93. Of course, if you admit that, it rather knocks it on the head. There may be a couple of hundred, or a very small number ?—My figure is corroborated by Mr. Malony, who gives as Telugu castes 473 per thousand population, and Oriya castes 262 per thousand. That is a quotation from the census report.

94. Let us take that point on your caste position. Do you say that there are may people who are Oriya-speaking who belong to Telegu castes ?—Yes, they are enumerated as speaking mostly Oriya.

Sir A. P. Patro : I think in the case of Reddikis, especially of Telugu castes, they are put down as Oriya-speaking peoples.

95. Major Attlee : The trouble is that the other people say just exactly the opposite.—This is not a figure of mine. All this is based on Government reports.

96. We will leave that point for the moment. You deal with the historical position, and you say that for three centuries and a half Ganjam "has been "an organic or integral part of the Northern Circars."—Yes, and it was so from time immemorial. The Government of India state in one place that it is difficult to break with the prescription of one century. What do you think of breaking with the prescription of several centuries ?

97. In a country like India, with a very long history, any party goes back as far as it wants to. Some go back 1,000 years, and some 300 years.—We go upon history, that is all ; we go upon facts. Not one of these figures is mine. They are all from the official statistics.

98. You point out on page 253 a number of difficulties ?—It is all taken from the Madras Government Report of 1904.

99. I am only just bringing out your points.—I will enumerate the difficulties, if you like. I have merely summarised them in the Memorandum.

100. We do not want to overload the thing with detail ; we want to get out the main points you have made. The main point you have made here is that there are a large number of different customs, and so on, that are quite different from those of Orissa, and in your view that makes a very great difficulty in amalgamating these tracts. Is that so ?—Yes.

101. As a rule the people would like to go, if there was to be any change, with their zamindars. For instance, you have a big zamindari in Parlakimedi, have you not ? Would you like the people to go with that ?—Certainly not. As soon as the Philip-Duff report was published, the people of Parlakimedi organised a big meeting in which they passed a number of resolutions, and they have even asked the Raja of Parlakimedi to change his opinion. I can give you the resolutions passed at the Parlakimedi meeting. Nobody ever thinks that the British Government would ever remove Parlakimedi, Tekkali and Sompeta, where there are so few Oriyas, from the Madras Presidency. I do not think they will inflict such a gross injury upon the Telugu people.

102. You think the people's views should prevail and not necessarily the zamindars' ?—The views of the people should prevail ; certainly not that of the zamindars.

103. Do you apply the same reasoning to Parlakimedi and Jeypore ?—But there are other difficulties. I think the administration of the Madras Government is the best ever known.

104. On page 254 you say that the transfer would not be beneficial to Oriyas, and finally you say that as Madras is a better Government than Bihar and Orissa, you would rather stay in Madras ?—That is my opinion.

105. From your knowledge of the district in what direction does the trade run ? Does it run towards the north ?—It runs towards the south, and it will run more so when the Vizagapatam harbour is fully developed.

106. Taking the agency tracts they have not got much communication with the rest of the country ?—They have.

107. Mr. Cadogan : On page 254 you speak of the sympathy which the Madras Government evince in the welfare of the Oriya people. You say "the "Government of Madras have always evinced special "interest in the solution of the Oriya problem by the "adoption of liberal measures, such as charging "only half fees in schools and colleges, instituting "scholarships for the special benefit of the Oriyas "and preferring the Oriyas in the distribution of "official patronage." You have just now said that the Oriya people are the best judges in the matter. May I read to you what they say ? They say: "Their educational needs and requirements "have been administered to with a most niggardly "hand ?"—Certainly not. If you compare the statistics of a decade or two, you will find the progress made by the Oriyas in education.

108. You do not agree with that ?—No, I do not agree.

109. Do you mean they prefer to remain as they are ?—Yes, they prefer up to this day.

110. I will again read to you what the Oriyas say : "Nowhere do the Oriyas succeed in getting "their due share of representation owing to the "power and influence wielded adversely by the "people of the predominant communities." You do not agree with that ?—I do not agree. Influence, wealth and sympathy are on their side. The zamindars are the richest persons, and they have advantages over the Telugus. Take the statistics for the last 20 years, and see what progress they have made under the Madras Government, in the matter of appointments in the public service, in their educational qualifications, and so on. They were backward in education in the beginning ; but now they have progressed very much. There are three deputy collectors among them, and two or three district munsifs. I can give their names, if necessary. I do not think there are equal numbers of Telugus from the Ganjam district holding similar appointments.

111. They have no just grievance ?—No.

112. Sir A. P. Patro : You have no objection to the formation of an Oriya province ?—No ; I have nothing to do with that.

113. As representing the Ganjam Defence League and the Telugu people of the Ganjam district, you raise no objection to the formation of an Oriya province and bringing the Oriya-speaking people under one administration ?—I have no definite ideas on that point.

114. The Telugu people of the Ganjam district and the Ganjam Defence League have no objection to the formation of an Oriya province, that is, all the Oriya speaking tracts being brought under one separate administration ?—That is the general opinion. I have got my own individual opinion.

115. Lord Burnham : That is only so long as you do not bring in the Telugu-speaking districts, is that so ?—Where it is a mixed population, they do not want to be brought into the Oriya province.

Sir A. P. Patro : Is that your view ?

The Witness : That is the view of the people.

116. Your opinion is that the purely Telugu portion should be excluded from the Oriya province if there is one formed ?—Yes. I say it is impossible to divide Ganjam into such areas. All along the coast there are the Telugus.

117. The majority of the people beyond Rushikulya, say the Chatrapur, Gussur and Balligoda divisions, are mostly Oriyas ?—The Ganjam Defence League objects to their transfer.

118. When they are predominantly Oriyas, what objection could there be for their being annexed to the Oriya province ?—I have given the administrative difficulties. There are also the legal difficulties. For instance, we have got the Mitakshara law here, while they have the Dayabhaga law in Orissa. Again, even in cases where the Mitakshara law is applied, its application there is quite different from its application in this Presidency.

119. Do you not think that the Oriyas will be in a more prosperous condition and their culture will be improved if they are brought together under one administration ?—No, I do not think so. I think the Oriyas of the Ganjam district will be in a better condition if they remain in the Ganjam district.

120. But the Oriya people think that their condition will be improved by being in a separate province ?—That is on account of the influence of the Oriyas of Orissa. The movement originated in Orissa. The Madras Government dealt with that question, and the Government of India also said that they were convinced of the arguments advanced by the Madras Government for not taking away any portion of the Ganjam district to Orissa.

121. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-lah Sahib : How many municipalities are there in your district ?—Three.

122. How many Oriya chairmen are there in these three municipalities ?—One, Parlakimedi. The other two are Telugus.

123. So far as the District Board is concerned, who is its president ?—An Oriya.

124. How many members represent Ganjam in the Legislative Council ?—Three.

125. Of these, how many are Oriyas ?—One. There were two previously. Further, the zamindar of Kallikota and Atugara represents the landholders' constituency.

126. Mr. Siva Rao : Some time before you were laying stress on the fact that all those who are classed as speaking Oriya do not necessarily belong to the same caste or race or community ?—Yes, that is my point.

127. You also tried to make out that they are classed for census purposes as Oriya-speaking people. They are ethnologically different ?—Yes.

128. For instance the Kalinga Komatis and Reddis are Telugus as a race, but they are classed as Oriya-speaking people ?—Yes.

129. So in taking the census of the Oriyas and in deciding which people should be tacked on to the Oriya province, you suggest that caste or community should also be taken into account ?—Yes.

130. Your objection, so far as I understand from this Memorandum, is to the dismemberment of the Ganjam district. You do not want that any portion of the Ganjam district, even the predominantly Oirya-speaking portion, should be tacked on to any other province ?—Yes, that is my point.

131. What is your reason ?—As I have already said, they are administrative and legal difficulties.

132. What are the legal difficulties ?—There is the Mitakshara law here and Dayabhaga law in Orissa.

133. Sir Hari Singh Gour : What do you mean by administrative difficulties ? You speak of the Dayabhaga law being a law of Orissa ?—Yes.

134. I never heard that ?—It is in Bengal. Orissa was a part of Bengal.

135. There are portions of Bengal which are subject to the Mitakshara law ?—Mitakshara law as administered by the Calcutta High Court is different from the Mitakshara law as administered by the Madras High Court.

136. What are the other difficulties that you see ?—The revenue administration is quite different. The ryotwari system is peculiar to Madras. Here there are village officers dealing with the Collector. There are no such village officers dealing with the Collector in Orissa except in a few Government estates. Again the Bengal Tenancy law is extended to Orissa and the Madras Tenancy law is quite different. Our ryots have got occupancy rights.

137. On these very grounds the Oriyas want to get away from you ?—At the expense of the ryots.

138. While you, as a representative of the Telugu-speaking people, do not want to allow the Oriyas to separate from the Madras Presidency, they urge the very same reasons, the difference in the Mitakshara law, the difference in the revenue administration, and so on, for separation from the Madras Presidency ?—I do not know how it is beneficial to the Oriyas.

139. That question was put to them, and they say that their separation from the Madras Presidency is beneficial to them, and they say they do not see why the Telugu people should object to that ?—I beg to state that it is a question of the educated classes trying to aspire for the loaves and fishes of the office. It is they that say so. The masses do not say so.

140. You do not speak for the Oriyas ?—I speak for the ryots.

141. As you have got a right to speak, you will agree that the Oriyas also have an equal right to speak for themselves, do you not ?—It is prejudicial to the interests of the Oriya ryots, who form the bulk of the Oriya population.

142. You claim a right for yourself to speak. You must give equal right to the Oriya people to speak for themselves, and, if they ask for separation, separation must follow ?—That will affect also the Telugu ryots who are intermingled with the Oriyas.

143. We leave out this intermingling. But where the Oriya population is in a majority, say more than 50 per cent—and there are tracts in the Ganjam district where such is the case—the Oriyas have an indisputable right to separate from you if they so wish ?—I doubt it. The prescriptive right is with us.

144. Now you have come down to the prescriptive right. What is a prescriptive right ?—It is the right to enjoy long established privileges. The Government themselves say that it is difficult to break with the prescription of one century. The Telugus have been enjoying certain rights as ryots, and they will be put into difficulties if any portion of the district is transferred.

145. Lord Burnham : I have got only two questions to put to you in order to clear up your views to the Conference. Do I understand you to say in the first place that in the division of districts where the race and language may differ, your opinion is that race ought to count, and not language ?—Yes, exactly.

146. Speaking for the Telegu-speaking community, you are of the opinion that the administration in the Presidency of Madras is better than that in the Province of Bihar and Orissa ?—I do not make any comparison. I only say that the administration of the Government of Madras is very good. I do not know anything of the administration of other provinces.

147. Have you anything to add to what you have already stated ?—I wanted to discuss the census statistics. I want to say that the Government of India have already decided this question once in 1904, and their opinions are recorded.

Memorandum submitted by the Madras Presidency Moslem League.

To The Rt. Hon'ble SIR JOHN SIMON, M.P., President of the Indian Statutory Commission.

Dear Sir,

You may have realised by this time that most of the vital problems of India's future turn on the hinges of Hindu-Moslem relations. Therefore no constitution proposed from a Moslem standpoint can be complete, unless it takes into account the Hindu standpoint also. The political differences among the Hindus, resulting from their division into Sikh and Jain, Brahmin and Non-Brahmin, touchable and untouchable, had made it difficult for the Madras Presidency Moslem League to understand the general standpoint of the Hindus as such, when the passing of the Nehru Report by the All-Parties Conference and its subsequent ratification by the All-India Congress Committee furnished the League with the desired basis. The Special Committee appointed by the League has drafted the Memorandum on that basis, and this fact and the time required for getting the draft approved by the Council of the League explain the delay in submitting the Memorandum for the consideration of the Joint Free Conference.

(By Order)
Yours sincerely,

(Sd.) MD. MUAZZAM, B.A., B.L.,
Advocate, Madras High Court,
General Secretary.

INTRODUCTORY.

India's unique Problems. The most suitable constitution for a country is the one which takes into consideration all the general and special conditions of that country. What with the different communities and castes inhabiting this country, what with the multiplicity of languages spoken here, and what with the divergent civilisations and cultures existing in this extensive land, India's constitutional problem is not that of a country, but pre-eminently that of a continent. There are at least two dominating cultures in this country, viz., the one represented by the Hindus of the Aryan Stock, and the other by the Muhammadan conquerors of India—not to speak of the ancient Dravidian or Non-Brahmin culture and the modern European culture, popular with the younger generation. Another problem taxing the brain of the Indian constitution-maker is the existence of autonomous Indian States with hereditary sovereigns, the venerable representatives of ancient Indian civilisation, culture and constitution, occupying a peculiar position as "the faithful allies" of His Majesty the King-Emperor of India. The problem of a future Indian Constitution becomes all the more complex by the very reasonable contention of the Indian princes that in view of the treaty obligations, the British Government is not entitled to compel them to transfer their allegiance to an autonomous Indian Government, and that in case that Government be made responsible to the people of British India, the princes should be placed directly under the control of His Majesty.

The League on the Nehru Report. It is a tragic irony that the democratic authors of the Nehru Report, who demand the application of the principle of self-determination to British India, have not deemed it necessary to apply that principle to the Indian rulers by suggesting constructive proposals for safeguarding their privileges in the proposed "Commonwealth of India"; but have cleverly contented themselves with a criticism of the arguments of Sir Leslie Scott and the vague and the empty declaration that "the Commonwealth shall exercise the same rights in relation to and discharge the same obligations towards the Indian States as the Government of India exercised and discharged previous to the passing of this Act."

Under these circumstances, the Madras Presidency Moslem League believes that the recommendations of the Nehru Report as accepted by the so-called All-Parties Conference, held at Lucknow, and in fact, though not formally, submitted to the Statutory Commission as the unanimous demands of the Indian people—though at best they be the demands of a large section of the Hindu community—are at least in certain respects one-sided and defective.

Plan of the Memorandum. As it is desirable to represent to the Statutory Commission the Moslem demands in their exact relation to the recommendations contained in Chapter VII of the Nehru Report, and as the League has reason to believe that the British Commissioners as well as their Indian Colleagues are fully conversant with the Nehru recommendations, it craves their indulgence to submit its proposals, for the sake of convenience and brevity, in the form of comments on the recommendations.

COMMENTS ON THE NEHRU REPORT.

CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF INDIA, ETC.

Recommendations 1 and 2.—In the beginning of both these recommendations the words "Subject to the limitations imposed hereinafter" shall be added. As the problems of the Indian States and the divergent communities do not exist in the other dominions, no provision has been made for the solution of the problems in the respective constitutions of the dominions. In India, however, limitations have to be imposed on the constitution.

DEFINITION OF CITIZEN.

Recommendation 3.—The League is in agreement with this recommendation.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS.

Recommendation 4.—The following shall be added after the word "unemployment" in clause xvii:—

"The parliament shall also make effective laws to "develop indigenous industries by establishing "industrial schools and by other means, to prevent "the export of grain, especially rice and wheat, from "India and to provide employment for the poor "citizens."

The League considers this addition indispensable, so that the starving masses of this country may get enough bread to eat and a piece of cloth to cover their shame. As members of the different legislatures will be people belonging generally either to the rich or the middle class, they may not think it worth their while to undertake legislation for the sole benefit of the masses, unless there is a statutory provision compelling them to do so.

The following shall be added as clauses (xx) and (xxi) in recommendation 4:—

(xx) Constitutional safeguard for religious neutrality. "No legislation affecting the religion or any "religious or important social custom of "any community shall be undertaken "within the limits of the Commonwealth."

(xxi) Safeguard for the autonomy of the Indian States. "No legislation affecting the re-"lations of the Commonwealth and any "Indian State or any State and a province "or any Indian State with another shall be "undertaken except in the manner here-"inafter provided."

Clause (xx) is necessary with a view to preventing the majority communities from tyrannizing over a minor community by interfering with the latter's religious and social customs.

Clause (xxi) is necessary to safeguard the position of the Indian States and save them from possible attacks from interested parties and statesmen in British India.

PARLIAMENT.

Recommendation 5.—Addition to Chamber of Princes. After the word "Representatives" the words

" and a Chamber of Princes " shall be added and the word " and " shall be omitted.

It is not fair to subject the Indian States to the Commonwealth, without giving them representation in its Parliament. As there are practical difficulties in giving them representation in either of the proposed bicameral chambers, the League considers it but just that there should be a legislature to represent the states and their governments.

Recommendations 6 to 8.—The League is in general agreement with the recommendations.

Recommendation 9.—Franchise too wide. The franchise proposed for the House of Representatives is too wide and, if adopted, will result in a quite unwieldy number of voters. Such a franchise will prove disastrous to the Moslem community, in which owing to the purdah system many of the female voters will not be able to exercise their franchise. The League proposes that the present franchise may be widened by giving the right of vote to any citizen paying Rs3 annually in the form of any tax, to all Indians graduated abroad, to all graduates of Indian Universities and Oriental academies and to all teachers in recognised public institutions.

Recommendations 10 and 11.—The League is in general agreement with recommendation 10 and endorses recommendation 11 subject to the following proviso :—

" Provided that the presidentship of the Houses of " Parliament shall go to a Hindu, a Muhammadan " and a Christian by rotation."

Recommendation 12.—To this the League has no objection.

Recommendation 13.—The following proviso shall be added at the end of the recommendation :—

Limitations on the discussion of religious subjects. " Provided that, notwithstanding any provision in " this Act or in any British or Indian Law for the " time being in force, the Parliament shall not, with- " out the previous sanction of the Governor-General, " discuss any bill, resolution or motion, affecting the " religion or religious or social customs having the " force of religion of any community whatsoever and " no such bill, resolution or motion shall have legal " effect unless three-fourths of the members, " representing such community in the Parliament and " present at the session, vote in favour of the bill, " resolution or motion. The Governor-General shall " decide whether a bill, resolution or motion affects " such religion or custom and may, if satisfied that " the religion or custom is so affected, accord the " necessary sanction for the discussion on the bill, " resolution or motion, or otherwise refuse such sanc- " tion. An appeal against such sanction by the " Governor-General may be preferred to the King " in Council by any member belonging to the " community affected."

Recommendations 14 and 15.—The League accepts the recommendations subject to the deletion of the phrase " not including the Indian States " in recommendation 14.

Recommendations 16 to 21.—The League is in general agreement with the recommendations subject to the following proviso :—

" Provided that nothing in recommendations 16 " to 21 shall apply to bills, resolutions or motions, " relating to Indian States mentioned herein under " 21-A and 21-B."

The following shall be added as new recommendations 21-A and 21-B after the above proviso :—

Recommendation 21-A.—Reference of Bills, etc., on certain subjects to the Chamber of Princes. No bill, resolution or motion or any provision or section thereof on any one or more of the following matters, passed by the House of Representatives and Senate shall be presented to the Governor-General for his assent or otherwise come into force until the bill, resolution, or motion has also been passed by the Chamber of Princes, namely :—

(i) Any matter arising out of treaties, engagements, sanads or any other document or documents between the British Government and the Indian States or princes or between the Commonwealth Government and the Indian States or princes.

(ii) Any matter relating to the contribution by any State or States towards the expenses of the maintenance of the Army, Navy, Air Forces, or generally towards the defence of India as a whole or relating to the participation otherwise of any State or States in such defence.

(iii) Any matter connected with the share to be allotted to a State or States in any custom or other duties or pilgrimage or any other taxes collected within the territories of the Commonwealth or any provincial Government and vice versa.

(iv) Any dispute between the Commonwealth or any province and a state regarding land boundaries, water supplies, irrigation canals, drainage, embankments, water storage, water power, etc.

(v) Any dispute between two or more states about matters mentioned in sub-clause (iv) supra or (vi) Any other matters prescribed by law.

Recommendation 21-B (a).—Constitution of the Chamber of Princes. The Chamber of Princes shall consist of 300 members, who shall be composed of (1) such number of members representing each Indian State or group of States as may be compatible with its population and political importance, such members to be elected by constituencies established by law in Indian States, and (2) an equal number of members from each State or group of States, nominated by the State Governments to represent them.

(b) There shall be a President and a Deputy President for the Chamber of Princes. The Governor-General shall nominate an official representative of the biggest Indian State in the Chamber as its President. The Deputy President shall be elected by the Chamber from among its members.

(c) The period for the continuance of the Chamber, the privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by it, and the manner of holding sessions, the dissolution, and the other necessary procedure shall be such as may be prescribed by His Majesty the King in Council.

(d) Functions of the Chamber of Princes. The Chamber of Princes may, on its own initiative, introduce and pass any bill or resolution, or motion on matters specified in recommendation 21-A. Any bill, resolution, or motion, when passed by the Chamber, shall be sent to the House of Representatives for confirmation. If the bill, resolution, or motion be passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate, without any alterations or amendments, or with alterations or amendments, acceptable to the Chamber, the resolution or motion shall become law and in the case of a bill subject to the assent of of the Governor-General.

If the bill be rejected by both or either of the Houses, the Governor-General may certify the bill, if he so thinks fit. Against such certification by the Governor-General, an appeal shall lie by any House of Parliament to the King in Council,whose decision shall be final. The resolution or motion so rejected shall lapse if not passed by the House or Houses within a period of one year from the date of such rejection.

(e) (i) The Chamber of Princes shall take into consideration any bill, resolution, or motion sent to it by the other two Houses of Parliament under recommendation 21-A, and may pass the bill, resolution or motion with or without any alteration or amendment or may reject the same.

(ii) If such bill, resolution or motion is passed by the Chamber without alterations or amendments or with alterations or amendments, acceptable to the other Houses of Parliament, the resolution or motion shall become law and in the case of a bill subject to the assent of the Governor-General.

(iii) If such bill be rejected by the Chamber or passed with alterations and amendments, unacceptable to both the Houses, the Governor-General may certify the bill, if he so thinks fit. Against such a certification an appeal by the Chamber shall lie to the King in Council, whose decision shall be final. Any resolution or motion so rejected by the Chamber shall lapse, if it is not passed by the Chamber within a year from the date of the rejection.

THE COMMONWEALTH EXECUTIVE.

Recommendations 22, 23, 24 and 25.—The League generally endorses the recommendations subject to the following proviso to be inserted at the end of recommendation 23 (b) :—

" Provided that the Prime Minister shall select " at least two of his ministers from the elected " Moslem Members of Parliament."

HIGH COMMISSIONER, ETC., AND FINANCIAL CONTROL.

Recommendations 26 and 27.—The League accepts the recommendations.

THE PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURE.

Recommendations 28, 29, 30 and 31.—The League endorses the recommendations save the one about franchise as explained in the comment on recommendation 9.

Recommendations 32 and 33. The League accepts the recommendations subject to the following proviso :—

" Provided that the legislatures of the provinces, " where Moslems are in a majority, shall elect an " elected Moslem member of the legislature as its " President and that the legislatures of other pro- " vinces shall elect an elected Moslem member of " the legislature as its Deputy President."

Recommendations 34, 35 and 36.—The League agrees to these recommendations subject to the addition of the following new recommendation :—

Recommendation 36-A.—Limitation on the discussion of religious subjects. Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act or in any provison of any British, Indian or local law for the time being in force, no provincial legislature or any local body established under any law of the Commonwealth or any Provincial Government shall, without the previous sanction of the Governor, discuss any bill, resolution or motion affecting the religion or religious or social customs having the force of religion of any community whatsoever, and no such bill, resolution or motion shall have legal effect, unless three-fourths of the members representing such community in the legislature or local body and present at the session or the meeting vote in favour of the bill, resolution or motion. The Governor shall decide whether a bill, resolution or motion affects such a religion or custom and may, if satisfied that the religion or custom is not so affected, accord the necessary sanction for the discussion on the bill, resolution or motion or otherwise refuse such sanction. An appeal against such sanction may be preferred by any member belonging to the community affected to the Governor-General, whose decision shall be final.

Recommendations 37 to 42.—The League is in general agreement with the recommendations.

THE PROVINCIAL EXECUTIVE.

Recommendations 43, 44 and 45.—The League endorses in general the recommendations subject to the following amendments :—

Recommendation 44 shall be recast as follows :—

" The Governor shall appoint for every province " an Executive Council consisting of not less than " seven ministers. The Provincial Legislature may " sanction for every Minister an allowance not ex- " ceeding Rs3,000 per mensem, exclusive of the " travelling allowances."

The following proviso shall be added to recommendation 45 :—

" Provided that in provinces where Moslems are " in a minority the Chief Minister shall select at " least two of his ministers from the elected Moslem " members of the legislature."

THE JUDICIARY.

Recommendations 46 to 52.—The League agrees to the recommendations subject to the following proviso to be inserted at the end of recommendation 46 :—

" Provided that the number of Moslems in the " Supreme Court shall, with due regard to the " requirements of efficiency, be at least one-third " of the sanctioned strength of the Court.

HIGH COURTS—CONSTITUTION.

Recommendations 53 to 66.—The League generally endorses the recommendations subject to the following proviso at the end of recommendation 54:—

" Provided that in provinces where the Muham- " madans are in a minority at least one-fifth of the " Judges of the High Court shall be local Muhamma- " dans."

The League has been constrained to suggest the addition of the proviso with a view to avoid the repetition, in any other province, of the deplorable state of affairs prevalent in Madras where there is absolutely no Moslem representation on the High Court Bench, there being no Moslem among the fifteen Judges of the Court.

PROPERTY, REVENUE AND FINANCE.

Recommendations 67 to 74.—The League is in general agreement with the recommendations.

DEFENCE.

Recommendation 75.—The League approves of the recommendations subject to the addition of the words " the President of the Chamber of Princes," after the word " Staff " in item 7 of sub-clause (a) in recommendation 75.

Recommendation 76.—The League accepts the recommendation conditional upon the insertion of the words, " and the Chamber of Princes," after the word, " Representatives."

THE CIVIL SERVICES.

Recommendations 76 to 84.—The League is in general agreement with the recommendations.

Recommendation 85.—The League is strongly opposed to the recommendation as has been made clear in the comment on recommendation 21. The proposed new recommendations 21-A and 21-B will make it unnecessary to refer any difference between the Commonwealth and the States to the Supreme Court.

NEW PROVINCES.

Recommendation 86.—The League accepts the recommendation subject to the following proviso :—

" Provided that such redistribution does not " convert the Moslem majority in any province " into a minority and that when any language other " than English be made the common language of " India, that language should be Urdu written in " Persian script."

The Indian Muhammadans deeply resent the mischievous propaganda carried on, under the guise of nationalism, by some interested persons to the effect that Hindi is the language understood in many parts of India and spoken by Muhammadans and that it deserves to become the national language of India. The fact is that Hindi such as written in Devanagiri character is current in Benares and a few places around it and in some parts of the Bombay Presidency; whereas Urdu is the language mostly spoken and written in the northern parts of India, Bengal, Madras, Bombay and Sind. If a handful of persons in the four provinces have any inclination to learn Hindi, it is the result of anti-Urdu propaganda carried on by the Hindi Prachar Sabhas and Congress organisations; and the demand of the League that Urdu language may be made the common language is, therefore, based on bare facts and justice.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Recommendation 87.—The League endorses the recommendation subject to the following proviso:—

"Provided that no such bill shall become law until " it has been passed by a two-third majority of the " members of the Chamber of Princes."

COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION.

Recommendations I to IV.—Legislatures. The League is diametrically opposed to the recommendations about communal representation. It is strongly of opinion that the time is not yet ripe for the introduction of joint electorates. It fears that the comparative ignorance, poverty, and want of political awakening among the Moslem electors will make them tools in the hands of the candidates and clever election agents of the other communities. When even the officials in the Punjab think that in that province where the Moslems constitute 55 per cent of the entire population, the chances of a Muhammadan candidate as against a Hindu candidate in a joint electorate would be less, it can be easily imagined what the position of the Moslems of this Presidency would be, in case the system of joint electorates is introduced. It is true that a remedy is suggested in the reservation of seats for minority communities under joint electorates. But it is a poor consolation, for though the required number of Muhammadan candidates will certainly be elected by a Hindu majority, the sense of personal and party obligations to the majority will never allow them to boldly advocate Moslem rights as they otherwise would do. Another novel method suggested is that a purely Moslem electorate may elect a panel of Moslem candidates, out of whom the mixed electorate shall elect the required number. In the opinion of the League, this method will not be an efficacious remedy for the evil of joint electorates. Thus the Moslem position would become far worse than it is at present. The League, therefore, advocates Separate Electorates and Separate Representation in the legislatures on the population basis and also recommends that one-third seats in the central legislature should be reserved for the Moslems.

Local Bodies. In view of the fact that the field of local Government is the training ground for the future administrators of India and in view of the political importance of the Moslem community, it is necessary that its members should have this training. This can be done by a provision that the presidentship of all local bodies shall go by rotation to a Hindu, a Moslem and a Christian, as experience has shown that the enlightened Hindu Councillors feel great reluctance in having a Moslem President.

Steps should also be taken to give to the Moslems representation, proportionate to their population, in local bodies, such as the Local Boards, Municipalities, Universities and Bar-Councils. One might have expected that the very enlightened and political-minded electors to the Bar-Council and the Senate of the Madras University, who oppose the principle of separate electorates tooth and nail, would have by their action removed the misapprehensions that the minorities have about the efficacy of the joint electorates in getting them due representation; but it is an irony of fate that these electors have not elected one Muhammadan out of thirty elected representatives of the registered graduates in the Senate, while the advocates, belonging to a particular community have elected ninety per cent. of the members of their community, especially those having the good fortune of residing in the metropolis of the Presidency, of whom not one is a Moslem. The League is convinced that the attitude of such an enlightened electorate is a full justification for its demand for Separate Electorates.

Public Services. There is a clamour in certain interested circles that Communal Representation in services is the mortal enemy of Efficiency. Efficiency is the result of high mental and moral qualities, coupled with experience. If the Moslems as a community be less efficient as public servants—though as a matter of fact they have discharged the responsibilities of the highest posts of the State with credit and reputation—it can be due to the fact that they have very few opportunities of getting experience in such services. It is, therefore, essential that it should be provided by statute that the Moslems should be given their due share in the civil, military, naval, and aerial services. It may be pointed out that their courage and fearlessness makes them specially suited for the three last named services. Is there any need to add that they have special aptitude for police work, as admitted by the Inspector-General of the Bombay Police in his evidence before the Commission? In fact the acknowledged policy of the Government regarding the Indianisation of services will not prove a success, unless Moslems are more largely appointed to executive and other responsible posts.

REDISTRIBUTION AND STATUS OF PROVINCES.

Recommendation V.—The League is firmly of opinion that Sind should be separated from Bombay, irrespective of any financial or other considerations, and would suggest the deletion of the phrase in the recommendation beginning with " after " and ending with " necessary."

Recommendations VI and VII.—The League has no objection to recommendation VI and strongly favours recommendation VII.

MADRAS.
26th February, 1929.

PRESENT :

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, AND OF THE MADRAS PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

(DURING THE FIRST PART OF THE EVIDENCE OF THE MADRAS PRESIDENCY MOSLEM LEAGUE, LORD BURNHAM WAS IN THE CHAIR).

Deputation from the Madras Presidency Moslem League.

The deputation consisted of :—

Mr. MAHOMED MUAZZAM, B.A., B.L. (Advocate), Secretary.
Mr. S. M. SHAREEF KHAN, B.A., Assistant Secretary.
Khan Bahadur S. K. ABDUL RAZZACK, M.L.C. Chairman, Saidapet Municipality.
Mr. MAHOMED MUKARRAM, B.A., B.L., Advocate.
Khan Bahadur MAHOMED SADULLA BADSHA, Ex., M.L.C.
Khan Bahadur MIR MUZHERUDDIN, B.A., Retired Assistant Director-General, Post and Telegraph.
Khan Bahadur M. ABDULLA GHATTALA, Advocate, was also present.

1. The Chairman : * * * In the Memorandum you have gone on the basis of showing in what respects you agree with or differ from the recommendations of the Nehru Report ?—(Mr. Muazzam) Yes.

Sir A. P. Patro : I do not know whether the deputation accepts the Nehru Report.

2. The Chairman : I will ask them. Is it the case that in the main you agree with the Nehru Report ?—On the main points we differ, and that is with regard to separate electorates and——

3. I will take you through it ; but is it the case ? It was asked by Sir A. P. Patro whether you do agree with the Nehru Report in general, in the main ?—In the main we differ.

4. Then I had better take you through it, and I will ask you on the points you make here whether you will explain yourselves. I see on point 4, Fundamental Rights, you want to add, after clause xvii, the words : " Parliament shall also make " effective laws to develop indigenous industries by " establishing industrial schools and by other means, " to prevent the export of grain, especially rice and " wheat, from India, and to provide employment for " the poor citizens." That has got a rather familiar sound to some of us in reference to proposals at Home. Would you mind telling us exactly what you mean by that ?—That is explained just below : " The League considers this addition indispensable, " so that the starving masses of this country may get " enough bread to eat and a piece of cloth to cover " their shame. As members of the different Legisla- " tures will be people belonging generally either to " the rich or the middle class, they may not think " it worth their while to undertake legislation for " the sole benefit of the masses, unless there is a " statutory provision compelling them to do so." As regards exports, we wanted to press the restriction of export of wheat and rice to a certain extent.

5. You think by preventing export you will improve the lot of the people ?—Not preventing it, but placing restriction on it ; not allowing the free export of wheat and rice.

6. Would you apply that to Burma, too ?—Yes ; it is a part of India.

7. That would destroy the trade of Burma ?—It would not destroy it. I do not think the export ought to be prevented, but some restrictions ought to be placed on it.

8. How would that provide employment for poor citizens ?—That is something different, " and to " provide employment for the poor citizens." That refers to the establishment of indigenous industries. That will provide employment for the poor citizens. The more the industries, the more the employment.

9. Have you, in your own mind, any special industries in this Presidency ?—Cottage industries.

10. I want to get it clear. How do you propose to ensure employment which is not given on account of the market at present ? What would you do ? Would you give so much bounty for cottage industries ; would you make grants of money ?—Yes.

11. Then you lay down that the following should be added as clauses (xx) and (xxi) : " No legislation " affecting the religion or any religious or important " social custom of any community shall be undertaken " within the limits of the Commonwealth." Would you like to explain that ?—Except in the matters thereinafter provided. On page 258, recommendation (xxi) is : " No legislation affecting " the relations of the Commonwealth and any Indian " State or any State and a province or any Indian " State with another shall be undertaken except in " the manner hereinafter provided." That " except " in the manner hereinafter provided " refers to (xx) and (xxi).

12. The last part is new, is it not ? The twenty-first has not been proposed in any report we have had ; the part you have just read out ?—I suppose you have got it there ? It is in this Memorandum. It is page 258.

13. I understand you want to provide safeguards for your own community ?—Yes, that is right ; and while we do that, we are providing safeguards for other communities also.

14. And you wish to provide that any Bill affecting the religion or any religious or important social custom of any community shall have no legal effect unless three-fourths of the members representing the community affected vote in its favour ?—Yes.

15. Not only three-fourths of the members, but three-fourths of your own members ?—Yes.

16. And who would enforce this ? The Government of India ? It is no good passing legislation unless you can enforce it ?—That would form part of the Constitution. The Government of India would have to enforce it.

17. You might have it in the Constitution, but unless the individual citizen would enforce it in the law courts, it would be difficult to say where his rights were touched ?—If a religious matter is discussed or moved or initiated, unless three-fourths of the Moslems (if it is a matter affecting the Moslems) agree to it, it will not become law.

18. But it is not legislation only ; it is administration. It may be in regard to Law and Order and Communal disorders ; it may be in regard to the Services, what proportion you think you ought to have in the Services ?—I do not refer to the Services ; it is only with regard to religious or important social customs. This is what I say : " No legislation " affecting religion or any religious or important " social custom."

19. You only mean the practice of religion ?—The practice of religion.

20. That would arise in regard to communal disorders, would it not ; because as a rule they take place on account of the violation of some religious custom ?—Yes.

21. I come back to this. Who is going to enforce the law ; the Government of the Presidency, or the Government of India ?—So far as this province is concerned, the Government of the Presidency.

22. And you think those safeguards will be sufficient for the Mussulmans ?—I think on that question the safeguard of three-fourths of the members representing the community voting for or against it will be a sufficient safeguard.

23. I understand that with regard to law-making ; but law-making is a very small part of life, and I am thinking more of the daily life of the people. How are you going to enforce these things in that respect ? But you are satisfied that it can be done by the Government of the Presidency ?—I think so.

24. That means that the Governor or the Government will have to say whether the custom of your community is violated or not ?—Yes, if it is a matter affecting the religion of any community.

25. Yes, quite so ; but you have got to have that interpreted, and I presume it will be the Government of this Presidency, which may be, and probably will be, composed of people of other creeds than your own, and they will have to say whether the customs of your Muhammadan religion have been violated or not ?—And whether it is a religious matter or not will have to be decided by the Government.

26. You have confidence in the Government—Brahmin or non-Brahmin—protecting your religion ? Oh, I see you say in page 260 that the Governor shall decide ?—Yes.

27. I did not notice that. Then that does not mean the Government ; it means the Governor himself ; not in Council, but the Governor himself ? —Yes.

28. Then with regard to page 259, recommendations in regard to franchise, you propose that the franchise shall be the same both for the Central Legislature and the Provincial Legislatures ?—Yes.

29. In both cases it shall be based on the payment of Rs3 for any purpose of taxation ?—Yes.

30. You are not in favour of adult franchise ?—With this exception, that the purdah system among the Muhammadans in India excludes a very large number of voters. Apart from that we have no objection.

31. I do not quite follow. You are in favour of manhood suffrage, you mean, and not of adult suffrage—that is, only for men ?—Adult suffrage comprises females also.

32. But manhood suffrage obviously does not. You are in favour of manhood suffrage ?—Yes.

33. But not adult suffrage ; not men and women ? —Yes, that is it. At page 259, we say : " Such a franchise will prove disastrous to the " Moslem community, in which, owing to the purdah " system, many of the female voters will not be able " to exercise their franchise."

34. And you would extend it also on an educational basis ?—Yes.

35. I see you are in favour of the presidency of the Houses of Parliament going to Muhammadan, Hindu, and Christian by rotation ?—Yes.

36. Without reference to the number of their representatives ?—That is so. That refers to what are styled the Central Legislatures—the Houses of Parliament.

37. You are not in favour of a general right of discussing religious subjects, are you ?—No, we are not.

38. As being too provocative ; too dangerous ?—Yes.

39. Then you are in favour—I understand this is connected with it—of separate electorates for communal representation ?—Yes, we favour that ; we want that.

40. Have you anything special to say about that, beyond the general arguments ?—The only thing I would say about the separate electorates is this, that we have experience of these mixed electorates in the municipal elections of the city of Madras, which is divided into a number of wards, and in each ward we have what are called the joint mixed electorates, Hindus and Muhammadans both voting for a certain individual. What happens is that even in a ward where these two communities may be equally divided in numerical strength, at the time that the electoral roll is prepared it is found that owing to the economic backwardness of the Muhammadan community there are a lesser number of Muhammadan voters on the electoral roll than there are of the Hindu community ; and then, another difficulty is that in all these mixed electorates we have found that unless the Mussulman candidate—at least, that is our experience during the last two or three municipal elections—is backed up by the Congress party, he has not been successful. The two councillors we have now on the municipal corporation, who are Muhammadans, came into the council just because they were backed up by the Congress Party, and those whom the Muhammadans alone backed up were not successful, because of the large number of voters in the mixed electorates, who are Hindus.

41. You say that the reservations of seats " is a " poor consolation, for though the required number " of Muhammadan candidates will certainly be " elected by a Hindu majority, the sense of personal " and party obligations to the majority will never " allow them to boldly advocate Moslem rights as " they otherwise would do " ?—Yes.

42. You say that under joint electorates the Moslem position would become far worse than it is at present ?—That is so.

43. And then you say you must train Muhammadans for government ; " train them in regard to " local bodies for the future administration of " India " ?—Yes.

44. What about the franchise for local bodies and communal electorates ? What do you think about that ? You are in favour of having separate electorates for local bodies ?—Yes. For instance, in District Boards we have not got even one President of a District Board elected—a Muhammadan, I mean. There is not one instance in which a single Muhammadan has been returned to any District Board unless he has come in by nomination ; not by election ; so far not one instance—so that even there we require a separate electorate for these statutory self-governing bodies.

45. What proportion would you ask for local bodies ? You would have separate electorates for what proportion of the local bodies ? Have you made out any proportion of Muhammadan members, say, on your local boards ? Do you want them the same as in the Legislative Council ?—Yes.

46. Then you deal also with communal representation in the Public Services ?—Yes.

47. And you say Moslems are specially fitted for service in the military, naval and aerial services. You point out that their courage and fearlessness makes them specially suited for these services ; but they are not debarred, as Muhammadans, from the public services, are they ?—They are not.

48. In the military, naval and aerial services, it depends on recruiting ?—Public Services are more or less a matter of patronage, apart from efficiency.

49. In the north, of course, I need not tell you, Muhammadans are a predominant part of the military service ?—Yes.

50. Therefore, they are not debarred as Muhammadans. I am not talking of the Civil Service, but of the military, naval and aerial services ?—We advocate the employment of more Moslems in the military services.

51. But they are a majority at present in the Punjab, I think ?—That is only one province; but not in all.

52. But taking India as a whole, they are, possibly. My point is that nobody is debarred as a Muhammadan from being in the military service of the Crown; on the contrary, they are encouraged ?—No, we do not for a moment say that.

53. You want them here; you want them in Madras ?—Yes.

54. In regard to the Civil Service and the kindred Services, what do you think you ought to have there—what proportion ?—So far as this Presidency is concerned, I think at least twenty per cent.

55. One-fifth ?—And that has been fixed by the Staff Selection Board constituted by the Government.

56. That is for future recruitment ?—Yes.

57. That is in excess of the proportion you have on the Legislative Council ?—Yes.

58. And then you say, I believe, that in provinces where Moslems are in a minority, at least two of the ministers should be Moslems ?—Yes. Since we have had these Reforms, from 1909 up to now, there has not been one Muhammadan minister in Madras.

59. Where Moslems are in a majority, as they are in the Punjab, what number of ministers do you require there ? Do you require a majority of ministers ?—The ministers there will be probably about the ratio of population. They are a majority, and probably the number of ministers will be reflected in that.

60. In Bengal, where you have a majority of the population, but not a majority of the electorate ?—There, again, the Moslem ministers will predominate. They will naturally be in a majority.

61. Is your majority of the ministry, and the majority in any case, Hindu or Moslem, to be based on population or on electorate; because in some cases, as in Bengal, the majority of the population is not the same as the majority of the electorate ?—We have not considered that question so far as our Presidency is considered.

62. Generally speaking, though, of course, as Moslems in India, you are not shut out from the Services ?—We are not.

63. Are you in favour generally of what is called Indianisation of the Services ?—Generally we are.

64. But not except Moslems are appointed to executive and responsible positions—I think those are your own words ?—Yes.

65. You are not afraid of Law and Order being in the hands of a minister of another faith than your own ?—I think for another ten years, or at least another five years, Law and Order should be in the hands of the Governor of the province.

66. Colonel Lane-Fox : Where do you say that in the Memorandum ?—(Khan Bahadur Mir Muzheruddin) We have not said that in the Memorandum.

67. The Chairman : You thought that was implied ? You are emphasising the Moslem's fitness for responsible offices ?—(Mr. Muazzam) Yes.

68. Anyhow, you say definitely that you are in favour of Law and Order being reserved to the Governor for five or ten years ?—Yes, and if we do away with the system of Dyarchy, and make every subject a Transferred Subject, and have no reserved subjects, even in that case we would advocate Law and Order to be in the hands of the Governor for another five years.

69. It is only fair to point out, of course, that that is Dyarchy in another form ?—Yes, it is, but under the present conditions we feel it is necessary.

70. You would not feel safe without Law and Order being in the hands of the Governor ?—No. In the course of time we may shift it to the ministers, but at present we do not think it is advisable.

71. Mr. Cadogan : There is one sentence I should like to ask about on the top of page 260, under the heading, "The Judiciary." You say: "Provided "that the number of Moslems in the Supreme Court "shall, with due regard to the requirements of "of efficiency, be at least one-third of the sanctioned "strength of the court." Surely, "With due regard "to the requirements of efficiency," can only mean one thing. It means that you are not guided by the community to whom the individual belongs. Then, if that is so, I do not see how you could guarantee one-third of the sanctioned strength of the court to be of the Moslem community. I only ask this question because we have often had this suggestion that a certain proportion of posts in certain services should be guaranteed to a certain community, and I never know whether it means having regard to efficiency or without regarding efficiency at all ?—What we say is this, on page 260, that the number of Moslems shall be one-third; but, of course, they ought to be efficient.

72. I do not say that there will not always be a sufficient number of Moslems to fill the posts, but it might be that there might not, if you had due regard to efficiency ?—I do not suppose it is the case that Government cannot get at efficient men from the different communities. There are efficient men in every community, and whoever may be appointed ought to be thoroughly efficient to discharge the duties of a judge of the Supreme Court; but what we advocate is that the Moslem Judges on the Bench should be at least one-third of the total number.

73. Irrespective of their efficiency ?—No.

74. It is possible that there might not be a sufficient number of competent people, and then I do not see how you can guarantee it ?—We do not advocate a Muhammadan dummy to go into the High Court of Justice. Whoever goes there must be efficient.

75. The Chairman : I suppose you would like to know who would be the judge of that efficiency, Mr. Cadogan ?

The Witness : The local Government.

76. Colonel Lane-Fox : As regards what you have said about objecting to the transfer of the subject of Police, its being made a transferred subject; I wonder why you say you want the present system to remain for another five or ten years ? Do you think that the communal tension is going to be very much modified in five or ten years ?—In the present conditions we do not think it safe for these two departments to be handled by the ministers, but in the course of another ten years we feel that there will be more harmony between the two communities.

77. But, surely, the test is not a period of time; the test is when the intensity of the feeling has died down; and if I was a Muhammadan I should certainly ask for somebody to be the judge of when it is safe for the Police to be transferred, when the tension had died down sufficiently. It is not a question of actual time, five or ten years; it is a question of the intensity of the feeling ?—Exactly so.

78. Why do not you ask for the time when your community is satisfied ?—That is what I mean. That is only approximate. It may be fifteen or twenty years. (Khan Bahadur Mir Muzheruddin) Or it may be two years.

79. Sir A. P. Patro : It may be never ?—Just so.

80. Colonel Lane-Fox : Why do not you suggest that some authority should be set up as an authority to judge when your community feels sufficiently safe for this subject to be transferred ? Would that be better than the plan of five or ten years ?—(Mr. Muazzam) The idea was that in the course of another ten years or so the position may be better than now.

81. Supposing there was someone who had the power to judge ?—I think there may be better feelings between the two communities in the course of another ten years, and then it may be time enough to get these subjects handled by the ministers. That is only approximate.

82. But if you give it a date, it is always dangerous; it means people agitating after that time ?—The idea was that so long as this discord and dissension remains it is not safe to have these subjects handled by the ministers.

83. I see what you mean, but I think you are taking a very ineffective way of getting it. What you want is an authority to decide, not a particular time at which the decision shall be taken ?—Not a particular time.

84. As regards what you said about not having sufficient representation in the army in India, of course it is a fact now that if India was handed over to complete Swaraj, the Hindu majority in India would find themselves in the position of being protected by a Muhammadan majority in the army, owing to the fact that the bulk of the army is recruited from the fighting forces in the north, of whom a large proportion are Muhammadans. Therefore you are very well represented ?—We say we want more representation in the military services. The charge is sometimes levelled against the Muhammadan that intellectually he is far behind the other communities, especially in some provinces.

85. But I say to you that at this present moment the majority of the Indian army come from your community ?—We are not talking of the sepoys only; we are taking note of the higher staff, commissioned officers, lieutenants, and so on.

86. The Chairman : But among the Indian officers you will find that the Muhammadans are in the majority ?—(Khan Bahadur Mir Muzheruddin) That is all right, if there is a majority in our community.

87. Sir A. P. Patro : On page 259, at the bottom, you give your comment on Recommendation 9. Do you apply that to the Moslem constituency, or do you apply it to the whole of the Indians in the Madras Presidency ?—(Mr. Muazzam) This is so far as regards the Madras Presidency.

88. So far as your Moslem community is concerned ?—Yes.

89. The franchise you propose relates only to the Moslem constituency ?—Yes.

90. Do I understand that your Memorandum is based on the Nehru Committee's Report ?—I cannot say it is based on it. We thought, after all, the Nehru Committee Report was an important document inasmuch as it was drafted by some of the well-known leaders——

91. That it is an important document, placing before the country the national demand ?—It is not quite that. That is not what we wanted to say.

92. Do I understand you to say that the Nehru Committee Report contains the national demand, and that your Memorandum is based on comments on that ?—We do not say it represents the national demand.

The Chairman : He said exactly the opposite, I understand.

93. Sir A. P. Patro : May I know what is your answer to that ?—We do not say for a moment it contains the national demand of the country.

94. Then why did you take the Nehru Report as the basis for your Memorandum ?—Well, we wanted to attack it, as a matter of fact. We have not made it the basis; we wanted to criticise it, and this Memorandum is in the form of criticism of that report.

95. You are accepting the majority of the recommendations, except those relating to Moslem representation ?—I suppose the main point is relating to the communal representation. That is the most important point, in our view.

96. Please listen to me. Excepting the portion relating to the Mussulman representation, you accept the other recommendations of the Nehru Report ?—No.

97. From beginning to end you say you accept the majority of the recommendations except those relating to the Moslem community ?—Such recommendations as we think would not harm us, we accept, whether they are contained in the Nehru Report or any other report.

98. Could you say why you have taken the Nehru Report as the basis for your Memorandum ?—Well, we found that report referred to in almost every newspaper in the country for a number of months, discussed, re-discussed, and we thought that, after all, some weight ought to be attached to a document which purports to come from the signatories to that document, and this was the best opportunity to attack that document.

99. May I ask how you suggest the overthrow of the whole thing, as you say in the majority of cases you accept Nehru's recommendations ?—If they are harmless, we do.

100. That is, if they are not against the Moslem interests ?—Yes.

101. Is that what you mean ?—I mean nationally, taking it as a national question.

102. So you agree that that is a national question ?—Not that we agree. They have made mistakes on some questions. We have taken the Muhammadan question by itself in our comments.

103. You said Law and Order should be in the hands of the Governor or Government ?—Not necessarily.

104. As a reserved subject ?—More or less as a reserved subject, yes. The effect will be that it will be a reserved subject. That would be the practical effect of it.

105. You want to retain Law and Order still as a reserved subject, even though all other subjects are transferred ?—Yes.

106. Do you agree to Revenue and Irrigation and Forests being transferred ?—Yes.

107. Why ? Is there a danger of communal representation being affected there ? Why should you want those subjects transferred ?—Law and Order are the departments which deal with the safety, with the tranquillity, with the peace of the country, and I suppose that is the foremost consideration in the administration of the country, rather than any revenue matter or irrigation matter.

108. You think Revenue and Irrigation are of minor importance ?—Far minor importance than public tranquillity.

109. That is, without any safeguarding of the revenue interests of the province you can manage the whole of the province ?—I do not say that. In point of importance, I would attach very great importance to public tranquillity and much less to Irrigation, or any other subject.

110. How long have you been an advocate ?—About seventeen years.

111. In your experience of seventeen years, could you tell me any instance where it necessitated Law and Order being in the hands of the Governor ?—Not that it necessitated that, as at present Law and Order is in the hands of the Executive Council.

112. But for the last seventeen years you could not say any instance where you would say Law and Order ought to be in the hands of the Governor ?—No.

113. And Law and Order is administered by Indian members for nine years ?—Yes.

114. And have you any reason to say that Law and Order has not been properly administered during these nine years ?—They have been well administered.

115. What is your reason now for saying that Law and Order should be reserved ?—The minister will be in charge of Law and Order if it is given into his hands, and the desire on the part of the particular minister, whoever he may be, who is in charge of these as transferred subjects, will be to please his constituency. That will be uppermost in his mind as a minister ?—I mean to strengthen his support in the Council. That will be the main idea ; that will be the uppermost idea.

116. In the Mussulmans, also ?—Yes, any man, if he happens to be a minister.

117. The reason you assign, if I understand you correctly, is that the minister in charge of Law and Order under the responsible Government would be influenced by the party in the council ?—Yes.

118. Now, you know from your long experience of seventeen years in the public life of this country that the Executive Council member cannot get on without depending upon the party in the Legislative Council ?—He has to depend to a certain extent.

119. It is impossible for the Executive Councillor to get on in the Madras Council without depending on the parties ?—But our actual experience——

120. I am asking about actual experience ; I do not want imagination. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that an Executive Councillor on the Madras Legislative Council cannot get on without depending upon the parties in the Legislative Council for his subjects ?—That is so.

121. What difference does it make if he becomes a minister ?—There is this difference. The Executive Councillor is secure where he is. That idea of pleasing the party is not uppermost in his mind. It all depends upon how he acts at the moment to get a certain motion sanctioned.

122. I wish you had some experience of the Madras Legislative Council to understand this position ?—I do not deny for the moment that he has to depend upon the support of a certain party ; but that is not all.

123. You said that it should be five years or ten years before Law and Order may be transferred ? —Yes.

124. Who is to fix this limit ? Who is to decide that the psychological moment has arrived for the transfer of Law and Order ? Is it the Governor, or the Parliament, or the Mussulmans ; or who is to decide it ?—No, not the Mussulmans, certainly. It is the Government.

125. Nor the Moslem representatives in the Council ?—No.

126. But it is the Government ?—Yes.

127. What is the Government, then ? Who is the Government ?—The Governor-General in Council.

128. Do I understand you that one-fifth of the judges of the Madras High Court should be Mussulmans ?—One-fifth, yes.

129. And you want also two ministerships in the Madras Government ?—If the number goes up to seven or eight. If the number of ministers is eight.

130. Nobody said about numbers. You do not say anything about eight ?—We certainly do not want two out of three.

131. And one-fifth of the district judgeships and district collectorships, also ?—Well, we are very poorly represented.

132. I am asking you on the question of your claims ?—It is not a fixed ratio, one-fifth or one-sixth ; but what we say is that we ought to be better represented in the Public Services than we are at present.

133. On page 261, you say : "The League, therefore, " advocates separate electorates and separate repre- " sentation in the Legislatures on the population " basis and also recommends that one-third seats " ——" ?—That is a mistake.

134. I am coming to that. Everything is a mistake. " The League, therefore, advocates separ- " ate electorates and separate representation in the " Legislatures on the population basis, and also " recommends that one-third seats in the Central " Legislature should be reserved for the Moslems." So that is your claim, is it not ? The whole of your argument on page 261 leads up to it, and the conclusion your League arrives at is representation according to the Mussulman population of this province ?—Kindly delete " on a population basis."

135. You want to correct it ?—That is to be deleted. That is a mistake.

136. Now let us turn to "Local Bodies." It cannot be a mistake there, also : " Steps should also be taken " to give to the Moslems representation, proportionate " to their population, in local bodies, such as the " Local Boards, Municipalities, Universities, and " Bar-Councils." Is that also a mistake ?—No, that is not so.

137. That is not a mistake ?—No.

138. So the whole predominant idea in the minds of the League members was that there should be representation according to the population ?—No, it is not so.

139. So these two statements you say are mistakes ? —This one * * * " The League, therefore, " advocates separate electorates and separate re- " presentation in the Legislatures on the population " basis "—that is not the idea ; that is a mistake.

140. When did you discover that it was a mistake ? —I think, yesterday.

141. Till then you did not look into your Memorandum at all ?—We did, but somehow it was passed over without being noticed.

142. And also here, under "Local Bodies" ?— That is all right.

143. Then you want in regard to this separation of provinces, the separation of Sind from Bombay : " The League is firmly of opinion that Sind should " be separated from Bombay." Madras and Sind are very far from each other, are they not ?—We have to refer to that, because that was dealt with in the Nehru Report. We do not press it.

144. I do not ask whether you press it or not ; I am only indicating all this to show that you base your Memorandum on the Nehru Committee's Report ?— We have taken up every question which has been dealt with by the Nehru Report, and where we thought that report was defective we have shown what our desire is, and where we thought it was defective in the way that it wanted to be supplemented we have supplemented it in some cases, and where we were in entire agreement we have shown that agreement in our Memorandum.

145. Just one more question. You are not satisfied that dyarchy is working well here and elsewhere. Have you any experience of the working of dyarchy ?—We have had experience in our own Presidency that it has not been working properly.

146. And, therefore, you would recommend no further development, because the present position has not improved ; dyarchy has not improved the present position ; therefore you are not in favour of recommending any advance from the present stage ? Do I understand that ? You say dyarchy is not working satisfactorily, according to you ?—It is not.

147. Therefore political education has not advanced in this Presidency so far as to take any further step in advancing ?—Oh, no. We are politically advancing. That is what I say. We feel that we are politically advancing.

148. You believe we have been politically advancing from 1921 to 1929 ; you think the country here has advanced very far in political matters, political education, political responsibility ?—I think it has advanced to some extent.

149. Nevertheless, you think that Law and Order should not be transferred ?—So far as those two subjects are concerned, yes.

150. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-lah-Sahib : So far as the question of the transfer of Law and Order is concerned, you have not mentioned it in your Memorandum. May I take it that this question was not considered by your League ?—Incidentally we discussed it, but we have not embodied it in our Memorandum. I might say that we were divided on the question.

151. You could not arrive at any unanimous opinion ?—That is so.

152. And because there was a division of opinion you could not include it in your Memorandum ?—Yes.

153. What you said just now in the matter is only your personal opinion ?—I think it is the opinion of the majority.

154. Sir Hari Singh Gour : If it were the opinion of the majority it should have gone into the Memorandum ?—As there was unanimity on all subjects except on the question of Law and Order, we did not include it in our Memorandum.

155. Colonel Lane-Fox : You definitely agreed to leave it out of your Memorandum ?—Yes.

156. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-lah-Sahib : Having agreed to leave it out of your Memorandum what you have expressed just now is only your personal opinion ?—Not only my own opinion, but also the opinion of some others.

157. It is by no means the unanimous opinion of your League ?—No.

158. As regards the question of joint electorates you said that you have some experience of its working in the city of Madras ?—Yes.

159. And you said that there were two Muhammadan representatives who were put up by the Congress. Do they not represent the Moslem view ?—The electors feel, and rightly feel, that those who are returned by the Congress party, although they may be Muhammadans, do not really represent Muhammadan feelings and interests.

160. That is the view of the Moslem electorate here ?—Yes.

161. It is on this basis that you want a separate electorate for Muhammadans ?—Yes.

162. So far as the joint electorates are concerned, you know that they are in actual working in all the municipalities and District Boards ?—Yes.

163. As you are aware, there are 25 District Boards in this Presidency. Ever since the franchise was given to these bodies has there been any case in which a Moslem has been returned for the Presidentship of any of the Boards ?—No, none has been returned.

164. Even as regards the election of Municipal Councillors, have they been returned in proportion to their population ?—No.

165. And, therefore, the Government very often resorts to nomination to make up the proportion ?—Yes.

166. That is the experience not only of one District Board, but of the Boards in the whole Presidency ?—Yes.

167. You were referring to the one-fifth proportion that is to be maintained in the Public Services and to the G. O. which the Government of Madras has recently passed supporting this claim. The present representation of the Moslem community in the Public Services is very poor; it is not even according to the population basis. If I read your evidence correctly, what you mean is that you want one-fifth representation to be given in all the Services of this Presidency till you get your proportion, and that you will not be requiring it eternally ?—Yes, that is so.

168. Do you press for one-fifth always, or only as a temporary measure to make up your proportion ?—When once we get 20 per cent. we need not go further.

169. What you have said with reference to the Moslem community applies also to the other minority communities, I mean the Christians, the Depressed Classes, and so on ?—Yes.

170. Are you in favour of recommending separate electorates for the Depressed Classes in this Presidency ?—Yes.

171. Mr. Siva Rao : In the case of the transfer of Law and Order, in reply to a question put by Sir A. P. Patro, you told us that these departments have been in the hands of Indians, and they have been so far administered well ?—Yes.

172. Have there been any instances in which the Legislative Council of Madras has not stood by Law and Order during the Reform period of 9 years ? Has there been any conflict between the Executive and the Legislative Council in the administration of Law and Order ?—None to my knowledge so far.

173. May I draw your attention to the recommendations made by Khan Bahadur M. Abdulla Ghattala, who wants that all the subjects including Law and Order should be transferred ? Do you differ from him ?—Yes.

174. Was he not a member of the Legislative Council ?—Yes, he was for 3 years.

175. Your Memorandum, so far as I can see, has taken the form of criticism of the Nehru recommendations; in some cases you have differed from the Report, in some places you have suggested modifications. May I take it that in all other respects you endorse the conclusions of the Nehru Committee ?—As I have submitted already, the most important questions are separate electorates and a larger representation of Muhammadans in public services.

176. Subject to that reservation you endorse the proposals of the Nehru Committee as to the form which the Government in the future should take ?—So far as we have expressed agreement with anything that is contained in the Nehru report you can take it definitely that we are in favour, but if we have not dealt with any question taken up by them I cannot express any opinion.

177. You said that your reference on page 261 to separate representation in the legislatures on the population basis is a mistake. What other basis would you suggest for representation in the Madras provincial legislature ?—Fifteen per cent.

178. If it is not on the basis of population what is the basis on which you want 15 per cent, ?—Whatever concession we may get here the same will be given to Hindus wherever they are in a minority; it will be reciprocal.

179. I am not talking about the reservation of seats for the Hindus. You say that you do not want to fix your representation on the population basis. If it is fixed on the population basis, so far as the Madras Presidency is concerned, your number will be about 8 ?—Yes.

180. Now you have got about 13. What basis would you fix for retaining the 13 seats ?—We have 13 because of the Lucknow Pact.

181. In addition to separate electorates and separate representation would you still ask for a voice in the return of Hindu candidates from the joint electorates ?—No.

182. Mr. Thomas : You said that you are in favour of manhood suffrage ?—Yes.

183. Do you think that under the existing circumstances manhood suffrage will be a practical proposition in all the provinces ? Would it not be a very great strain on the electoral machinery ?—It will be.

184. In your Memorandum you recommend Rs3 tax ?—That is so far as Madras is concerned.

185. Have you any special reasons why the same limit should not be fixed for other constituencies ? The same limit may be fixed for all constituencies unless we want the Government to be more representative.

186. Diwan Bahadur Reddiyar : May I know, sir, if the Nehru Committee recommended the transfer of all subjects without any reservation ?—Yes.

187. Have you got a copy of the Nehru Report ?—Yes.

188. Will you please point out the particular recommendations of the Nehru Committee on which you say that they recommended the transfer of all subjects ? You look at 22 and 23 ?—I do not find anything about the transfer.

189. Please read 28 and 29 also ?—Number 28 says, " The legislative power of a province shall be " vested in the King and the local Legislative " Council." Number 29 says, " There shall be a " Governor for every province who shall be appointed " by the King and represent His Majesty in the " province."

190. Read 43 and 44.—" The executive power of " the province shall be vested in the Governor " acting on the advice of the provincial executive " council." " There shall be an executive council " for every province consisting of not more than " five ministers appointed by the Governor."

191. These are the recommendations of the Nehru Report on which you base your statement that the Nehru Committee have recommended the transfer of all subjects ?—I do not think our Memorandum mentions that.

192. Your Memorandum does not specifically say so. But you told me that according to your reading of the Nehru Report that report has recommended the transfer of all subjects ?—Yes. (At this stage Sir John Simon took the chair.)

193. And you base that statement with regard to the " Provincial Executive " on recommendations Numbers 43 and 44 ?—No.

194. May I point out that in your Memorandum you accept these recommendations subject to some amendments which do not touch this question at all. Read page 260 of your Memorandum. You say " The League endorses in general the recommendations (Numbers 43, 44 and 45), subject to the following " amendments," and you give only two amendments ? —We have not gone into the question fully.

195. You have accepted those recommendations subject to two provisos ?—I do not think we have dealt with the transfer of subjects.

196. Very well, I do not want to press the point. This Memorandum was passed at a meeting of your League ?—Yes.

197. And it was not reconsidered or in any way modified at subsequent meetings ?—Yes.

198. Sir Arthur Froom : With regard to the question of the transfer of Police, in reply to a question put by Colonel Lane-Fox you said that at present your League was against the transfer of Police to a minister and you fixed the period at 5 or 10 years. Colonel Lane-Fox suggested that there should be some referee to decide this question—either the Governor of the province or the Governor-General in Council. I put it to you that after a certain period the question may be decided by common consent ?—Yes I agree that it should be decided by common consent.

199. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : On page 261 you say that your League is strongly of opinion that the time is not yet ripe for the introduction of joint electorates. How long do you think it will take before joint electorates could be introduced ?—It is difficult to say how long it will take.

200. Will you agree to a certain time limit being fixed for separate electorates ?—I do not think I can do that.

201. You do not agree to a time limit being fixed for separate electorates and then automatically, after that period, to go to the joint electorate ? —No, I do not think we can fix any period like that.

202. You would not fix any period, but would leave it to the future council to decide after a certain period to abolish the separate electorate or not ? —We cannot specify any period.

203. When you are referring to your criticisms on the Nehru Report, do you submit the Nehru Report along with your Memorandum to the Conference ?— No, we do not do it. We have submitted our Memorandum.

204. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : Your grievance is that there are no elected Moslems as chairmen on the local bodies ?—Yes.

205. There are nominated Moslem candidates as chairmen of such bodies ?—Yes.

206. And what about the municipal boards ? Are there any Moslem chairmen on the municipal boards ?—Yes, there is one here by my side.

207. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-lah Sahib : There are more.—Yes, there are about half a dozen.

208. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : Who elects the chairmen ?—The councillors.

209. They are elected through a joint electorate ? —Yes, on a small scale.

210. Sir Hari Singh Gour : When was your League formed, this Madras Presidency Moslem League, of which you are the spokesman ?—In 1907, I believe.

211. Are you affiliated to the Indian Moslem League ?—We are affiliated to the All-India Moslem League.

212. Of which Mr. Jinnah is the chairman ?—No, Sir Muhammad Shafi.

213. That League came into existence only after the Statutory Commission came into this country ? —Well, we have two All-India Moslem Leagues at present. That is the position.

214. Your Moslem League came into existence in 1907 and was affiliated to the Indian Moslem League ? —Yes.

215. Who was your chairman in 1907 ?—Sir Ali Imam, if I remember right. What happened was that during the days of the Non-co-operation movement these Leagues, wherever they were, were not working, and they were revived as a matter of fact only recently.

216. Your case is that this Moslem League was a branch of the Moslem League of India when it was started in 1907. It was more or less in a dormant state till its activity was revived with the advent of the new Reforms ?—I cannot say that.

217. Then what can you say ?—Even before that I should say it was working actively.

218. That is the assumption I made when I asked you as to who was your president in 1907 ?—I cannot remember.

219. Do you know who was your president at any time before the splitting up of your League into two sections ?—Before the splitting up of the League ?

220. You have said that the All-India Moslem League has been sub-divided. Before its division who was the president ?—I do not remember.

221. Was there not a permanent president ?— There was one. Mr. Jinnah was a permanent president.

222. When did this Moslem League divide itself into two sections ?—Two years ago.

223. Is it not a fact that the Punjab Moslem League has no branches anywhere ?—It has branches.

224. Where ?—Ours is a branch.

225. It is the only branch ?—I do not know that.

226. Have you got any terms of affiliation or any correspondence with Sir Muhammad Shafi's League to show that you belong to that League ? You say you belong to that League ?—Yes.

227. And you do not know as to who are the other leaguers ?—No.

228. When did you become affiliated to Sir Muhammad Shafi's League ?—Two years back.

229. Is yours a registered body ?—It is not a registered body. The All-India Moslem League is a registered body.

230. But Sir Muhammad Shafi's League is not a registered body yet ?—I do not know. We have been having this League for a number of years.

231. You said two years ?—Even prior to that.

232. Prior to that you were a part of the All-India Moslem League ?—Yes.

233. And you know that the All-India Moslem League and Sir Muhammad Shafi's League do not see eye to eye on certain points ?—Sir Muhammad Shafi's League is the All-India Moslem League.

234. I simply call it so because it is an offshoot of the old one ?—You can call it the Jinnah League.

Lord Burnham : I suppose the right thing would be to say, Jinnah's League and Shafi's League.

235. Sir Hari Singh Gour : I am concerned here only with facts ?—As a matter of fact, I do not believe that any League has been registered.

236. How many members have you got ?—We have got between 700 and 800.

237. Can you furnish us the names of the members ? —Yes.

238. Have you got any rules ?—Yes.

239. Do you publish your proceedings ?—Yes.

240. How often have you held your meetings ?— Last year, I believe, we had about eight meetings.

241. Sir Hari Singh Gour : When was this draft presented to the Statutory Commission passed ?

Lord Burnham : If we pursued this matter much further, we should be right off the track of our present enquiry.

242. Sir Hari Singh Gour : I am on the very threshold. I am examining his credentials.

Lord Burnham : Would it not be satisfactory if we obtained the published account of the formation of the League and handed it in to the Secretaries ?

243. Sir Hari Singh Gour : The point I wish to know is, how many people attended the League when this draft was passed ?—We held the meeting in October last.

244. How many people attended the meeting ?—About twenty, I think.

245. Lord Burnham : Has Mr. Jinnah's Association got a branch at all in Madras ?—Just as there are two All-India Moslem Leagues there are two Madras Presidency Moslem Leagues in Madras at the present moment. One is affiliated to the Jinnah League and the other to the Shafi League. I would not call either the All-India Moslem League.

246. Sir Hari Singh Gour : So the All-India Moslem League has now become the Jinnah League and the Shafi League ?—Yes.

247. Out of twenty persons, how many voted for the transfer of Law and Order ?—There was no vote taken as regards that. We discussed the matter and then we found that the majority was not in favour. So far as these recommendations are concerned they were unanimous.

248. I am talking of Law and Order. So just confine yourself to answer the strict question put to you. No vote was taken as to how many persons were in favour of the transfer of Law and Order, and how many against ?—Yes. So far as these recommendations are concerned votes were taken. Then, alongside, we were discussing the other point also, and if I remember aright four were in favour and sixteen against.

249. A majority of persons were against the transfer of Law and Order ?—Yes.

250. Why did you not mention this very striking fact that, with the exception of four dissentients, sixteen members were against transferring Law and Order ?—As I said, the points on which we were unanimous were incorporated in this Memorandum. The rest was ignored.

251. Now, was there any meeting after October to place this draft before the meeting and take their votes ?—Yes.

251A. When did you convene the meeting ?—(Mr. Sharif Khan) The first meeting was in executive committee and this Memorandum was adopted in the executive committee, and then it was placed before a public meeting in the early part of November.

252. Mr. Hartshorn : At that public meeting twenty person were present ?—About three hundred persons were present.

253. Sir Hari Singh Gour : Then, after it was passed, you had no meetings of the League to discuss the draft ?—(Mr. Muazzam) No.

254. Up-to-date ?—No.

255. This draft was drawn up by the executive committee and passed by the public meeting of your League as a final draft. When you went back on that draft on the question of election on a population basis, did you consult your League and tell them that it was a mistake and that you wished to withdraw from it ?—This point was noticed for the first time yesterday.

256. What time did you notice this for the first time ?—In the evening.

257. Did you take early steps to inform the Secretary of the Statutory Commission that a most flagrant mistake which cuts at the very root of your draft had been noticed by you ?—I mentioned this to Mr. Khalif-ul-Lah.

258. Did you inform the Members of the Statutory Commission ?—I have not informed, but I took the opportunity of mentioning it to Mr. Khalif-ul-Lah.

259. Before your attention was drawn to it did you mention that before you gave evidence you wished to point out to the Joint Free Conference that there was a very serious mistake in the whole of this draft, which you wanted to correct ?—I think I should have done that.

260. But you did not do it ?—No.

261. Now, you have admitted in this draft, at page 261, that "it fears that the comparative "ignorance, poverty and want of political awakening "among the Moslem electors will make them tools "in the hands of the candidates and clever election "agents of the other communities." You admit that your community is comparatively ignorant, poor and lacking in political training and experience ?—Yes, compared to the Hindus.

262. And you also admit that your economic backwardness is a very serious handicap to the advancement of your community ?—Yes.

263. Now, if a Parliament wishes to improve the condition of your people and wishes to discuss certain institutions, certain customs which stand in the way of your national advance, which your well-wishers are naturally anxious to remove because they act as a drag upon your social and economic progress, why do you prevent the Councils or a future Parliament from discussing those questions ? Are you not in favour of the social advancement of your own community ?—Religious questions ?

264. I am not dealing with religion. I think you know the distinction between social advance and religious advance ?—Social questions can take the form of religious questions, and generally do. They overlap one another.

265. You and I know the distinction between social and religious questions ?—I will give an instance of how a social question can become a religious question.

266. I am concerned with the question when it does not become a religious question ?—Purely social questions, of course, may be discussed.

267. You object to religious questions being discussed, but you say you have no objection to questions connected with social customs being discussed ?—Yes.

268. Now, coming to the Nehru Report, clause 13 of that report dealt with at page 259 of your Memorandum, is a clause which deals with the power of Parliament ?—Yes.

269. And you say it has the power to make law for the peace, order, and good government for the Commonwealth in relation to all matters ?—Yes.

270. "For the nationals and servants of the "Commonwealth," and so on, and "for the Govern-"ment officers, soldiers," etc., and "for all persons "employed or serving in or belonging to the Royal "Indian Marine," etc. "For greater certainty, "but not so as to restrict the generality of the "foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared "that notwithstanding anything in this Act the "legislative authority of the Parliament of the "Commonwealth extends to all matters coming "within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated "and specified in Schedule I." And then you say in your Memorandum: "The following proviso "shall be added at the end of the recommendation." If you add this proviso at the end, you will be satisfied with clause 13 ?—I should think so.

271. But then that would contradict the whole of the rest of your draft ?—How ?

272. I shall point out to you. Those are plenary powers of Parliament to legislate for the peace, order and good government of which Parliament is the sole judge. There is absolutely no appeal against the supremacy of this Parliament, and if you add that proviso, it affects the whole of your draft ?—I beg to differ.

273. What is the good of differing from me ? You may differ from me, but you cannot alter the facts. If you alter that clause in the way you suggested, it gives Parliament complete power. Parliament is the final and ultimate authority over which and above which there is no such thing as Governor, or the King in Council or the Supreme Court ?—That clause is subject to this proviso so that puts a restriction on the power of Parliament.

274. I have added that proviso, and having inserted that, you have done away with the reservation of Law and Order for five or ten years, or any number of years. You have finished with that and there is no question of reservation of Law and Order after that ?—As I said, the matter was discussed, and we did not incorporate it in our Memorandum, because——

275. I am not concerned with that. You have already told us that you stand by Clause 13 with your proviso added. Therefore, I asked you that question whether you were prepared to accept that clause with that proviso, and you said yes ?—Yes.

276. Then in that case your opinion that Law and Order should be reserved, and all that will disappear ?—I fail to see how this clause affects the reservation of those subjects.

277. It says that Parliament has got all powers to make laws for peace, order and good government. It has got the law-making power. Anyhow, I do not want to pursue that matter. What is your object, you want the creation of a national India or a Moslem India ?—Our ultimate object is a national India.

278. Therefore, everything else is subservient to the creation of a national India, and as such you ask the Joint Free Conference to concert such plan as will ultimately be conducive to the creation of a national India ?—Yes.

279. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : You said that your League is affiliated to the All-India Moslem League ?—Yes.

280. As a matter of fact, in this country there are two Leagues, one at Lahore and the other at Calcutta ?—Yes.

281. One of the Leagues is under Sir Muhammad Shafi and the other is under Mr. Jinnah, and the raison d'être for the existence of those two separate Leagues is evidently the difference of opinion on the question of separate electorates ?—Yes, that is the main question.

282. This question came into existence, you remember, in 1909, when the first deputation of the Muhammadan community waited on Lord Minto at Simla ?—Yes.

283. After that, this question has been in India as an expression of policy on the part of the Muhammadan community ?—Yes.

284. You will admit that it exists in this country as the mainspring of the Muhammadan policy ?—Yes.

285. In demanding these separate electorates for the Moslem community in your Presidency, you are only voicing the sentiments of the Muhammadans as a whole all over India ?—Yes, in the matter of separate electorates.

286. With regard to the other questions which you have dealt with in your Memorandum, have you taken the approval of the Central League at Lahore in regard to those proposals ?—No.

287. By your constitution are you not obliged to take the sanction of that League ?—I do not think so.

288. Supposing you differ in some points from the political tenets of that body, then you are no longer affiliated to that body ?—Of course not. The main question on which we are at one is the question of separate electorates. It is only in regard to that main question that we are not in agreement with the Jinnah League.

289. You said that there are about half-a-dozen chairmen of local bodies who are Muhammadans ?—Out of 84 municipalities, there may be four or five.

290. Will you please tell me to which part of the Presidency these chairmen belong ?—One is in Saidapet, about five miles from here.

291. The Chairman : May I know who is the chairman of that municipality ?—Khan Bahadur Abdul Razzak.

292. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : What is the ratio of the Muhammadan population there ?—(Khan Bahadur Abdul Razzak) It is about one-ninth.

293. Then, if you are returned by this constituency what fear have you got with regard to joint electorate ?—The members are elected by the ward electorates, and the chairman is elected by the ward councils. In the ward elections there are Muhammadan voters also, about one-fourth or one-third in some wards. In some wards they go unrepresented. The municipality is a compact place with a limited area. I am sorry to have to speak on my own behalf. I am a native of that place. I am very popular there, and that is why I have been elected. I have been continuously serving my municipality for the last fifteen years. However, this solitary instance cannot be compared with other municipalities in the Madras Presidency, because there will be no other instance to be found like mine. Out of 84 municipalities in the Presidency, I think there are only four or five which have got a Muhammadan as chairman, but then in those few cases you will find that about 50 per cent. are Muhammadans. Negapatam is an instance in point.

294. Can you not depend entirely on your special circumstances ?—No. For instance, I cannot myself claim to become a President of the Chingleput municipality, and no Muhammadan in the Madras Presidency can dream of becoming a chairman of any District Board through election. (Mr. Muazzam) My friend is the exception which proves the rule.

295. Then on the question of the transfer of Law and Order, you say that you would rather have Law and Order as a reserved subject for the Presidency till the communities have peace among themselves ?—(Mr. Muazzam) Yes.

296. And you cannot fix any definite period for that peace to come up ?—No.

297. I think what you mean by that is that as soon as there is peace between the two communities, directly you are willing to transfer Law and Order, is it so ?—Under the present condition it is not advisable that Law and Order should be placed in the hands of a Minister. I would not fix any time. Until some time has elapsed, until the relations between the two communities grow more harmonious, and until they decide between themselves to have it as a transferred subject, it should be in the hands of a Governor. That was my suggestion.

298. Dr. Suhrawardy : Are you aware that in 1909 the Muhammadans headed by His Highness the Aga Khan waited on Lord Minto and formulated the Moslem demand ?—Yes.

299. Is it not a fact that among the various demands that we placed before Lord Minto, a demand for separate electorates, not merely separate electorates, but also separate representation, and not merely separate representation on the population basis of the Mussulmans, but also based on their historical and political importance was placed before Lord Minto ?—Yes.

300. Is it not a fact that when in last December His Highness the Aga Khan presided over a conference of all Moslem parties in Delhi, the same demands were reiterated ?—Yes.

301. May I take it that in page 261 of your Memorandum where you say : "The League, therefore, "advocates separate electorates and separate "representation in the legislatures on the population "basis," you now say that it is a mistake and that the basis should be their "Political importance" ?—Yes.

302. You say that you want representation in excess of your population basis on the ground of your political importance and other considerations ?—Yes.

303. Sir Hari Singh Gour put certain questions to you in regard to your social matters and you said that you have no objection to purely social questions being discussed in the legislature ?—Yes.

304. May I enquire whether Sir Hari Singh Gour has now got a number of Bills pending in the Legislative Assembly affecting various social matters in India ?—Yes.

305. Would those things be considered as affecting the religious and social questions of the Mussulmans ?—I think they will be considered as affecting their social questions.

306. You say that : "Clause (xx) is necessary "with a view to preventing the majority communities "from tyrannizing over a minority community by "interfering with the latter's religious and social "customs" ?—Yes.

307. You say on page 259, "provided that, not" withstanding any provision in this Act or in any " British or Indian Law for the time being in force, " the Parliament shall not, without the previous " sanction of the Governor-General, discuss any " Bill, resolution or motion, affecting the religion or " religious or social customs having the force of " religion of any community whatsoever and no " such Bill, resolution or motion shall have legal " effect unless three-fourths of the members, rep- " resenting such community in the Parliament " and present at the session, vote in favour of the " Bill, resolution or motion." Is it not a fact that the politically minded Mussulmans are necessarily religious minded ? Are you aware that Mr. Jinnah is the leader of a group of Moslems in the Assembly, for instance ?

The Chairman : We need not take any instance.

The Witness : There are very few like that. There may be some.

208. Dr. Suhrawardy : The object of my question is this. In view of the fact that there is difference amongst the Moslems—there are different sects of Moslems for instance and what is considered lawful by one sect may be considered unlawful by another—would it not be a better safeguard if you have instead of what is stated in the Memorandum, a sentence to the following effect : " that if a substantial minority " or influential minority of the members of that " community object to the resolution," or something like that ?—You want to put it the other way ?

309. Yes, in view of the present conditions. There is the Child Marriage Bill for example ?—Yes, that is a better safeguard.

Memorandum submitted on behalf of the Depressed Classes of the Madras Presidency by the Committee appointed by the Conference held on the 29th January, 1928, at the Pachaiyappa College Hall, Madras.

GENERAL.

The Depressed Classes of the Madras Presidency form nearly one-fifth of the total population and are subjected to innumerable disabilities and oppressions by the rest of the population. The early history of the Depressed Classes and their present condition of appalling degradation are monumental proofs that their forefathers were treated by their countrymen in a manner worse than the beasts. In the name of the man-made system of caste, demoralising and degenerating in its effects, and which in fact, is a negation of "Equal opportunities to all," the so-called high-caste people, availing themselves of their numerical majority and wealth, deny to us even the very elementary rights of citizenship. It is well-known that we are treated as untouchables, unapproachables, unseeables and, might we say, unthinkables. This spirit of oppression is carried to such a degree that we are denied access even to roads, tanks, wells, springs, schools, hospitals, choultries (inns) and other institutions maintained with public funds. We are segregated in despicable cherries and slums and designedly kept out of contact with the rest of the people. We are mainly agricultural labourers and form the backbone of the Revenue Administration of, and great asset to, the country. That we are now landless does not however belittle our important position we occupied from time immemorial in the affairs of the State. In fact, we have always been on the soil and attached to it, even though the legal ownership thereof may have changed hands from time to time. Any attempt to improve ourselves is viewed with jealousy and malice by the caste people who, in spite of their professions on political platforms and elsewhere, are, in practice, opposed to, and even throw obstacles in the way of, our progress. Others even argue that, by birth, we are doomed only to servitude and illiteracy thus invoking the aid of the "Law of Karma." We are extremely anxious to point out that every argument, religious, social or political, is used by them to keep us in a state of serfdom which, it will be realised, a lazy land-owning class is interested in doing. Had it not been for the advent of the benevolent Britisher, we assert that our position would have been still worse, and what little progress we have had so far would not have been a fact. Here we make bold to suggest that our progress and the solution of what is now the most difficult and knotty problem in India, namely, the upliftment of the Depressed Classes would have been an accomplished fact if the Britisher had at the very inception taken the necessary steps to remove untouchability and other social iniquities that we are subjected to.

We feel that we ought to make our position clear to the honourable members of the Commission that their present task will be rendered ineffective and useless should they be of opinion that the questions relating to the Depressed Classes do not come within the scope of their enquiry, but that they should be left purely to public opinion in India. Government, and particularly Responsible Government, is but a society organised in a particular manner for certain purposes, and, when a community is beyond the pale of society it will also be beyond the pale of Government if the constitution does not take into consideration the questions and problems relating to that community and make special provisions to safeguard its interests. Whatever constitution the Indian Statutory Commission may ultimately frame for India it is earnestly hoped that the facts set forth above will be kept in mind and proper safeguards provided for the Depressed Classes to enable them to retain and utilise the political power. In the light of these circumstances we make the following suggestions :—

1. Representation in the Legislatures :
   (a) That the number of seats in all the legislatures should be in proportion to our population.
   (b) The mode of representation should contain at some stage or other an elective element.
2. Representation in the Government :
   (a) At least there must be one member of the Depressed Classes in the Government of India (Governor-General's Executive Council).
   (b) At least two seats should be reserved for the Depressed Classes in the Provincial Government. (Provincial Cabinet.)
3. Representation in the Services :
   (a) Military : Fifty per cent. of the officers recruited and the majority of the men in each unit of the army should be recruited from the Depressed Classes.
   (b) Navy : Do. Do.
   (c) Civil Service : Proportionate representation in all the Civil Services, Imperial and Provincial, with special arrangements, should be provided for the Depressed Classes. Special arrangement should be made for the recruitment to the village officers and the police. The system of hereditary village officers ought to be promptly abolished and circumstantial chances ought to be given to the deserving members of the Depressed Classes.

Economic Position :—The lot of the agricultural labourer belonging to the Depressed Classes is not at all a happy one and he is virtually, though not technically, a serf. The terms and conditions of labour are too exacting and hard to think of. They do not get living wages and the hours of work are unlimited. Wages should therefore be paid in coin and not in unwholesome grain in short measures. The lands leased out to them by the caste Hindus are not often registered and the terms are very exacting. There should be a law protecting the agriculturalist from all such oppressions. One solution that suggests itself to our mind is that the Government should start agricultural colonies in each district for the Depressed Classes and introduce therein the latest methods of production.

Education.—We need not stress upon the obvious importance of providing special facilities for the education of the Depressed Classes. Industrial and vocational schools and a large number of scholarships ought to be provided for. Free Compulsory Education should be introduced and special scholarships for higher education in foreign countries should also be given.

Special.

(a) Government ought to introduce social legislation with penal clauses for the improvement of the conditions of the Depressed Classes particularly in respect of untouchability.

(b) The subject of the "Depressed Classes" should be made a portfolio under the charge of the Depressed Classes Member in the Viceroy's and the Provincial Executive Councils and in each province the "Protector" of the Depressed Classes should be assisted by a Board composed of the members of the Depressed Classes.

(c) A certain definite proportion of the Revenues of the Central Government and Provincial Governments should be set apart and earmarked for the work of the Depressed Classes.

We, in conclusion, pray that the honourable members of the Statutory Commission may be pleased to pay, as we have no doubt they will, their earnest consideration to the solution of the problem of the Depressed Classes and request that the Chairman may be pleased to give us a further opportunity to furnish details later.

SUPPLEMENTARY MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE MADRAS DEPRESSED CLASSES CONFERENCE OF 1928.

The Committee appointed at the Depressed Classes Conference of the Presidency of Madras, held at the Pachiappa's College Hall, on the 29th January, 1928, to submit a Memorandum to the Indian Statutory Commission, has already submitted its Memorandum to the Commission. The Conference was a public one and of a representative character, in which the members representing the Depressed Classes on the Legislative Council, Presidents of Associations and delegates from the Districts and leading men took part.

I, as the President, beg to submit the following Memorandum as a supplement to the one submitted by the Committee, showing the condition of the Depressed Classes before and since the advent of the British in India, their Political advancement, the effect of the introduction of English education, the Indianisation of the Services, the Local Self-Governing Institutions, the Revenue Department, Untouchability, Conversion, Depressed Classes Welfare, Dominion Status and granting of full Self-Government. The Depressed Classes are of the Dravidian race. When the Aryans immigrated and settled in Southern India those portions of the Dravidian population that had not embraced the caste system were cut off from all connections with the caste-bound communities, as unsociable. The Depressed Classes (Dravidians) organised their own Community on a self-supporting basis and lived in separate locations, now known as cheries. Since then, the Caste Hindus worked against them, taking away their rights and privileges, depriving them of their lands and all means of making a living, and despising them as untouchables. Many of the Dravidians left in groups and assumed caste system. When the Muhammadans invaded India and came to the South, a great number of Dravidians were converted to Islamism. At that period the strength of the Dravidians was very low and oppression from the Caste Hindus was high. When the Britishers began to rule India, though they abolished the slave system and made laws common and applicable to all, irrespective of high and low caste and colour, they never ventured to abolish the system of caste—a system which enabled one section of the people to rule over the other by oppression. But they adopted a policy to reserve education in Arts and Science for the high caste people only. Such a policy strengthened the hands of the higher classes to oppress the Dravidians more and more as they gained possession in service in all branches of the administration, while the Christian Missionaries, who followed the British, converted the Depressed Classes in large numbers.

Further, the local Self-Governing institutions and Panchayats (village Boards and Courts) completely placed the Depressed Classes at the mercy of the oppressors. The oppression is felt more keenly than ever before, the Britishers remaining the nominal rulers.

Such being the condition of the oppressed untouchables the granting of full Self-Government to India in any form is to condemn unjustifiably for all the future generations the sixty millions of peace-loving peasants and field labourers, who have been loyal to the British Throne, in this great agricultural country.

I, therefore, am of opinion that steps at giving Self-Government should be by slow stages.

POLITICAL ADVANCEMENT.

It is said in some quarters that the plea now advanced by the British Government against the political advancement of India is the deplorable condition of the Depressed Classes, and this is brought to the forefront as if they are solicitous of the welfare of the Depressed Classes and that the Depressed Classes are blissfully ignorant of their own depressed condition, and that they are unconscious of the political, social and economic disabilities under which they are labouring. This is incorrect. For as long ago as 1892 the Depressed Classes formed a Society of their own under the name of the Pariah Mahajana Sabha and conducted a journal under the name "Pariah" and ventilated their grievances and disabilities through its columns and sent in a Memorial to the British House of Commons against the holding of the I.C.S. examination simultaneously in England and India as they thought that that would do immense harm and prayed that they should be secured against the tyranny of the caste system, Untouchability, which so long as it remains unremoved will crush them in the future as it has crushed them in the past, bringing discredit on the Government and arresting the progress of a people, who need but development of their character by education and improvement of their social position by effacement of the cramping and demoralising caste system which has hitherto held them in the grip of vice to become one of the most potent factors in the regeneration of the country and the strongest bulwarks of the British rule pregnant with great potentialities. Ever since that epoch-making event, the untouchables have continuously been making political agitation and since the reforms of 1919, the Government had to deal with the Depressed and the Backward communities. It was only since the Reforms that the high class Hindus commenced to write and make platform speeches openly about the removal of untouchability with a view to gain Self-Government.

Before introducing a system of democratic Government into India, the British Government, who had experience of more than a century and a half of ruling mixed races here and elsewhere should have waited to see that benefits of Western education, which they introduced, have reached the lower strata of society as well. But the way in which the British Government have yielded to the incessant agitation and demands of the higher strata of the Indian society and brought about these Reforms acts as a pressure brought to bear upon the lower classes from above. The Depressed Classes do not understand and are not prepared to take part. Besides it has proved as a measure adopted for the high caste oppressors to rule over the lower Depressed. I, therefore, consider the extension of the degree of responsible Government should be to the extent the Depressed Classes of the country are able to share that responsibility by the improvement of their educational and economic standards. The Government should bestir themselves in this direction if they are bent upon introducing responsible Self-Government.

The strength of the conservative caste element is so great as to place obstacles in the way and retard the future progress of the Depressed Classes. If the fear that seems to have been entertained by the British Government that if the Depressed Classes are elevated above their station in life by means of education, it would lead to general convulsion of which the foreigners will be the first victims be true, it is high time that the British Government should change that idea and hasten the growth of education and general improvement of the Depressed Classes.

EDUCATION.

The Policy of the Government a century ago seems to have been to educate in Western Arts and Science Indians of high classes who had wealth and influence over the minds of their countrymen, so that English education and civilization may gradually descend from the higher to the lower classes and that the higher classes may be fitted to share in the Civil administration of the country.

The Government should have been well aware at the time that the lower classes were hated and despised by the higher classes, but they never thought that by such an education and a share in the administration the higher classes would be helped to oppress the lower. The Government should have sought means to impart Western education to the Lower Classes by degrees in order that they may be enabled and prepared to withstand the tyranny and oppression of the higher classes. The Government in their attempts to educate the lower classes instead of taking the responsibility upon themselves and imparting education on a basis of neutrality of religion passed it on to the Christian Missionaries who while getting subsidies from the Government imparted education to the higher classes and converted the lower classes to their religion. Thus the higher classes derived the additional advantage of Western education for oppressing the lower and the lower had the disadvantage of losing not only their faith but also their numerical strength.

Another attempt to educate the Depressed Classes —Panchamas—was made about the year 1892 by a G. O. No. 68, Educational dated 1st Feb., 1893, which was considered as the Magna Charta of the Depressed. When it was put into operation, it was found that teachers from the Depressed Classes were not available and teachers from the higher classes would not condescend to approach the untouchables. The higher classes resented and opposed; the Missionaries who had schools and proselytising agencies, were indifferent to the education of the Depressed Classes unless it helped their own cause—conversion. This G. O. remains a dead letter. The Missionaries had their harvest of intelligent and promising young men and women for over a period of 50 years, leaving the Depressed Community considerably weakened, ignorant and helpless. What the Missionaries have done in imparting education to the Depressed Classes in exchange of their faith, though against their conscience, the Government could have done to the community tenfold by giving education on the basis of neutrality of religion at least by degrees, as the higher classes have advanced in higher education. There would have been enough number of teachers among the Depressed Classes, when the G. O. was passed and the untouchable communities, would have then advanced far ahead. There was neglect—a serious neglect—on the part of the Government for over a century in ameliorating the condition of the untouchables to the extent to which they could have done, if they only cared to do so.

The last attempt the Government made, was to establish a special department for the amelioration of the educational and economic condition of the Depressed Classes. Within a few years of its inception the Ministerial party, in power in the Madras Legislative Council, passed a resolution to transfer efficient higher grade officers and placed instead lower grade inferior officers to work in the District under the Collectors, whose establishments are overwhelmed with the traditional enemies of the Depressed Classes and even attempts were made in the Council to abolish the Department altogether. The Commissioner of Labour was placed in a position to have no direct control over the District Labour officers and the work of the Department in the Districts, was thus crippled. With all the impediments and disadvantages placed on the District Labour officers by the high caste men, the Department managed to establish a fair number of schools in the Districts. Education in these Schools imparted on the basis of religious neutrality is well appreciated by the parents of the Depressed Classes children and it is hoped secondary schools of this kind would come into existence in the various centres.

In the District, Taluq, Union and Village Boards, though a few politically minded men are in favour, the others of the higher classes who sit on these Boards throw their weight so heavily in opposition and hinder the easy and rapid spread of education among the Depressed Classes.

Admission to public schools is not easy. The sense of untouchability and the spirit of hatred still runs high in the Districts. In the elementary schools the teachers from the Depressed Classes are not many and in the secondary schools and colleges we should say nil. So are the Inspectors. I am of opinion that the present system of imparting education through the Local Self-Governing bodies, will not do any good to the Depressed Classes. All schools should therefore be under the direct control of the Government. Education to the Depressed Classes from the secondary to the collegiate course should be free. Municipalities, District, Taluk and Village Boards should contribute to the General Education. The District educational councils should be abolished. Aided agencies that compete with the state institutions should be discouraged.

Compulsory and free education under the supervision of special Agency is the only means by which the Depressed Classes acquire any literary knowledge. But the extreme poverty in which the Government and the Caste Hindus have placed the Depressed parents, does not permit them to feed their school-going children. They are obliged to work for one meal a day. If taken to school these children will be deprived of their midday-meal. Free boarding schools in village centres of untouchables can only solve the problem. The Government that overlooked the education of these untouchables and spent public revenue on the education of the higher classes and the higher classes who were thus benefited and are living upon the lower classes—untouchable labourers need not in any sense lag behind in imparting education to the Depressed Classes from the public revenues. The special educational facilities for the untouchables should be a charge on the Revenue of the Government of India.

INDIANISATION OF THE SERVICES.

The whole of the public service with the exception of the top of it and a sprinkling of Muhammadans and Indian Christians, whose number is negligible, is occupied by the Caste Hindus. The following figures taken from the last Budget estimate (1927-28) will show the number of men in the regular service.

DEPARTMENTS.	Officers Clerks and others.	Menials.
Revenue and General Administration	8,280 ..	6,794
Excise	1,269 ..	3,485
Forest	1,284 ..	2,301
Registration	2,981 ..	1,332
Irrigation	155 ..	137
Justice	6,278 ..	8,518
Jails	378 ..	1,652
Police—Officers 124, Inspectors 358, Sub-Inspectors 1,648, Clerks 755, Constables 26,823	29,688 ..	,61
Medical Health Officers ..	2,481 ..	3,099
Agriculture, Industry and Fisheries	1,615 ..	687
Education—Other than Teachers 2,896, Teachers approximately 62,000	64,896 ..	1,204
Village Officers (Talayaries and Veties not included) ..	40,186 ..	—

To the above if the number of men in the Postal and Telegraph Departments and municipalities are added the approximate number of men employed in all services will be over 200,000. The menials that do repulsive works are excluded.

Out of such a large number, I doubt whether there are even a few hundreds of men belonging to the Depressed Classes. I beg to bring to the notice of the Honourable Commission that in a Province where all the Departments of Government are administered by Caste Hindus, the chances of these small number to rise amidst them are none. The only chance that is left to the oppressed Depressed Classes is, to look up to the "Britishers, whose earnest breadth of view and inherited liberal traditions associated with their national history render them better fitted for the peculiarly arduous task of ruling mixed populations, such as are found in India, than the Caste-ridden Hindus whose thought and tendencies ingrained by heredity and dominated by insensate, but none the less imperative customs of centuries are concealed by the thin veneer of English education," as stated in a memorial submitted by the Depressed Classes to the Imperial Parliament in 1894. I am of opinion that a very large proportion of Europeans should remain in service till the Depressed Classes also are sufficiently advanced to take their proper and legitimate share in the administration of the country. It is true that with a liberal view to encourage the Depressed Classes and to fulfil the terms of the Royal Proclamation of 1858, the Government have from time to time passed and issued several orders entitling the members of the Depressed Classes to special and preferential consideration in the matter of appointments but experience has shown that all these measures have been rendered futile.

MEDICAL AND ENGINEERING DEPARTMENTS.

When the Medical Department was established the Hindus were averse to enter into that noble profession. Young men of the Depressed Classes with a limited knowledge of English entered that service and rose up to District Surgeons and Health Officers. But eventually when the higher classes also began to seek service in the Department the standard of qualification for entrance was raised so high as to shut the Depressed Classes entirely out of it. Such is the case of the Engineering department also.

THE MILITARY SERVICES.

The Depressed Classes of India even from the earlier days have been a very martial race. When the Britishers recruited men for the army it was the Depressed Classes of Southern India who joined the service freely and fought and conquered for the British in and out of India. They rose to high ranks and distinguished themselves in several heroic deeds. But unfortunately the regiments which contained them have been disbanded, throwing the men out into poverty. I, therefore, think that in organising any system of defence, Government would do well to recruit men from among the descendants of those men of martial spirit. In recruiting young men for officers they may also be drawn from the descendants of retired officers of the disbanded army.

JUDICIAL SERVICE.

From the village magistrate to the Honourable the Judges of the High Court including members of their establishments (excepting sweepers) numbering some thousands are all high caste men. Early attempts should therefore be made for some representation by the Depressed Classes in this important department.

POLICE.

Out of an army of about 30,000 policemen one can count by his finger ends the number of the Depressed Classes men in it. The number of Mahomedans and Christians is not large. A very large proportion of these peace preserving men are caste Hindus—the traditional enemies and oppressors of the untouchables. Most of the trying Magistrates are Hindus—The oppressed are too poor to get justice. I wish to suggest to the Honourable members of the Commission that Government should recruit from the Depressed Classes till the strength of the Depressed Classes reaches at least one fourth of the entire Police force.

JAILS.

The treatment in jails of criminals belonging to the Depressed Classes requires change. However hardened the criminal of a high caste may be he is given light and clean sort of work while a Depressed Classes criminal even if he is convicted of a paltry crime is given hard and dirty work such as scavenging.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNING BODIES.

These bodies exist for the benefit of the higher classes only. The lighting and sanitary arrangements in the locality of the Depressed Classes are generally neglected as also the institutions intended for the benefit of the Depressed Classes. The extreme poverty of the Depressed Classes generally disqualifies them from the franchise and under the existing conditions, it is absolutely impossible for any member of the Depressed Classes to get into any of these bodies in an open election. Their interests are now represented by nomination. These nominations are generally made by the Presidents of the District Boards and by the Government acting on the recommendation of the District Collectors in the case of Municipalities. The Presidents of Local Boards being castemen themselves and having been raised to their position by the support of the caste Hindus who are mostly the employers of the Depressed Classes labour, often make it a point to undermine the interests of the Depressed Classes in making these nominations. Even in spite of the existence of intelligent and capable men possessing sufficient education and knowledge to understand things, the appointing authorities generally select only ignorant and illiterate persons who can be used as mere tools by the castemen to suit their own purposes against the communities whose interest they are nominated to represent and protect. In several cases such puppet representatives have done much harm to the community and representations made by the members of the Legislative Council to the Ministers to guard against such evils, have only fallen on deaf ears. Self-governing institutions have thus not only denied any benefit to the Depressed Classes but have caused them much harm and ruined their cause in several ways. In 1926–27 out of a total number of 933 village panchayats the Depressed Classes were able to get elected by their own men in 15 panchayats only. In 1926–27 out of a total number of 1924 village panchayats only 149 contained members of the Depressed Classes though the qualifications for these panchayats are only sex and age. In the Panchayat Courts where the qualification being education and property the Depressed Classes have scarcely any chance of getting elected. These panchayats strengthen the hands of the caste land-owners and employers of labour for oppression. I suggest the abolition of these panchayats till the Depressed Classes are able to secure their proper and adequate representation in them. Out of 2,245 institutions only 486 have Depressed Classes members, and, out of 16,755 members there are only 486 of the Depressed. Out of about 3,600 Panchayat Courts and 11,700 Village Munsiffs Courts, the number that have the Depressed Classes members is practically nil. Out of 80 Municipalities comprised of 1,635 members only 52 have 63 Depressed Classes members.

REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

The Indian officials in this Depa.tment have been the root cause for the degradation and miseries of the Depressed Classes. It will be found, with the exception of a few Muhammadans, from the Village Accountant up to the Personal Assistant to the District Collector and even up to the Secretary of the Board of Revenue, the Department is filled with high caste officials, who invariably favour their castemen in land disputes and other matters in connection with cultivation. Encroachments are made on lands in possession of the Depressed Classes and coveted by castemen. A small sum of money is given as loan to illiterate members of the Depressed Classes and on this pretext a promissory note is written and taken from them for higher amount, or a mortgage bond is written and taken from them, on the mortgage of their huts or house sites with castemen as attesting witnesses, and after the lapse of the time limit, they are sued for high amounts and for possession of the lands and properties and for whatever remains after the recovery, fresh bonds are taken and they are kept perpetually under their clutches and they are never freed unless they emigrate to foreign lands. These people could expect no help from the Revenue Department or from the Civil Courts as they are all filled with caste oppressors. Wages are given for work done by these people in unwholesome grains and in short measures. If questioned, charges such as theft and other kinds are brought against them and are handed over to the Police, where also they find their traditional oppressors in power. To get redress from the Indian officials of this Department, is absolutely impossible unless the District Collector himself pays special attention to the matter. But these Collectors are always transferred from district to district. If the Government had given the untouchables the required facilities for education, at least to understand the Revenue laws and Regulations, their position would not be so very deplorable.

The village officials are all hereditary. I wish to bring this to the notice of the Honourable Commission such hereditary rights should be abolished as it is incompatible with the Democratic Government, which is being established. In these hereditary appointments numbering about 40,000 there cannot be found a few men of the Depressed Classes in the whole Province. On the report of the then Collector of Chingleput in 1891, and as a result of questions put in the House of Commons by Mr. Samuel Smith on that basis, the Board of Revenue, Madras, passed a resolution No. 723 dated 5th November, 1892, ordering the grant of waste lands to the Depressed Classes for cultivation and house-sites, but the Revenue subordinate officials, the caste landowners and employers of labour brought that resolution as they did several other measures, into a dead letter. The Depressed Classes were once the hereditary proprietors of the land and were known as Perumans (Lords). Since the advent of the Britishers, the introduction of English education Arts and Sciences to the higher classes, the denial of such knowledge to the oppressed Depressed Classes and the maladministration of the Revenue Department, the staff of which is completely monopolised by the oppressors brought the oppressed to the present low economic condition, having taken from them all lands they possessed.

In this connection I request the Commission to be pleased to depute one of its members to go into the details of the grievances, and also visit some of the villages which I wish to show.

CONVERSIONS.

Conversion to alien religions weakens the Depressed Classes. It is only the oppression of the higher classes that mainly forces the Depressed Classes to such conversions. Though some of the Depressed Classes have embraced a foreign religion yet to-day their number is about six millions in South India.

It may be imagined by some people that the charge levelled against the British Government that they were not able to elevate the Depressed Classes during the hundred and fifty years of their administration of India though these classes were all along being loyal to the British Throne and peaceful, and the barrier that stands in the way of the political agitator to attain full Self-Government, will both be removed, if the Depressed Classes as a whole are made to embrace religions such as Christianity and Muhammadanism.

It is not an easy affair to convert such a huge population just to save them from untouchability. Though they are so converted, their educational and economic conditions would remain the same. And it would be unfair on the part of the British Government that imparted Western education and introduced European civilisation to the wealthy and influential classes, with a view that such knowledge and civilisation would in due course descend and filter down to the lower classes, to introduce a democratic form of Government before such knowledge reached the lower classes or strata of Sociey, and it would be still worse if they were to directly or indirectly force these Depressed Classes to accept any other religion against their conscience and the faith in which they were born.

Any step in this direction will only shake and undermine the faith of the Depressed Classes in the British Raj, disloyalty will soon spread, and taking advantage of this the Hindu religious propagandists will step in to reconvert and suddhi movements will come into play, and thus the Depressed Classes, who are mainly agricultural labourers and who form the bulk of the agrarian population will be led to revolt. The experience of the past had unmistakably shown that though the Depressed Classes were despised and oppressed by castemen and were in poverty, they withheld conversions to other religions.

I, therefore, hope the Commission will not leave the Depressed Classes in confusion to choose between conversion and slavery under Swarajists, but solve the problem by finding ways and means to better their lot by education and economic improvement in order that they may take their due share with administration of the country.

DEPRESSED CLASSES WELFARE.

The castemen in the villages have by their years of oppression brought the Depressed Classes, who are steeped in ignorance and poverty to think that they are the natural serfs of their caste employers and however much they may be oppressed and tyranised they cannot seek the support and help or obtain any redress of their grievances from the Government Officials, who are all caste Hindus. To get redress in such cases there should be a separate department of Government to which they may freely go and represent their grievances. If the Labour Department had been allowed to deal directly with the Depressed Classes as it did at its inception instead of transferring its activities to the Revenue Department under the control of the Collectors, whose establishments are filled with Caste Hindus much more ameliorative work would have been done by this time. In spite of all opposition and harassment by the caste Hindus with the exception of a few politically minded castemen, the Labour Department has managed during the period of 5 years ending 1927–28 to open 1,178 Schools for 42,799 pupils, grant Scholarships, find house sites for 27,329 families, assigned 247,266 acres of land, 1,490 works for water supply, spend for burial grounds, pathways, and established 1,535 Co-operative Societies.

I am, therefore, of opinion that a separate department under the name of "The Depressed Classes Affairs" Department be established and that be a charge on the Central Revenue of India. The local Legislative Council cannot be depended upon as it has the majority of caste Hindus who in 1922–23 tried their utmost to abolish the Labour Department altogether.

In these circumstances Provincial autonomy will be detrimental to the cause of the Depressed Classes.

LABOUR.

The cause of Industrial labour which has been brought to prominence in recent years by the political agitators in India with a view to gain the sympathetic co-operation of the Labour Party in England and which may grow in importance in the future, is, in its numerical strength, negligible when compared to the Agricultural labour. All classes of people, including the Depressed, are engaged in the Industrial labour.

An inquiry into the treatment of Agricultural labour would be an acid test on political agitators, who agitate for the attainment of full self-government. Candidates for election would not dare to speak to their electorate on the improvement of the lot of the agricultural labourers lest they should get no votes from the land-owning classes, who are in great majority; but would emphasise the necessity for restricting the labourers from emigrating to plantations and colonies to better their prospects.

If the conditions of the agricultural labourers in India and the treatment accorded to them by their high caste land-owning employers are known to the British Labour Party, they would hesitate to make common cause with Indian politicians and help in their attempts at winning Swaraj.

The agricultural labourer, "always badly nourished; clad if at all in the vilest of rags; hutted like pigs; untaught, uncared for and unpitied," as truly described by the Collector of Chingleput in his report to the Board of Revenue in 1890, is still to be seen in many of the villages in the Madras Presidency. The ameliorative work done by the Labour Department and emigration have improved the lot of these labourers here and there a bit, but the general condition of these people remains as deplorable as was 50 years ago. The Dravidian race as stated in another part of this Memorandum, which was reduced to serfdom though freed after the advent of the British administration from the yoke of hereditary slavery and legal disabilities under which they suffered, still remains at the low depth of social degradation with the same practices, same fear and same prejudice. As a rule an Agricultural labourer is rigidly excluded from possession and even of occupancy right, of land. The thought of the labourer acquiring land is abhorred; if he happened to be in possession of any land chicanery sets to work to dispossess him.

"The oriental subtleties and devices practised by the landlord over his labourer when written would fill volumes. The wretch cut off from land, bound frequently by iniquitous contracts holding his very hut at the mercy of his Masters, is obedient as a dog and works for a rack rent or for starvation wages. When a labourer tries to leave his employer's service he is sued in law courts, the most obstinate is brought to reason and every idea of emancipation is crushed out. He is treated as a untouchable and unapproachable, is not allowed to pass through the public streets, public water supply is denied to him, and he is cut off from all social and economic advantage."

So wrote Mr. J. H. A. Tremenhere in his report to the Board of Revenue, Madras in 1890, an extract from which is given as appendix to this memorandum, and the Honourable Commission is requested a perusal of the whole of that report—Board of Revenue (Revenue Settlement, Land Records and Agricultural), 5th November, 1892, No. 723.

There are bond and free agricultural labourers. A labourer who works under the bond system gets the annual emoluments as follows:—

	Rs. A. P.	£ s. d.
Annual wages in cash or grain	3 2 0	0 4 9
If the labourer has borrowed any money the above sum or less is deducted towards interest.
One midday meal, 6 pies per day	11 7 0	0 17 3
One cloth for a year ..	1 0 0	0 1 6
One-seventh of the harvest from four acres labourer cultivated	21 0 0	1 11 6

If the crop fails the labourer goes without any consideration for the labour he has put in, and if the labourer has a little son the employer feeds him and employs him also and when the harvest time comes for giving the one-seventh share he deducts the boy's feeding charges as well, thereby getting the services of the boy free for the whole year. The result is, the father has the consolation that his son did not starve during the year and the employer thinks that he was justified in getting free labour from the boy as he was feeding him though at the cost of his father, while the boy grows in ignorance. If instead of the employer feeding the boy the father had fed him he would have got the benefit of his labour for himself.

Women whose time is taken up in household work tending the young ones, could hardly be able to work continuously throughout a year. When women are free and fit for work they do not get it five or six weeks in a year and hence their earnings are hardly sufficient to keep them up for those days they worked. The only chance therefore that is left to the labourer, his wife and children, is to emigrate to plantations and colonies. Even that chance is denied and restricted by the land-owning classes through their political agitators. The above figures being approximate may differ from one district to another, but the facts remain all the same.

The free labourer though he works on the same condition more or less, is at liberty to leave his master's service any time he wished.

These relevant facts are brought here to show that the above mentioned land-owning higher classes, who speak of running the administration of this great country through their handful of educated men, cannot be trusted with full responsible government. Had the British Government that proclaimed the abolition of slavery, taken steps to see that it was put into practice, the above state of affairs would not have continued this day and there will be no cause for the Depressed Classes now to complain against the granting of democratic Self-Government for India.

EMIGRATION.

The Government were wise in taking measures to encourage emigration to the Colonies to relieve over-population, unemployment and poverty. This was particularly beneficial to the agricultural labourers of the Depressed Classes as they were removed from the oppression of the high caste land-owners. But at the same time Government were thoughtless in allowing the Indian traders to follow them. The high castemen took to and kept up political agitation to the vexation of the colonists. The emigrants who returned always brought in large amounts of money between eight to ten thousand pounds sterling per month, and after clearing their debts, if any, spent them in buying lands, cattle and other things and lived independent lives. The high caste land-owners, finding that they were losing the Depressed Classes labourers, sent their emissaries to the Colonies to create disaffection in their foreign employers by claiming equal rights, adequate wages and better treatment, while in India they worked through their platform speakers by saying that the treatment accorded to Indians in the Colonies was iniquitous and urging the people to agitate for stopping the emigration. The Government yielding to the false agitations and pious pleadings of the emissaries of the Indian landowners, who have been treating these Depressed Classes labourers hundred times worse than the Colonists, unwisely stopped the emigration and brought the labourers back to India to serve under the Indian land-owners under starvation wages, though they were well aware of the above said treatment. These facts are brought here to show how ingenious the high caste land-owners are who wish to be entrusted with the administration of a country like India. The Government could have stopped the free emigrants and encouraged emigration of labourers. They never took the trouble of ascertaining the feelings of the Depressed agricultural labourers for whom emigration was intended.

FRANCHISE.

The high caste land-owning Hindus having crushed the Depressed Classes down to servitude and extreme poverty, made the minds of generations of the Depressed Classes to think and act according to the dictates of their employers and take their orders as the law of the country. When the minds of the Depressed Classes have been brought to such a state, it is believed, and it is true, that they are incapable of exercising their independence, free thought and even conscience and discretion against the will, wish and pleasure of their caste employers and their people concerned in the election to the Local Boards and Legislative Councils. This hopeless subservient condition could be improved if necessary measures are taken and handled with care and sympathy. A separate communal election with certain conditions will lighten the difficulty and pave the way for the proper exercise of the franchise.

Panchayats. The election to the panchayats should take place within and in the heart of the Depressed Class location and out of sight of caste Hindus, strictly prohibiting the presence and influence of any caste Hindu, or member of any community not concerned in the election, and should be conducted under the guidance of an official appointed for that purpose. Voting may be by show of hands or by coloured cards representing candidates, dropped in ballot box. Candidates put in and elected should take their seats along with the elected members of other communities and deliberate. Members of the Depressed Classes should be allowed to be seated closely and watch the proceedings of the panchayat without the observance of any caste or creed. The number of members of the Depressed Classes for seats in the panchayats to be according to the proportion of population of the village. Qualifications of members of the Depressed Classes for panchayats and Panchayat Courts to be sex and age only.

Panchayats and Panchayat Courts being the first step to local self-government, necessary facilities should be afforded to the Depressed Classes to get a training in the working of these institutions, so that they may safeguard their interests. The right of appeal for any violation of the rules and for injustice done to the Depressed Classes shall be in the Magistrate of the District, whose decision shall be final.

UNION, TALUK AND DISTRICT BOARDS.

Educational qualification for membership to these bodies may not be observed and other qualifications may be relaxed in the case of the Depressed Classes. Election to these bodies to take place in the Centre of the Depressed Classes locality on the same conditions as for the Panchayats. Election of the Depressed Classes to take place annually for the first three years, then every three years or so.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

The electoral area of the Provincial Legislative Council being large to the extent of a District for election of one or two members, the poverty-stricken condition of the Depressed Classes will not be conducive to contest and return members to the council. The Depressed Classes men require training for some years in local self-governing institutions before they are given the privilege of voting for the Legislative Council. If under the present condition they are made to elect for the Legislative Council undesirable men, that is, men who could not safeguard the interests of the community would be elected through the influence brought to bear upon the voters by the high castemen. The safest course, therefore, to be adopted for the present, would be to leave it to the Madras Provincial Depressed Classes Federation, which has been brought into existence to elect men of ability, who could be trusted to take part in the proceedings of the Council. The names of persons so selected by the Federation to be submitted to H.E. the Governor for confirmation. And the members so nominated shall have the same status, rights and privileges of elected members and shall be eligible for appointment as ministers.

The Depressed Classes being untouchables and agricultural labourers, and forming an important section of the agrarian population, their representation in the Council may be increased.

They may have the right of appeal to the Government of India in case of violation of their rights in the Provincial Council. The present system of Government by "Dyarchy" may be continued till the local self-governing institutions are fairly brought into play and the Depressed Classes take a fair share in the administration and safeguard their interests. The country is immature for Self-Government at present. The measures taken by the British Government to introduce Self-Government, is felt by the Backward Depressed Classes as a force brought to bear upon them for one class of people to rule over the other.

As for Representation in the Assembly, I would suggest considering the numerical strength of the Depressed Classes in the Presidency, their number shall be four and they shall be elected by their representatives on the Local Legislative Council.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The term Depressed Classes requires to be defined for preparation of correct electoral roll and carrying out ameliorative work for these classes.

Communities that disown the term Depressed Classes, though the caste Hindus treat them as untouchables, and those untouchables that embraced any religion other than Hindu religion need not be included in the category of the Depressed Classes.

Untouchability is a device adopted by high caste men to live upon low caste people by dislocating them from all social economic and political privileges. It is a public offence committed under cover of social customs and religious observances. It is to be brought under penal code for public prosecution.

Co-operative Credit and such other Societies are to be established to relieve the Depressed from the hands of money-lending and land-owning castemen. They may be under direct control of a special Department and not through any political or religious propagandists. A separate Bank is necessary.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. Political Advancement. That the extension of the degree of responsible Government should be to the extent the Depressed Classes of the country are able to share that responsibility by the improvement of their educational and economic standards.

2. Education.

Conversion to alien religions not to be a means to remove untouchability nor better the condition of these classes.

Depressed Classes Welfare.

(a) A separate department to be established and that to be a charge on the Central Revenue.

(b) Provincial autonomy not to be granted which will be detrimental to these classes.

Labour.

(a) The condition of the agricultural labourers to be improved.

(b) Higher classes of Hindus, land-owning classes and Hindu capitalists are not to be trusted with full Self-Government.

Emigration.

(a) All facilities to be given to agricultural labourers of these classes to emigrate to Colonies, neighbouring States and European plantations.

Result of the Policy of Imparting Education. The fear that was entertained that if the lower classes alone were educated it would lead to general convulsion, has caused immense harm and hardship to the Depressed Classes, leaving them steeped in ignorance, poverty and misery all these long years to this day. But the effect produced by imparting Western education solely to the higher classes was also the same, that is, it has led to general convulsion and the British Government is attacked and attempts are made to wrest the reins of administration of the country from them, after monopolising services in all departments. Besides, they are a source of great annoyance to the British Government by their non-co-operation, civil disobedience, hartals, boycotts and-bomb throwing, rendering the services of the army necessary.

Abstracts from early despatches from the Court of Directors to Indian Government are given below :—

The Hon. Court write to Madras in 1830 as follows :—" The improvements in education, however, which most effectively contribute to elevate the moral and intellectual condition of a people, are those which concern the education of the higher classes—of the persons possessing leisure and natural influence over the minds of their countrymen. By raising the standard of instruction amongst these classes you would eventually produce a much greater and more beneficial change in the ideas and the feelings of the community than you can hope to produce by acting directly on the more numerous class. You are, moreover, acquainted with our anxious desire to have at our disposal a body of natives qualified by their habits and acquirements to take a larger share and occupy higher situations in the civil administration of their country than has been hitherto the practice under our Indian Government.

" We may see, then, how hopeless it is to enforce what your Lordship in Council so strongly enjoined upon us in your letter of the 24th April, 1850—what appears, prima facie, so plausible and proper in itself —what, in fact, the Board themselves have very often attempted, viz., the strict limitation of superior education ' to the wealthy, who can afford to pay for it, and to youths of unusual intelligence.' The invariable answer the Board has received when attempting to enforce a view like this, has been, that the wealthy are wholly indifferent to superior education and that no means for ascertaining unusual intelligence amongst the poor exist until their faculties have been tested and developed by school training.

" The practical conclusion to be drawn from these facts which years of experience have forced upon our notice is that a very wide door should be opened to the children of the poor higher castes, who are willing to receive education at our hands. But here, again, another embarrassing question arises, which it is right to notice. If the children of the poor are admitted freely to Government Institutions what is there to prevent all the despised castes from flocking in numbers to their walls ?

" There is little doubt that if a class of these latter were to be formed in Bombay they might be trained, under the guiding influence of such professors and masters as are in the service of the Board, into men of superior intelligence to any in the community ; and with such qualifications as they would then possess there would be nothing to prevent their aspiring to the highest offices open to Native talent —to Judgeships, the Grand Jury, Her Majesty's Commission of the Peace. Many benevolent men think it is the height of illiberality and weakness in the British Government to succumb to the prejudices which such appointments would excite into disgust amongst the Hindu community, and that an open attack should be made upon the barriers of caste.

" It is observed," he says, " that the missionaries find the lowest castes the best pupils, but we must be careful how we offer any special encouragement to men of that description ; they are not only the most despised, but among the least numerous of the great divisions of society, and it is to be feared that if our system of education first took root among them, it would never spread further, and we might find ourselves at the head of a new class, superior to the rest in useful knowledge, but hated and despised by the castes to whom these new attainments would always induce as to prefer them. Such a state of things would be desirable if we were contented to rest our power on our army or on the attachment of a part of the population, but is inconsistent with every attempt to found it on a more extended basis.

" Education and civilisation may descend from the higher to the inferior classes, and so communicated may impart new vigour to the community, but they will never ascend from the lower classes to those above them ; they can only, if imparted solely to the lower classes, lead to general convulsion, of which foreigners would be the first victims.

" If we desire to diffuse education let us endeavour to give it to the higher classes first."

Conclusion. In bringing this, my Memorandum, to an end, I believe the Honourable Commission will recognise the candid expression of opinion as regards the state of affairs of the Depressed Classes and trust that in the scheme of reforms that they recommend adequate safeguards to be made to better the lot of these unfortunate classes.

APPENDIX.

ABSTRACT OF PROCEEDINGS OF THE BOARD OF REVENUE, DATED 5TH NOVEMBER, 1892, No. 723.

SECTION XV.

MISCELLANEOUS OBSERVATIONS.

132. I have now to make some miscellaneous.

observations which have not hitherto found their place.

133. It is not to be supposed that the condition of the Pariahs is equally bad in all parts of the district. In the neighbourhood of Madras and of the salt factories they have to some extent quitted agricultural pursuits and get good wages. On the borders of its ranges, too, mirasi loses some of its most forbidding features (the paracheri site for instance not being claimed), though it is equally true that its example infects non-mirasi villages. Oppression is worst in the three southern taluks, and of these, perhaps, worst of all in Chingleput.

134. There are forms of oppression only hitherto hinted at which must be at least cursorily mentioned. To punish disobedience of Pariahs, their masters—

(a) Bring false cases in the village court or in the criminal courts.

(b) Obtain, on application, from Government, waste lands lying all round the paracheri, so as to impound the Pariahs' cattle or obstruct the way to their temple.

(c) Have mirasi names fraudulently entered in the Government account against the paracheri.

(d) Pull down the huts and destroy the growth in the backyards.

(f) Forcibly cut the Pariahs' crops, and on being resisted charge them with theft and rioting.

(g) Under misrepresentations, get them to execute documents by which they are afterwards ruined.

(h) Cut off the flow of water from their fields.

(i) Without legal notice, have the property of sub-tenants attached for the landlords' arrears of revenue.

135. It will be said there are civil and criminal courts for the redress of many of these injuries. There are the courts indeed; but India does not breed village Hampdens. One must have courage to go to the courts; money to employ legal knowledge and meet legal expenses; and means to live during the case and the appeals. Further, most cases depend upon the decision of the first court; and these courts are presided over by officials who are sometimes corrupt and who generally, for other reasons, sympathise with the wealthy and landed classes to which they belong.

136. The influence of these classes with the official world can hardly be exaggerated. It is extreme with natives and great even with Europeans. Every office, from the highest to the lowest, is stocked with their representatives, and there is no proposal affecting their interests but they can bring a score of influences to bear upon it in its course from inception to execution. True as this is of the landed classes generally, it is true in a high degree of the mirasidars of Chingleput and Tanjore.

137. People have asked why special attention should be paid to the Pariah when there are other classes of equal degradation. The answer is three-fold: that the Pariahs are far and away the most numerous, are collected into villages and are attached to agriculture, so that we can reach them more easily and do more good by reaching them. Secondly, by raising the lowest stratum of society, you raise all the super-incumbent strata. Thirdly, the disabilities of the Pariahs are in some instances the disabilities of all castes alike. The concessions asked for the Pariahs alone (e.g. in the proposed settlements) are not very great when it is remembered that until so late as the settlement of 1875, special advantages in the tenure of land were being conceded to the Brahmins.*

138. It is also sometimes asked why the State should do anything for the lower castes; why they should not be left alone to find their own level. The answer is that the policy of the State in the past has degraded them, and the State must retrieve its mistakes. We have permitted ancient privileges to survive until they have become anachronisms, and we have created new privileges. These at least can be confined to their minimum range of harm; and the classes who have been kept back in the race of life can be given a new start.

139. In some quarters I have been misunderstood as advocating a policy of throwing open State lands to all comers. This will, I believe, be the statesman-like policy of the future, capable of attracting capital more largely and more speedily than any other. For the present, however, except in the Pariah settlements, I would restrict the right of occupation to residents of the village until such time as the poorer classes shall have had full opportunity of occupying all the land they may want.

140. It is also objected that the present state of the law will not admit of all these reforms. If the reforms be advisable this is only an argument in favour of legislation. The Constitution of British India gives a legislature to the Madras Province; and legislature-like studies are not only for delight and ornament but for utility.

141. I have said nothing about the sanitary condition of the paracheris. It is very bad, and no special attention has been paid to it, nor indeed has the District Board the necessary funds. Some paracheris have no wells; and when drought dries up the surface pools, the inmates have to stand about near the wells of the caste-folk, waiting until some charitable hand shall draw them a little water.

142. Finally, I fear I may be quoted by ignorant or interested persons in support of the "Poor Ryot." The "Poor Ryot" who writes to the news-papers is generally a mirasidar or some other superior landholder who has sometimes never seen his land and does not even know the names of the different varieties of rice. He is perhaps an attorney, perhaps an official, often a schoolboy whom Government is preparing at great expense to take a University degree; but he is very seldom a ryot in more than name. Too often he merely draws rent from his fields, and neither cares nor knows how the cultivator or the farm labourer lives. Sometimes, indeed, he has farm labourers of his own, who live in styes and know kindness neither from God nor man; but he mounts a Madras platform and is eloquent on the subject of the Indian Nation, seeing no inconsistency in demanding equal rights for all.

143. I am afraid of such a gentleman getting hold of one of my paragraphs and instancing it in proof of the poverty of the ryots. I, therefore, am explicit in declaring that the ryot who holds directly from Government is in my estimation a member of a fairly prosperous class. The falsity of the misrepresentations on this subject can easily be demonstrated from the sale deeds in the registration offices, and from the experiments in the yield of crops; but so pleasing a task is beyond my present line.

* Para. 11, Major Stuart's Settlement Report.

Deputation from the Depressed Classes of Madras Presidency.

The deputation consisted of :—

Mr. V. G. VASSUDEVAN.
Rao Saheb R. SRINIVASAN (Spokesman).
Mr. R. VEERIAN.
Mr. V. I. MUNISWAMI PILLAI.
Rao Saheb V. DHARMALINGUM PILLAY.
Dr. M. V. GANGHADARA SIVA.
SWAMI SAHAJANANTHAM.
Mr. H. M. JAGANATH.
Mr. S. SUBRAMANIA MUPANAR.
Mr. S. VENKIAH.
Mr. A. MURUGASEM.
Mr. P. V. RAJAGOPAL PILLAI.

330. The Chairman : Mr. Srinivasan, you are the spokesman ?—Yes.

331. We have before us the list of names of this deputation. We have before us your Memorandum. I notice on page 272 that you ask that the number of seats in all the legislatures for the depressed class representation should be in proportion to the population of the depressed classes ?—Yes.

332. Have you worked out the number in the case of Madras ? You take the view that you form nearly one-fifth of the population. That means about eighteen seats in the present Madras Council instead of 10 ?—Yes.

333. Still on page 272, I see you suggest that at least there must be one member of the depressed classes in the Government of India and two seats in the Provincial Government ?—Yes.

334. There is a most striking proposal which deals with the Army. " Fifty per cent. of the officers " recruited and the majority of men in each unit of " the army should be recruited from the depressed " classes." That is the view of your body ?—Yes.

335. Then you want to abolish the system of hereditary village officers ?—Yes.

336. On page 272, in connection with education, you think that " the subject of the depressed classes " should be made a portfolio under the charge of " the Depressed Classes Member in the Viceroy's and " Provincial Executive Councils and in each province " the ' Protector ' of the depressed classes should " be assisted by a board composed of the members " of the depressed classes " ?—Yes.

337. Those seem to be the main points in the Memorandum submitted on behalf of this deputation. Is there anything else which you would like to say before any others ask questions ?—I do not think so.

338. Mr. Cadogan : On the subject of representation in the Services you say " Proportionate " representation in all the Civil Services, Imperial " and Provincial, with special arrangements, should " be provided for the depressed classes." You say in the supplementary Memorandum, page 275, " I am " of opinion that a very large proportion of Europeans " should remain in service till the depressed classes " also are sufficiently advanced to take their proper " and legitimate share in the administration of the " country " ?—Yes.

339. You do not mean that the Services should have proportionate representation at once ?—Not at once. As we advance, we must be given that proportion ; but till then we want the European element in the Services.

340. You think you will be able to find the supply of sufficient numbers from the depressed classes, fifty per cent of the officers ?—Just at present I think we will be able to supply only a portion, not the whole.

341. Lord Strathcona : On page 278 of your supplementary Memorandum, under the heading ' Franchise ' you say " The election to the panchayats " should take place within and in the heart of the " Depressed Class location and out of sight of caste " Hindus, strictly prohibiting the presence and " influence of any caste Hindu, or member of any " community not concerned in the election. . . . " And later on you say " Members of the Depressed " Classes should be allowed to be seated closely and " watch the proceedings of the panchayat without " the observance of any caste or creed." I want to ask you whether it has been the experience in the past that members of the depressed classes have not been able to take a proper part in the election of village panchayats ?—They are not able to take a proper part.

342. And that is why you make that recommendation ?—Yes.

343. Mr. Siva Raj : On page 272 of your Memorandum under the heading ' Representation in the Legislatures ' you say " The mode of representation " should contain at some stage or other an elective " element." You have not suggested the actual method by which you can secure your object. Would you leave it to the learned Chairman of the Indian Statutory Commission and his colleagues to devise means or would you suggest some means ?—As we have pointed out in our Memorandum, the Madras Provincial Depressed Classes Federation may be recognised by the Government, that this Federation will select members for appointment in the Legislative Council; these will be approved by His Excellency the Governor. The present method of nomination is not satisfactory. If the selection is made to rest with the Federation, the Federation will be able to find out proper persons who could be trusted to take part in the proceedings of the Council.

344. In any case you are against the present system of nomination ?—Certainly.

345. But you would not go so far as to displace the system of nomination by the institution of a separate electorate ?—It is indirect election as I call it.

346. You do not want separate electorates for the depressed classes ?—Not at present.

347. What are your reasons for it ?—Our people are not yet advanced to have separate electorates. Unless you give adult franchise the depressed classes should have no separate electorates.

348. It is said that when the Indian Christians, whose percentage so far as their votes are concerned is much lower than the percentage of the depressed classes votes, can have separate electorate, why not the depressed classes ?—The other classes are advanced.

349. You think that the Indian Christians are more literate and more advanced than the depressed classes ?—Yes.

350. Sir A. P. Patro : Do I understand your proposal for representation to be that district Associations should be formed in order to elect proper persons from the depressed classes and that out of those elected the Governor should nominate ?—Yes. I would add that those members who would be selected by His Excellency the Governor should have the same status, rights and privileges as elected members ; they should be eligible even for appointment as ministers. Our experience of the last ten years is that for the first term of the council, the members who were selected to represent the depressed classes were not satisfactory to us because they were selected from other communities. In the second council the position was improved, and in the third it was further improved. But if the selection is left with the Federation we will be able to find out the real persons who can represent the interests of the depressed classes in the Council.

351. The Chairman : Tell me, as things are now, does the Governor or the Government not consult or make such inquiries as they can to find out who would be generally acceptable ?—They do, sir, but the recommendation generally comes from the Collector or some influential gentlemen.

352. Mr. Siva Rao : You ask for eighteen representatives. Are there associations of the depressed classes in every district ?—Most of them have.

353. Under your scheme you propose that the Associations of every district should propose a panel of some gentlemen out of which His Excellency the Governor may nominate ?—We will have a central Federation, to which all the district Associations will send a certain number of members. We will make inquiries to find out the capabilities of the persons before recommending to His Excellency the Governor.

354. Would you allow each district to have a member ?—You will have to divide eighteen seats amongst the twenty-six districts; in some cases two districts may be represented by one member.

355. One flaw that I notice in your scheme is that you still want to retain nomination in the hands of His Excellency ?—We cannot help it.

356. At the same time you claim equal privileges with the elected members ?—Certainly; otherwise where is the voice for us in the Council ? For instance, the representatives of the Chambers of Commerce have got the same privileges as those of the elected members.

357. Rao Bahadur Rajah : The depressed classes form one-fifth of the population ?—Yes.

358. So out of 126 seats in the council you want twenty-four seats and not eighteen ?—I do not know how it is worked out.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : The point is this : We form one-fifth of the population, and therefore we should get one-fifth of the number of seats allotted to the Legislative Council. If the number of seats is 126 we should get twenty-four and not eighteen.

The Chairman : The precise number depends, of course, upon whether one-fifth is the accurate figure. If you take the Madras Electoral Rules, it mentions ten castes as belonging to the depressed classes. According to the 1921 census the population of these ten castes comes to six and a half millions. If you take the actual census, and the castes which are put together as the depressed classes (they are not quite the same as those contained in the Electoral Rules) it gives you something like 6,372,000. Then if you take the green book (The Madras Government Hand-book) you will see that the figure given is 6,994,000. The other day, Mr. Slater thought that the figure was about 6,500,000. So that something between 6,500,000 and 7,000,000 seems to be right.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : Even if it be one-sixth we should get twenty seats and not eighteen.

The Witness (Rao Saheb Srinivasan) : The more we get the better it is for us.

359. Mr. Hartshorn : I do not exactly follow how you say that you should have twenty seats instead of eighteen, if the number of members in the Council is 120. Your population is 6,500,000, which will be fifteen per cent. of the total population ; and fifteen per cent. of 120 is eighteen.

Rao Bahafur Rajah : I have taken the total population of the Presidency as 42,000,000 and the depressed classes as 7,000,000.

360. You are against the present system of nominations ?—Yes.

361. On page 278 of your supplementary Memorandum you say: "A separate communal election "with certain conditions will lighten the difficulty "and pave the way for the proper exercise of the "franchise." Will you please explain what it is ? —It refers to local self-governing bodies and not to the legislature.

362. You are not for separate electorate for the depressed classes ?—Though I am in favour of it, yet the present condition of the people does not permit to have it.

363. But I understood you to say that with adult suffrage you would prefer separate electorates ?—Yes, but our people are not in a position to have separate electorates.

364. At this stage you are not at all for separate electorates ?—Yes, that is so.

365. As an intermediate step your proposition is that you would like to form a Federation consisting of various Associations ?—Yes.

366. But do you not know that now and then mushroom Associations crop up ? How are you going to combat them ?—You have experience as I have. You should know that we have put this Federation on a sound basis.

367. When did you form this Federation ?—Within a year.

368. Was it before the Commission came to Madras ?—It was started before the Commission came to Madras.

369. I did not hear of it ?—We did not advertise.

370. Is it because Mr. Slater, the Labour Commissioner, wanted to start a Federation soon after the arrival of the Commission that you brought this Federation into existence ?—No.

371. The Chairman : You know, Mr. Rajah, that we should all willingly listen to this important case from whatever quarter it is presented to us. We should listen to both the deputations. It does seem to me, these gentlemen speak for a large body, and there is no doubt, if I may say so, that the next deputation will also speak for a large body. We want to hear both the deputations.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : I have a very great regard for Rao Saheb Srinivasan, but what I want to point out, sir, is that there is no Federation at present in Madras.

372. Mr. Hartshorn : What is the nature of the societies that have been federated ?—We have about seven important sections amongst the depressed classes, and these societies have brought them together. Might I be permitted to say how Mr. Slater's name was brought into prominence ? When His Excellency the Governor was in Chidambaram he expressed the view that he found great difficulty in finding suitable persons to represent the Depressed Classes on the Council. He suggested that a central Association could be formed which could select men for submission to His Excellency for nomination to the council. That was the time when we commenced to work. Of course, we approached Mr. Slater for any suggestions he might make, and on that occasion he gave us some advice. Since then, Mr. Slater had nothing to do with the formation of our Federation. We have proceedings to show that we held several meetings and we have correspondence with several members of the federated associations, which will prove that the Federation is a genuine one. Of course, we did not advertise ourselves as some other bogus societies are doing.

373. Am I correct in assuming that the societies are purely political in character and have been brought into existence with a view to the representation of the depressed classes ?—Yes.

374. That is the sole purpose for which they exist ?—At present we are working with purely political purposes ; but as time goes on we want to start branches which will deal with social matters.

375. Rao Bahadur Rajah : I do not want to press this point further, but I wish to place all these papers in your hands. His Excellency, in his speech at Chidambaram, did not ask us to form a Federation, but recognised the present Association as a central body. I shall place all the papers, sir, in your hands and in the hands of your colleagues ?—If you will permit me, sir, this Federation is not the same as the Association which Rao Bahadur M. C. Rajah has been running for the last ten years. He had an Association called the Adi-Dravida Mahajana Sabha. All that was merely a one-man show, and he kept all the intelligent men out of it. We tried several times to reach him, but he kept us out. I am sorry to put it before you . . .

The Chairman : I suggest that it is far better that we should listen, as we are most willing to do, to any constitutional suggestions made by both deputations, because, after all, we cannot go into these matters of controversy. I am just as prepared to listen to the deputation which is coming next as to this one. So I suggest to you that we should not go into that. Mr. Rajah was saying that he did not want to go into that, but that he had some documents to show us.

376. Rao Bahadur Rajah: Are you not for encouraging emigration of depressed classes into foreign lands ?—Yes, and to the plantations.

377. Does not this emigration lift our men up socially ?—You mean in the foreign countries. It does.

378. Supposing emigration stops, what will happen? —They will have to suffer with the local landowners or their employees.

379. Will you kindly tell the Commission whether emigration will help our men or will it go against our aspirations ?—It will help our men.

380. If they emigrate to these foreign lands they come back with much wealth and put up good buildings and can cope with high caste Hindus ?—Yes.

Memorandum submitted by the Registered All-India Adi Dravida Maha Jana Sabha and the Madras Arundhathi Maha Jana Sabha.

On behalf of the untouchables or the so-called Depressed Classes of Southern India who number by precise computation over 7,000,000, we beg to place before you this Memorandum in the hope and belief that you will give such consideration to our plight as the necessities of the case demand. India, especially South India, is a land of castes, and Dravidian though we be, i.e., belonging to the earliest stock, we are kept down in subjection socially and on a pseudo-religious ground by the caste-ridden communities of this province who are either early invaders or a mixed breed of Dravidians and the invaders. There are only two classes here: one is the caste Hindu class and the other the caste-less class to which we belong. Kept down to a life of semi-slavery for centuries, which a westerner would find it hard to understand, much less to believe, poverty is rampant among us and education denied to the vast majority of us. But it is not merely a question of elevation of our economic position that is required and we seek to place before you, but it is the social injustice and inhuman treatment to which we are subjected that we should place in the fore-front of our disabilities before you. We are excluded from the religious services of the temples; we are denied the rights of property; it is stated that it is laid down in the Manu that an untouchable cannot have proprietory rights to any immoveable property. We are denied access to public sources of drinking-water supply; we are denied access to public roads; we are denied access to public educational institutions. The representation that we have in the Services is negligible, and where the benign British Government have sought to elevate our position and give us a voice, at least, in local affairs by nominating our members in Municipal Councils and Local Boards, it will be a common sight to see that these representatives are asked to sit outside the regular hall where the public bodies meet. The mere sight of us is pollution to the caste Hindu. Denied as we are the human and communal privileges, it is no wonder that we look to you and through you to the Crown and the British Government for our salvation. We have no faith in the caste Hindu, whether he is a high class man or otherwise, and the grant of a further instalment of Reforms to placate the politically-minded caste Hindu implies a continuance of the intolerable conditions in which we are placed; it implies the continued rule amongst us of the four devils: Darkness, Debt, Drink, and Disease; it implies not merely our continued submersion in the economic polity but a social tyranny exercised over us for a further period which the British sense of fairness, we are sure, will not allow. It is not philanthropic help that we need from the caste Hindu, but it is our rights of citizenship that we demand and which we feel confident that your Commission, consisting as it does of the cream of the British democracy, will grant to us.

The Commission would have been, in their first visit to this country, we believe, made conversant of our condition and we should emphasise most respectfully that the root of the evil is the caste system, and the social degradation to which we are subjected. Until that social inequality disappears, it would be ruinous to us to advance the politically-minded classes in such a way as to confer on them power to determine our status and welfare. The legislation that we have had and the executive rules and instructions issued from time to time seek to improve our condition to some extent, but of real improvement and of a voice in the administration we have had none so far. To enable us therefore to control effectively both the executive Government and the law-making power of the local Parliament we should have an adequate representation in that Parliament. We have said that we muster 7,000,000 and yet, until recently, we had only 4 seats on the Legislative Council as the Parliament is called locally. Although we are one-sixth of the population we have not been given even one-sixth of the number of seats available in the Council. The Moslems, who form one-fifteenth of the population are given 13 seats at present. The Indian Christians who are less than one-thirty-third of the population are given 6 seats and yet both these communities are far more literate than us and could, even with a reduced representation, influence public opinion and the executive Government in their favour. Unless we form a strong contingent in the future Parliament it will be impossible for us to command consideration both from the executive Government and from the Council generally. The first and most important suggestion that we make and which we respectfully request you to grant us is that we should have at least one-fourth of the total number of seats in the Council. Once this is secured to us, the question how our representatives should get their seats in the Council will assume a minor importance. Although the caste Hindus know that we are a weak and minority community, and although they know that it is on account of their inhuman methods that we have been kept in perpetual darkness, we have often been accused of unwisdom in advocating nomination to public bodies in preference to election. Nomination was and is the only method by which effective representation of a weak community can be secured. We plead that this system of nomination should continue in any reformed Council which you may advocate. If, for any reason, such a nomination becomes impracticable, we beg to suggest that, of the one-fourth of the total number of seats we hope we shall be granted, one-half may be by election and the other half by nomination. It is notorious that in spite of the fact that the various Local Boards Acts provide a statutory maximum and minimum number of members to be nominated to the Councils and Boards constituted under those Acts so as to give representation to minority communities, the caste Hindus in power succeed in shutting out representatives of the untouchables, nominate their own men to these bodies, and by quibbling with the name of the class to which their favourites belong, seek to make it appear that they also come from a minority community. But, on the other hand, in the Provincial Council, we are extremely sceptic that the power of election will assist true and proper representatives coming into it. We submit, therefore, that we should have a separate electorate for the untouchable classes for one-half of our representatives and that His Excellency the Governor should have power to nominate at least for the next 10 or 15 years, eligible and proper persons belonging to our communities who have been unable to get in through the door of election for the other half. The above are our essential requirements. Once our representatives get the power in the Local Council to control Legislation and the services they should be able to secure the community to some extent political, administrative and economic advantages.

The method of election of such of the members as have to be returned to the local Councils has now to be considered. We have heard all that has been said and our leaders have read all that has been written condemning communal representation, separate electorates and so on. The essential argument underlying such a condemnation appears to be that a split in representation or a division amongst electors is not conducive to the merging of all classes, the aim of some politicians and the pride as an achieved object of some others. But we wonder whether it is seriously contended that if now or within the next decade or so a common electorate is constituted caste Hindus will either associate with members of our community with real goodwill or refrain from using our illiteracy to gain their own ends. As we have observed, the social inferiority which they consider we possess will always be turned to good account by them and we would be for ever left behind in the race. It is not so much a communal repesentation that we ask as a representation of miserably weak communities giving them some special privileges. One such privilege is that we should have a separate electorate. The second is that every man amongst us should have a right to vote. At present, the franchise is determined partly by property qualifications and partly by educational qualifications. The vast majority of the untouchables cannot for the next decade or so aspire to have either of these qualifications and notwithstanding the inevitable set-backs we shall be faced with in the early stages we have no alternative but to ask for adult suffrage.

We feel sure that the Commission would be as interested in our advancement from the economic and educational point of view as from the political point of view. We require free education for our boys and girls, including provision for boarding and lodging arrangements; we require greater facilities for higher education and for special education; we require a net-work of hostels in the province with one hostel for at least one district; we require a vast increase in the representation of our community in the Services; these are matters to be attended to by a special department. There is in Madras, we are thankful to say, a department which attends or ought to attend specially to our needs and grievances. This department has worked with a real spirit of helpfulness since its inception and under the able guidance of the late Sir George Paddison, K.B.E., C.S.I. We require this department to be strengthened and manned by an officer of real goodwill and imagination. The activities of this department are now supervised by the reserved half of the Government. We do not know whether the eventual decision of the Commission would be to withdraw the reserved half and vest the administration of the whole Province in a number of Ministers responsible to the Council. Should such a desire animate the Commission we would strongly urge that the department should work directly under His Excellency the Governor assisted by a European officer who should still continue to be a Member of Council. If that is impracticable or is considered by the Commission against the trend of the evidence which you will collect we would very strongly urge that a single Minister should be made responsible for the activities of the Department and that in any event His Excellency the Governor should have the residuary power to veto any act, resolution, decision, recommendation or other, of the Legislative Council or of the Minister in charge of the portfolio which runs counter to the interests of the Depressed Classes. It is not flattery which we seek to indulge in but a result of experience that has always prompted us to maintain that we should seek justice at the hands of an impartial Britisher rather than in an Indian Member of the Council or Minister. Should the Commission decide that the entire administration should be in the hands of a body of Ministers responsible to the Council, not merely the oversight but the power of intervention in all legitimate cases should vest in His Excellency the Governor whom we shall look upon as our real protector in the new régime. Indianisation of the Services, Indianisation of the administration and Indianisation of the controlling authorities over Finance are all possibly very good for the very advanced and vocal communities, but for the weak communities, who are deliberately shunned by those selfsame advanced communities they are anathema. It is after patient, anxious, careful and deliberate consideration that we submit that we have no interest in such Indianisation and that we shall look only to His Excellency the Governor for the proper administration of the Department to whose care we are entrusted and to that Department for our upliftment if not socially at least from the economic point of view.

We beg to add that representatives of the two Sabhas or Associations of which this is a joint Memorandum will be ready to give oral evidence before the Commission whenever required.

MADRAS.

26th February, 1929.

Mr. R. THANGAVELU, Municipal Councillor, Thiruvannamalai, North Arcot District.
Mr. VENKATAPATHI, Vice-President, Madras Arundhathi Maha Jana Sabha.

1. The Chairman : Gentlemen, we have got here the representatives, I understand, of the All-India Adi Dravida Maha Jana Sabha, is that right ?—(Mr. Kesavelu) Yes.

2. And the Madras Arundhathi Maha Jana Sabha ?—Yes.

3. I notice that the heading of the document has been changed from the "Madras Adi Dravida Maha Jana Sabha" to "All-India Adi Dravida Maha Jana Sabha" ?—Yes.

4. Is that the registered name ?—Yes.

5. We see a number of gentlemen before us and I think that amongst them Mr. Kesavelu, who is the spokesman, is the President of the Adi Dravida Maha Sabha, Coonoor ?—Yes, sir.

6. And the gentleman next to you is Rao Sahib Guruswami, the President of the Madras Arundhathi Maha Jana Sabha ?—Yes.

7. We have got your document (of course the document is common to you both) and I notice for example that you want one-fourth of the total number of seats in the council. Do I summarise your view correctly when I say that you prefer that, as at present, your representation should continue to be by nomination but if that was considered impracticable you want one-half to be chosen by nomination and the other half by election ?—Yes.

8. You suggest, I think adult suffrage ?—Yes.

9. You want the special Labour Department to be strengthened and to remain under the Governor ?—Yes.

10. Or at any rate under a minister with the Governor having the power of intervention ?—Yes.

* * * * * * * *

11. Rao Bahadur Rajah : Mr. Kesavelu, this deputation represents two Associations, does it not ?—Yes.

12. You have got another Association also which is combined with you, namely, the Madras Adi Dravida Central Sabha ?—Yes.

13. Is it a registered body ?—Yes.

14. Rao Sahib Madurai Pillai is its president ?—Yes.

15. So you represent three main Associations ?—Yes.

16. Your Association has been functioning very actively ever since 1917, I believe ?—Yes.

17. And your association waited on deputation before Mr. Montagu ?—Yes.

18. That was the only Depressed Classes Association then ?—Yes.

19. And the Government of Madras and the Government of India have been corresponding with the Association with a view to get its opinion on any matter affecting the depressed classes ?—Yes.

20. When the Franchise and Functions Committee came you sent in your Memorandum ?—Yes.

21. When the Lee Commission came you also sent in your Memorandum ?—Yes.

22. When Lord Chelmsford came to Madras you waited in deputation ?—Yes.

23. And also when Lord Reading came ?—Yes.

24. I should like you to give the Commission the true position of the depressed classes in this province. We were told the other day that the degree of untouchability varies in various districts in this province. Is that so ?—No ; in every part of the Presidency the untouchability is very severe and our people are labouring under a lot of miseries.

25. But I suppose it is very acute in Malabar ?—The condition of our people in Malabar is miserable.

26. Can you tell the Commission what are the difficulties there ?

Sir Hari Singh Gour : We know what they are. I do not think we need pursue this point.

The Chairman : I have got the impression (tell me, if I am wrong) that at present on the Malabar side some of these castes get very humiliating treatment.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : I am glad that the Conference is aware of it.

27. The Chairman : Is there any gentleman in the deputation who comes from Malabar ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : There was one, sir, but he could not be present.

28. The Chairman : What is the fair view ? Is it in any way better than it used to be ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : It is improving very slightly in urban areas but not in rural areas.

29. Mr. Cadogan : Since the Reforms ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : Yes. Our Association in Malabar is working very well. It is holding conferences now and then and is agitating for our rights. The treatment meted out to these classes in Malabar is most inhuman. Even when they pass through roads they would have to shout so that the caste man may know that there is a depressed class man near him. Supposing a woman carries a big load on her head and she happens to see a caste man in front of her she should immediately clear the road and allow the caste man to pass even though it might mean her falling into a ditch near by. That is the sort of unapproachability that exists at present.

30. The Chairman : What is it that this deputation wants to urge on us ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : If we have some representatives from Malabar in the legislative council they will be able to bring home to the members of the council now and then the injustice done to these classes. The degree of untouchability is the same in Telugu and Tamil districts. You know, Mr. Kesavelu, that recently a Mala woman (Mala is one of the depressed class communities in the Telugu districts) who went near a well was given a good hammering by a caste man, so much so, her husband had to assault the man and that the caste man has filed a suit in the High Court ? The case is reported, sir, in the Madras Mail in its issue of February 7th, 1929. I only want to prove that even in the Tamil and the Telugu districts the problem of unapproachability is very acute. There are instances, sir, wherein teachers belonging to the depressed classes and employed in board schools in the Salem district have been treated very badly.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : The treatment meted out to these people is exactly the same as that meted out to Indians in South Africa.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : I do not know whether it is the same or not ; I have not been to South Africa.

The Chairman : I believe everybody is agreed that everything possible should be done in framing or suggesting a constitution for India which would secure the means for raising the level of life of these poor people. The thing which I am very much concerned to learn is what are the best methods that could be suggested. Of course effective representation is one of the methods.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : Not only in the council, sir, but also in the municipalities and local boards. I have got documents to prove that in some streets in the Tinnevelley district the residents of the place refused to allow the labourers who belonged to the depressed class to metal the roads. They said that they would leave the roads without metalling rather than allow the depressed class labourers to mend them.

31. Mr. Thomas : But the municipal council insisted on its being carried out.—(Mr. Kesavelu) A resolution has been passed in the municipal council.

The Chairman : I do not want to have a controversy about that fact because I do not think anybody denies that everything should be done that can be done, to secure to the depressed classes their rights. I do not think it is disputed.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : May I correct Mr. Thomas.

A resolution was moved I think in the municipal council to allow these labourers to go and mend the road, but the majority of caste Hindus opposed the resolution saying that they should not mend the road at all, that the road could remain as it was.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : It is a disability from which your community suffers. We may differ as to the details, but the disabilities are very galling. How to remove them is the question. That is what the Chairman asks you. The only solution that occurs to me is to give them a share of power.

32. Rao Bahadur Rajah : I wish to put a question to satisfy Sir Hari Singh Gour. He admits that these galling disabilities are in existence in our province at present. In order to get rid of all these difficulties what do you propose ?—We want adequate representation in the local councils and in the taluk boards and municipalities, and to have more educational facilities. We want more schools to be opened and more hostels to be established in every district. We want more scholarships and more facilities for higher studies.

33. You want representation in the council. You have representation in the council now ?—Only a few, five or six.

The Chairman : You have got ten.

Mr. Siva Raj : One is a Brahmin.

34. The Chairman : There are 10 members who are nominated to represent the interests of the depressed classes. They may not be the best people to represent, but their number is 10.—We want the best men to be sent to the council.

35. Rao Bahadur Rajah : Although you have got representation in the council you have no proper representation. How do you propose to give proper and effective representation to the depressed classes in the council ?—Through election I think we can return the best men to represent our cause.

36. You mean election through general electorate ? —We want a separate electorate. We cannot compete in the general electorate at all.

37. Supposing you are given reserved seats in a general electorate, will that satisfy you ?—No, our people would not be able to get in.

38. If you have reserved seats you can certainly get in ?—But not the best men. Supposing a landlord sets up a servant of his own and makes him stand as a candidate he can get him through and defeat the best man.

39. Will he not do the same thing if a separate electorate is given ?—In course of time our people will be educated.

40. You say you want a separate electorate wherein other influences will not go so far as to bring in undesirable persons ?—Yes.

41. And you are prepared to face these difficulties at the start ?—Yes, that is why we ask for nomination and election for some time. Even in separate election for the whole there may be some difficulties. Even in separate electorates the best men may be thrown out. So for some time to come we want the Government to have the power to nominate certain persons.

42. The Chairman : You say in your Memorandum, on page 284 that "nomination was and "is the only method by which effective "representation of a weak minority can be "secured. We plead that this system of nomination "should continue in any reformed council which you "may advocate." That is your view as to how it should be dealt with now, is it not ? I understand that to mean that while of course you hope that with better education a time will come when you can get elected members this deputation thinks that at present the effective representation must be by nomination ?—By nomination, but if this goes on for ever we will be keeping our men in the dark always. So to give them political education we must also have election partly.

43. Rao Bahadur Rajah : You are for nomination, but at the same time you want to educate your people to take part in these elections also. For that purpose, in order to make them also true and good citizens, you want to start elections in some places ?—Yes.

44. When you advocate nomination for certain places, will it not be a bar to becoming ministers ? Nominated members cannot become ministers !—But the Government must make a provision to that effect.

45. To what effect ?—That nominated members, particularly of the depressed classes, if the Government think that they are competent men to hold the portfolios of such offices, should be exempted from such rules and appointed as ministers. That is the only course through which our grievance could be redressed.

46. That bar should be removed, you say ?—Yes, it should be removed.

47. That is to say, ministers should be recruited from among nominated as well as elected members ? —Yes.

48. Mr. Siva Raj : Of all classes ?—Not of all classes, but only in the case of this particular community. All classes are represented already in the Cabinet.

49. Rao Bahadur Rajah : What makes you say that we should start elections in some parts of the province ? Are they in a position to take up elections at present ?—Where we can find that a number of our depressed classes people have got the franchise to vote, that is, have the property and educational qualifications, we may try this experiment. There are certain districts where we can find at least not less than five or ten per cent of the voters. In such districts we may try this experiment.

50. The Chairman : You mean in the general non-Muhammadan constituency. You say that five or ten per cent of something is depressed classes. That will be five or ten per cent of the electorate in the non-Muhammadan constituency ?—Five or ten per cent of the general voters.

51. Mr. Hartshorn : Have you gone into that matter ? Because we have been told that there is less than one per cent of your community enfranchised throughout the province ?—That is why we want at the same time adult franchise for us.

52. You were saying, I understood, that in parts of the province as much as five or ten per cent. of the total electorate are depressed classes voters, but as far as we have been told about the number of depressed classes persons on the register it is not so.

Diwan Bahadur Reddiyar : The number of depressed classes voters is three or four per cent.

Mr. Hartshorn : We were told the other day that the total number of depressed classes on the register throughout the province was 56,700. We were also told that the total number of depressed classes were 6,500,000 . . .

The Chairman : The two statements may be both right. If you take the depressed classes in the Presidency, about one per cent are voters now in general constituencies, but it may be also correct to say that the depressed class voters are something like three per cent of the total electorate.

53. Rao Bahadur Rajah : In our province, the Labour Department is doing work in certain districts ? —Yes.

54. Do you not think that in those districts the members of the depressed classes are slightly educated and that they can understand what an election is ? Of course, not in all districts ; in certain districts the Labour Department is working.

55. In those districts can you not safely start elections since you have the departmental officers to prepare the electoral rolls and so on ?—Yes, we can try.

56. So I think your deputation is of opinion that if at all election is to be started it should be started where the Labour Department is functioning ?—Yes.

57. You say you want adult franchise. If adult franchise is not granted to you would you suggest any lowering of the franchise at present ?—If it is not possible, of course a lowering of the franchise may do some good for the present. But adult franchise would enable the depressed class people to return their best candidates in large numbers to the councils. I do not think even by lowering the franchise we can get a large number of depressed classes on the electoral roll. There are very few who possess properties and very few who are educated. These are the only two qualifications through which voters could be got.

58. I suppose you are for advocating adequate representation in the public services ?—Yes, surely.

59. Are you in favour of the provincial Public Services Commission ?—Yes.

60. Is it, or is it not your opinion that a member of the depressed classes should find a place on that Public Service Commission ?—If a depressed class member does not find a seat there nothing could be done. In that case there is no use of forming a Public Service Commission at all in the Presidency.

* * * * * * * *

61. Mr. Siva Raj : Your opinion is that a separate electorate can be formed for the depressed classes ? —Yes.

62. In all those districts at any rate where the Labour Department has been working ?—Yes.

63. Do you think that our people are either literate or politically advanced enough to make a success of separate electorates, or will they not still continue to be in the hands of their local landowners, the landowners under whom they work. It is just possible even now in the case of separate electorates for Muhammadans, Mr. S. Srinivasa Iyengar may put up a candidate and get him to the council on account of the money and influence that he has. Do you not think the same thing could be done with regard to those depressed classes ?—Yes, but for how long are we to keep the depressed classes in darkness ?

64. We are talking of facts just now ?—We have to suffer for some time to come. If in the beginning our people are defeated in such elections we do not mind it. That is why we ask for nomination for half of the seats.

65. The Chairman : I understand the point is this. He says that as things are, the depressed classes are in so weak a position that they may have to put up with nomination, but he says, after all if they do not get any opportunity of practising the use of elections how are they going to learn it and he suggests it is possible to have some of each.—Yes.

66. Mr. Siva Raj : As it is, you know that the depressed class voters vote in the general constituency. Do you think that these ten years have given them any experience or training ?—Yes, certainly. Of course, this year a man may make a mistake, but next year he finds out the mistake and records his vote properly.

67. Would you, for instance, suggest that in the non-Muhammadan constituency, that is the general electorate, the depressed classes must join the non-depressed classes, if I may say so, the depressed classes having different qualification for franchise, that is property qualification for the non-depressed classes and adult franchise for the depressed classes ? Do you think that will serve your interest much better than a separate electorate ?—Even then, in having adult franchise and running in general elections, there is trouble.

68. You agree with me that the number of your voters in that case will be double the number of caste Hindu voters, the Hindus having property qualifications and the depressed classes having adult franchise ? Do you not think it will be better than a separate electorate ?

The Chairman : Do you think it is a feasible scheme. If I have followed you, what you mean is this, that if you have a constituency in which, let us suppose, half the population is depressed classes and half is not, you would not allow all of the half that is not to vote, but you would only allow such of them as had a property qualification to vote, while on the other hand you would allow all the depressed classes to vote. Do you think that would be possible ?

Mr. Siva Raj : The position is so peculiar in this country that we try to solve this social problem through a political instrument, and you yourself have been worried as to how best a constitution can be framed so as to secure the interests of the depressed classes.

The Chairman : I agree. That is exactly the difficulty. You are trying to solve a social problem through political means. You can do something through that but you cannot do everything.

69. Mr. Siva Raj : I think this is one of the methods by which you can force the hands of the caste Hindu people to improve the condition of the depressed classes.—That is a noble idea.

70. You want a separate electorate ?—Yes.

71. Do you suggest that you want some safeguards under any system of Government that might be ultimately devised by the Indian Statutory Commission for India or for this Province ?—Yes.

72. In case these safeguards are not properly utilised or if there is a breach of the conditions laid down there for the protection of the depressed classes where would you go for redress or remedy ?—I do not exactly understand your point.

73. Supposing a condition is laid down that your interests ought to be protected according to law, but you find the law is not given effect to, what will be your remedy ? To whom will you complain ?—To the Government.

74. Where is the Government ?—That is why we want, sir, that a man from our own community should be in charge of the portfolio.

75. Would you like the Governor of the province to have certain residuary powers ?—Certainly ; in our memorandum we have stated that.

76. Lord Burnham : I want to get quite clearly in my mind how effectively you are going to secure any election at all from your body when you have no register, no Association or nothing on earth so far as I can see to show how many you are, or what you are composed of ?—We have got an Association now formed and registered, and we have got statistics of the number of voters and their names. We have been doing that, and we have been submitting names and representations through that Association.

77. Statistics, of course, depend altogether on the quality, but I do not see how you are going to get any registered depressed class such as will be able to have an electorate. My point is would it not be much better for effective purposes to trust to nomination by impartial hands ?—(Rao Sahib Guruswami) I think it is for the Government to collect such statistics and prepare a list of the whole depressed classes population.

78. That is very difficult, because there is no strict line of division—I mean the Sudras and the depressed classes tend to merge in one another, do not they ?—They have already statistics collected.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : There is no merging here ; the depressed class is dealt with separately and the Sudras also separately.

79. Major Attlee : How far have you got caste distinctions amongst the depressed classes themselves here in your own community ?—(Mr. Kesavalu) There is no difference in our own community.

80. Is it not a fact that there are some depressed classes who do not take water from others ?—No ; that is not the case ; there may be one or two stray cases, but so far I have not come across such cases. Here we can go and mess or mingle with and take water from all depressed classes. You cannot have any such distinction. There may be one or two stray cases in villages where people are not educated.

81. Khan Bahadur Khalif-Ul-Lah Sahib : Do you really mean to say that there are no castes among the depressed classes ? For instance, in the South of Madras, do the Pallas and Parayas inter-marry, or do they inter-dine ?—Of course if they are clean, we closely move with them. I do not think there is so much of restriction with regard to inter-dining and inter-marriages.

82. Does a Palla marry a Paraya woman ?—The difficulty may exist in some villages where people are not educated, but in civilised cities and towns we do not find so much difficulty.

83. Major Attlee : We had it on your own evidence that a great number of cases of oppression are in the villages. What I want to know is how far the distinction exists in villages among sections of the depressed classes. Do they or do they not exist ?—In certain villages there may be cases . . .

84. Not there may be, there are ?—There may be one or two cases ; but I cannot clearly substantiate the thing.

85. Mr. Siva Raj : May I say a word, sir, arising out of that question ? I am prepared to admit that some difference exists between different sections of the depressed classes. We know that there is difference between a Mala and a Madiga, between a Palla and a Paraya, but my point is this, whether that difference results in the same amount of inhuman treatment and difficulties that are placed in the way of the depressed classes as the difference that exists between the caste Hindus and the depressed classes ? —That remains in every community and every race.

86. The Chairman : I am sure that the answer is that the difficulty is not so great. But just tell me this. We know, of course, that some of them are in the lowest scale and some of them we know have got curious customs and do very unpleasant work. Is it the case or is it not the case that a depressed class man belonging to a higher caste would take water from a lower caste man of the same class ?

Mr. Siva Raj : There is nothing like a depressed class man of a higher caste and a depressed class man of a lower caste, sir. Their division, if I may say so, is horizontal.

87. The Chairman : You mean it is social ?

Mr. Siva Raj : Yes, they may not mix and so on ; but there is nothing like a difference in the level.

Rao Bahadur Rajah : It was no doubt true that some time ago there were some difficulties, but since 1917 our organisation has been working in all these districts, and we have been holding conferences to bring them all together, but it is the caste man who is behind us that is attempting to divide us by telling people that they are of a high caste and low caste and so on. As a matter of fact we are all merging, and the difference is not so much as they want to make it appear to the Commission. It is they that are behind us who try to make these differences.

88. Lord Strathcona : I am not quite clear whether in this part of India if a member of the depressed class changes his religion and becomes, say, a Christian, he ceases to belong to the depressed class or not ?—Yes, soon after he is converted, he ceases to be untouchable ; he becomes touchable.

89. Lord Burnham : I have heard it stated that caste Hindus do not recognise that, and that they consider him almost a depressed class man even if he becomes a Christian ?—No.

90. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-lah Sahib : For instance, are you aware of the controversy that has been raging for the last six or seven years in Trichinopoly as regards the difference between caste Christians and non-caste Christians, and that they are still called depressed class Christians by the caste Christians as they are called ?—I have heard of such cases too in some places.

91. Can you deny that the same difference between caste Christians and non-caste Christians obtains throughout the south of the Presidency ?—(Rao Sahib Guruswami) We do not think that it exists throughout the southern Presidency. We have heard that it is in existence in Pondicherry.

92. Do you know the conditions obtaining in the 11 districts south of Madras ? You have no personal knowledge ?

The Chairman : We are going to have a deputation from the Depressed Class Christians on Friday.

93. Mr. Hartshorn : Is it your desire that all the persons nominated to represent the depressed classes should be drawn from among your own community ?—(Mr. Kesavelu) Yes, they should be drawn only from the depressed classes.

94. How many of the ten at present in the council are depressed class men ?—Eight members are from the depressed classes, one is a Brahmin and one a Christian.

95. There are at present about 130 seats in the council, and that means you are asking, for the present size of the council, 33 seats ?—Yes. We form one-sixth of the population, and if calculated on that basis it would come to more than 25 seats. Unless we have so many seats, there is no possibility of getting our grievances redressed.

96. When you say that you want 33 seats for the size of the present council, are you suggesting that there are 33 well qualified depressed class men available for the purpose of those seats ?—More than 33 competent men will be available, sir.

97. Assuming that the strength of the council were increased from 130 to 200, you would still ask for a fourth of the seats, whatever the size of the council is ?—Yes.

98. In that case you would have 50. Are you satisfied that there are 50 well qualified men of your own community to take those seats ?—Yes, sir. There are men available, but for want of encouragement they would not come forward. Even to hold higher appointments under Government there are a number of graduates among the depressed classes in the Presidency whose claims are not considered. As a matter of fact, when I was a member of the Madras Legislative Council from 1921–23 I was pressing for an appointment for a graduate from my own community, but, for want of encouragement in the Madras Government, that graduate had to go and seek employment in the Mysore Government, and he is still there. My friend, Sir A. P. Patro, who was the then Education Minister, knows the fact. I was pressing the claims of that graduate for three years. Of course, at that time the said graduate was employed under the Mysore Government on Rs100, and when I approached my friend, Sir A. P. Patro, to give him an appointment, he said that he could give him only an appointment on Rs75, and although I told him that he was already drawing Rs100 and that he must take his special case into consideration, that he was a graduate from the depressed class community and start him on a special scale of pay. I was told that it could not be done. Therefore he still remains with the Mysore Government. Such are the cases.

99. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-lah Sahib : You were offered the ordinary scale of pay, but not any special scale ?—Of course, he promised that.

100. Sir A. P. Patro : Replying to Mr. Hartshorn, you said that there are qualified men available for nomination. Are you speaking only of the Adi-Dravidas or the Adi-Andhras when you said that persons are available ? Do you mean to say that there are qualified men available to represent all the 18 sub-sections of the depressed classes who are different and distinct from one another ?—All the sections of the depressed classes.

101. According to the census the Adi-Dravidas and the Adi-Andhras form only about a million and odd, and the rest all come from the other sections of the depressed classes. Do you know that, as a matter of fact, it is impossible to recruit from all the other castes, for instance, the Holeyas, the Arundhatiyas, and so on ? For want of education and want of proper training it is absolutely impossible to get men from these castes to represent them effectively ?

—Practically for the men available we cannot find appointments.

102. So, we will be correct in saying that there are men available only among the Adi-Dravidas and Adi-Andhras, but not in other castes ?—Of course.

103. Has Mr. Kesavelu anything to do with the Arundhatiya Central Sabha ? Is he a member of that Sabha ?—I believe Mr. Guruswami is concerned with the Arundhatiya Sabha. (Rao Sahib Guruswami) It is not the Central Sabha. May I know when it was started ?

Sir A. P. Patro : You ought to know when it was started.

104. The Chairman : I want you to explain this to me. I see now that there is the Adi-Dravida ; it is the name of a caste ; and I think the other name here is the Arundhatiya. That is a name which is often employed for a leather worker ?—Yes.

105. It corresponds very much to what is called the Chakkilian or the Madiga ?—Yes.

106. Your Association also represents the Maravars—Yes, sir.

107. What I wanted to be clear about was whether you thought you could be said to include in your society all the members of the different depressed classes ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : The term " Adi-Dravida " was adopted only about seven years ago, and before that " Paraya " was the term employed, and so some are returned as Parayas and some as Adi-Dravidas. The depressed classes in the southern districts are called Adi-Dravidas, while the depressed classes, such as the Malas and the Madigas, in the Telugu districts are called Adi-Andhras. What the witness wants to bring out is that although there are capable men available from one of the sections they are not able to provide appointments for them, and then what is the use of saying that there are not educated men available in the other communities ?

108. Mr. Thomas : You have stated that the depressed classes who become converts to other faiths cease to become depressed. Do I understand you to mean that that applies to social matters ?—Yes.

109. So far as the economic conditions are concerned, even the depressed classes who become converts remain in the same condition. Do you agree with me ?—We do not think so. (Mr. Kesavelu) Besides, the untouchability ceases thereby.

110. But the economic backwardness continues to be the same ? Even for the depressed classes who become converts special treatment and consideration is required ?—There are missionaries to take up their cause.

111. Do you know that missionaries find it very difficult to run their institutions ? They are closing down their own institutions year by year ?—(Rao Sahib Guruswami) As soon as a man is converted to Christianity he is encouraged in all directions.

112. How ?—By several methods.

113. Would you say that the caste Hindus, the Brahmins or the Vellalas, make any difference between an Adi-Dravida or Adi-Andhra and a Christian ?—No.

114. They treat both of them in the same way ?—Yes.

115. Do you agree that so far as the Christians are concerned, they treat the converts from the depressed classes as they treat themselves ? That is, there is no social disability attached to the convert within the Christian fold ?—That is so.

116. You were talking about certain methods of nominations and elections to the council. With reference to representation on the local boards, would you ask for nomination or election or partly one and partly other ?—Totally nominations until some time to come.

117. Sir Arthur Froom : You say you want more representation in the councils to enable you to control effectively both the executive Government and the law-making power of the local Parliament. Are there any laws on the Statute book of the Madras Government which operate against the depressed classes at present ? Is there any discriminatory law in this Presidency which operates against the depressed classes ?—(Mr. Kesavelu) I do not understand you.

118. The Chairman : The question put to you is this. Are there any Acts which anywhere say that this shall not apply to the members of the depressed classes as far as the law goes ?—No.

119. Mr. Hartshorn : I take it that your disabilities are more social than legal ?—Yes.

120. Sir Arthur Froom : What do you achieve by getting greater representation in the provincial council in Madras ? Do you anticipate the making of a law in favour of the depressed classes ?—No.

121. On page 285 you say that there is already a department in the Government of Madras which looks after the depressed classes ?—Yes, the Labour Department.

122. You go on to say that if there is any advance in the Government of Madras and the various departments are transferred, you want the Labour Department not to be transferred ?—(Rao Sahib Guruswami) Yes.

123. You want to preserve it under a member ?—Yes.

124. Is that logical with your position of increased representation in the provincial council whereby you hope to control the executive government ?—As soon as adequate representation is given we do not think we will be able to build forts within a few days. This department must exist until some time to come, until the depressed classes raise their heads. (Mr. Kesavelu) In 1921 there was a proposal in the legislative council to abolish this department.

125. Supposing your representation was increased to the extent you desire, would you not be better off if this department is under the control of a minister ?—(Rao Sahib Guruswami) No.

126. Mr. Kikabhai Premchand : Your main desire is to rise to the status of the caste Hindus, is not that so ?—Yes.

127. So would it not be better to have a joint electorate whereby you will be voting for the caste Hindus, so that they will have to look to your interests, and if you have a separate electorate, do you not think you will be permanently classed as depressed classes and you will not be able to raise your standard ?—(Mr. Kesavelu) For some time to come we should have a separate electorate. Even under the present system some of the depressed classes vote for the caste Hindus and return caste Hindus to the council, but their interests are not safeguarded by their representatives.

128. But if you have joint electorates some day you will come up to the grade of the caste Hindus ; but if you have a separate electorate you will be classed as depressed classes for ever ?—We want this separate electorate for some time, till we come up to their level. (Rao Sahib Guruswami) If you think that the term is not applicable, you may call it special electorate for the depressed classes.

129. Even reservation of seats will come to the same thing ?—We want separate electorates.

130. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : You want adult suffrage ?—Yes.

131. Have you any objection to that principle being extended to the other communities as well ?—No. Our people are very poor and they have no influence in the country. It is for that reason that we ask this. But if you think that for other communities it is necessary you can have it. We have no objection.

132. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You want a nominated minister ?—(Mr. Kesavelu) Yes.

133. You want a provision made in the Statute that a nominated member of the council is eligible for ministership ?—Not exactly that. If an elected member is not available, then what is to be done.

134. If that is the position, then again you will be a depressed minister, because you will be a minister in default, in the absence of an elected member. You want to introduce your depressed condition into the Cabinet ?—To safeguard our interests we want our man.

135. That is exactly what I say. Everybody will then say, " Look at this minister ; he is only here as a nominated minister because an elected minister could not be had." That will be the position ?—If an elected minister is not available from our community then we want a minister to be nominated from our community and entrusted with the portfolio concerning our class.

136. Do you not think that the chances of a nominated minister in these circumstances which you have stated are remote ?

The Chairman : He has given his view.

137. Sir Hari Singh Gour : Do you not think that the appointment of a nominated member as a minister is inconsistent with provincial autonomy and the grant of responsible government to the provinces, whereby the responsibility is with the people and not with the constituted head of the government ?—This is why we ask the Commission to make a provision of this sort.

138. That will take away from the fulness of autonomy and responsible government. Have you realised that ? I will just read to you a passage from the Report on Ceylon Reforms, pages 90–91 : " Even " within the same racial and religious community " caste distinctions may be responsible for rigid " division of classes. These diverse elements and " distinct classes, even if not antagonistic to each " other, are in more or less separate compartments, " this resulting in a lack of homogeneity and of " corporate consciousness which make it difficult to " achieve any national unity of purpose. Communal " representation was devised with a view to assisting " the development of democratic institutions in " countries of different races and religions and in the " hope of eliminating the clash of these various " interests during elections. It was expected to " provide, peacefully, an effective legislative assembly " which would give a fair representation of the differ- " ent elements in the population and would also tend " to promote unity. Unfortunately, the experiment " has not given the desired results, but has had, " if anything, the opposite effect. The representatives " of the various communities do not trust one another, " and communal representation has not helped to " develop an uniting bond of link. The minority " communities are fearful that any prepon- " derance of governmental power held by another " community will inevitably be used against them " and are keenly on the alert for signs of discrimin- " ation." The position, therefore, is a complete disintegration of the Opposition in the council and the destruction of that homogeneity and corporate consciousness which is the aim of yourselves and ourselves towards the formation of a national government. Do you not think so ? How do you get over this very difficult question ? You belong to the same religion. You have the same racial affinity, and the setting up of separate electorates within the same class and the same community would be destructive of that homogeneity and corporate consciousness which is necessary for the working of all democratic institutions ?—There is separateness in everything.

139. The next point is, supposing that your representation in the local council was given to you upon a basis of forming electoral colleges, not direct but indirect elections, then every adult member of your community will have a vote to appoint a number of delegates, and these delegates send up so many people to the local council. That would secure your election and proper representation to the local council. What objection have you got to that ?—If adequate numbers are there I think there is no need for such a thing.

140. Sir Sankaran Nair : I am asking you this question so that you may have that in view. It was assumed throughout the discussion that your disabilities are social. You have stated in your Memorandum that all your disabilities are said to be imposed upon you by the Code of Manu. It is the Hindu religion that has imposed these disabilities ?—Yes.

141. You see the difference between the two. In the one case you have got to get rid of the system—the system based upon the Hindu religion—for any reality to be given to you with the consent of the Hindu castes. In the other case it is only social usages that have to be got rid of. Now do you stand by the allegations in your Memorandum, or by many of them, that all these disabilities from which you suffer are disabilities imposed upon you, at any rate, according to the caste Hindus, by the Hindu religion, in which case what you are up against is the Hindu religion and the Hindu caste ?—We are not against the Hindu religion.

142. That is not my point. What is the position that you take up ? Do you think that the disabilities are imposed by the Hindu religion, or do you think that they are simply social disabilities which can be got rid of ? If it is a question of religion you cannot expect any help from the orthodox Hindus ?—(Rao Sahib Guruswami) It is the caste system that is responsible.

143. Are you prepared to fight the Hindu caste system in the councils to get rid of your disabilities ? I simply want to clear the issue. While we make recommendations the recommendations must have reference to the issues that have to be faced ?—We cannot fight these religious questions in the council.

144. If it is your view that the caste system is based upon the Hindu religion and that the caste system is responsible for your disabilities, and to get rid of your disabilities you have to get rid of the caste system, then your task will be a tremendous one. Without the help of the caste Hindu, at any rate as long as we have the British Government, you will not be able to get rid of the caste system. I want you to realise that.—(Mr. Kesavelu) It is really a very big problem.

145. So far as I am concerned you need have no doubt. I am prepared to assist you and to join in your fight. Perhaps Dr. Gour might also join us, but after all two or three men cannot do anything. Do you realise the issues which are before you, because when you talked of the remedies in answer to a question put by Sir Arthur Froom you did not appear to have clearly realised the issues ? I want to know whether you think that it is a religious question or simply a social question. If you do not like to answer the question I do not want to press you.—We realise that it is a very difficult question.

Sir Sankaran Nair : Then I will leave it there.

146. Dr. Suhrawardy : Do I understand rightly that there are 10 nominated members of the depressed classes in the local legislative council ?—Yes.

147. Would you then kindly explain your answer to Mr. Hartshorn that there are 8 members of the depressed classes and one Brahmin and one non-Brahmin ?—I am very thankful to you for putting this question. Of course, Government have allotted 10 seats for the depressed classes and they have nominated 10 members. When my friend, Rao Bahadur Rajah, who was a member of the Madras legislative council, was nominated to the Assembly his place in the local council fell vacant, and our organisations throughout the Presidency suggested names from our own community for filling up the vacancy. But the Government nominated a Brahmin.

The Chairman : The reason is because of the language of the electoral rules. The rule is that ten persons shall be nominated to represent the depressed classes. It does not follow that the person nominated to represent the community should be a member of it. He might be a missionary, for example.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : In Assam we had a similar instance, sir.

148. Dr. Suhrawardy : Can the Brahmin be in any sense considered to be a representative of the depressed classes ? Is it simply because a seat fell vacant that it was given to a Brahmin without regard to the depressed classes ?—Without any regard to the depressed classes the Government have nominated a Brahmin.

149. Is this gentleman, though a Brahmin, working for the uplift of the depressed classes ?

Rao Bahadur Rajah : He is doing some work.

Dr. Suhrawardy : The point is that this gentleman does not belong to the depressed classes.

The Chairman : You see, Dr. Suhrawardy, a good example to take is a missionary. One can imagine the view that a gentleman who is devoting his life for the uplift of the depressed classes may be a suitable person to nominate to represent them, though he is not a member of the depressed classes. One of my colleagues reminded me that we had such an instance in Assam. My recollection is that we had also a similar instance in Patna.

150. Sardar Shivdev Singh Uberoi : May I know how does your community stand in the matter of education ?—We are very backward in education.

Memorandum submitted by the Kodava Sabha, Mercara.

The Kodava Sabha stands as a representative institution of the landed interests in Coorg with special reference to the jama holders, who in fact are the main inhabitants of Coorg, holding the major portion of private lands in the province and who, besides control the public and economical life in the province. It has a membership of a thousand members and has in its fold almost all the sons of soil, of light and learning. The Memorandum put forth by the association has the unanimous consent of the members and further has the backing of all the Coorgs. This Sabha has confined its attention in the Memorandum mainly to the problems within the province of Coorg.

2. The smallness of the province combined with its straitened finances have been made use of by some people outside the province, to enlist a few of their brethren here to advocate the question of amalgamation of this province with the Madras Presidency on the one hand, or in the formation of a Carnatic Province on the other. Financial stability of the province will be taken up later, but for the present this Sabha feels that it must place its emphatic protest on any question of either amalgamation to Madras, or in the formation of a Carnatic Province with Coorg as an integral part of it. Coorg has been from times immemorial a separate province and came under the British rule not by conquest or annexation but by the unanimous consent of the Coorgs, who even then obtained a pledge from the East India Company that their province should be governed separately and that their individuality, traditions, manners, usages and privileges should be maintained, protected and perpetuated.

3. It will be more than clear to any one that the people of the province have an aptitude to live and work under a system of responsible government as is seen from the working of the Provincial Council, the District Board and the Municipalities. The percentage of the persons who took part in the general elections which is on an average 75 per cent. and at times amounted to nearly 90 per cent. of the voters is not only a clear indication of the interest taken by the voters and the value attached by the people to the vote, but also a justification of the people's eligibility for responsible self-government. The conduct of the business of the council, the quality of the debates and the general good temper and decorum that guided the discussion of the members are proof positive that the people of the province have acquired a keen interest and taste to representative forms of government. The rules of debate and of business have been assimilated by the members of the council even though they had no experience whatever prior to 1922. A comparison between the Indian non-officials and the European non-officials drawn from the highly trained democracy of the United Kingdom shows clearly the rate at which the Indian members have progressed, and it is significant to note that some at any rate of the Indian non-officials have proved themselves to be at least the equals of the officials in questions relating to the technique of Parliamentary Government. These facts will leave no one in doubt about the success of the working of the existing council and of the fitness of the people to march ahead.

4. The plea for an adult franchise may be accepted as the goal, but the Sabha feels that it is too premature to be seriously considered. The plea of making literacy as the basis of franchise is also unacceptable to this Sabha, inasmuch as both these methods, if resorted to will give votes to people who may really have no interest in the country. This Sabha feels that the present basis of the franchise has worked satisfactorily and that the same may be accepted now also. The opinion that the present basis of the franchise is too liberal is not favoured by this Sabha, for above all things it feels that there has been very few or no cases of a wrong exercise of the vote. This Sabha feels that with a view to give an impetus to education it may be made possible to give a vote to such of those who have gone through the School Final Examination irrespective of any payment of tax to the Government. The qualification of a candidate may, however, with advantage be brought on a par with those found in the adjoining major Province of Madras. It may be found, however, that apart from the payment of the required assessment fixed as the qualification for a candidate, it may be found advantageous in this province, to prescribe a qualification of literacy either in English or Vernacular. The present rules which allow an illiterate person to be a member is not conducive to proper and efficient management of the council business. This Sabha further strongly urges the enfranchisement of women both as voters and candidates, as the ladies of the province are comparatively far more literate than their sisters of other provinces who enjoy this liberty.

5. The present system of giving plural votes to a voter consequent on a constituency being called upon to return more than one candidate must cease. This Sabha is of opinion that a constituency must return only one candidate, and that in cases where either any interest or community has more than one seat in the council, then the constituency of that interest must be divided into as many constituencies as there are seats on a territorial basis arrived at by the calculation of the number of voters in each area or locality. The present jama and non-jama electorates have worked satisfactorily, and as such this Sabha feels that it ought not to be changed. Any innovation either by way of general electorate with or without reservation may not work so smoothly as it has worked up till now, and as such may lead to unnecessary complications. The criticisms levelled against constituencies of special interests are not to be seen in this place as all the constituencies except the nominated member for the depressed classes represent only landed interest. The electorates of the provincial council may with advantage be copied by the district board if it is to continue hereafter. The present seats for sagu constituency in the provincial council have been unfairly distributed, with the result, that while in one constituency a candidate has been returned by 200 voters, in another constituency a candidate is returned by 2,000 voters. This inequality must cease, and the sagu seats in the provincial council must be distributed in a more equitable basis.

6. The members of this Sabha feel that an individual may be given votes in different electorates if that person has the requisite qualifications prescribed for the said electorate. If, however, this is found unacceptable, on the ground that no man should get more than one vote, then this Sabha claims that the option of a voter, who has got the requisite qualifications in more than one electorate, must prevail as to the electorate in which he has to exercise his vote. The present rule which compels the son of every jama-holder to vote and stand for a jama constituency irrespective of the fact that he has no qualifications for a jama seat, and irrespective of his desire not to stand for a jama constituency, but to stand for a sagu constituency on account of his qualifications and influence in the latter, is inequitable and must be abrogated, and that person must at least be given the option of enrolling himself as a voter or candidate in the constituency he likes.

7. The power of initiative, referendum and recall which proceed upon a mistrust of a representative by his constituency is not justified under the present circumstances when a member is to hold a seat for only three years. These methods may be adopted when and if necessary after the same is adopted elsewhere and in case its working is found satisfactory.

8. This Sabha is of opinion that though Coorg did not know anything of responsible government even in the matter of local and district boards up till recently, yet it has made very great progress in this form of government. Coorg which did not know anything of journalism has to-day, after the lapse of little more than two years of council government, found its way to start three journals, of which two are weeklies representing different shades of opinion, and it is interesting to note that the advocates of the theory, that there should be only one non-official opinion in the province to fight the Government better, are losing or have lost their hold on the people, who have come to realise that real democracy can flourish only where divergences of opinion are honestly felt and expressed. As a consequence of this, people have been educated in the undercurrents of the council government in a way and at a pace not to be found in major provinces.

9. This province has thus made up very much of the lost time in accumulating experience and the principle of responsible government and democratic institutions, and this Sabha feels that with another decade, if the same rate of progress is maintained, of which there is every hope, this province will be on a par with the major provinces. The smallness of the province, if it is a disadvantage on one side, has more than compensated itself in the increased facilities which it has given to the people to know the details of responsible government. With the increase of journalism above named, the beginnings of party system have come into existence, and though it cannot be definitely stated that there are parties with definite crystallised opinions on different subjects, yet it can safely be said that the beginnings of party system has been made, and with it the beginnings of a system of principles guiding the people rather than persons guiding the people on any question. The want of anything like an effective and real power in controlling the budget and shaping the administration has probably acted as a hindrance for the healthy development of a party system and informed public opinion, and this Sabha feels that with an increased power to the council the rate of the development of informed public opinion and the growth of party system will be very much more accelerated. The isolation of Coorg, its smallness and the very recent experiment of council government tried in it, have all contributed towards the retardation of party system and the growth of informed public opinion, but, as pointed out above, a very good beginning has been made on these two lines and that the rate of progress is very much more in advance of those found elsewhere in British India.

10. The present council has only one nominated member to represent the depressed classes, and the principle of nomination is not acceptable to the Sabha, but it feels that in practice this particular class cannot at all get any voice whatever, except through nomination. This Sabha feels that after a lapse of ten years it may be possible to find a way to get rid of this nomination.

11. Regarding the question of nominating the officials also, this Sabha is not in sympathy, but here again, this Sabha feels that for a period of at least ten years the officials have to be nominated so as to ensure a proper administration of the country. In short, it is the opinion of this Sabha that though the principle of nomination is undemocratic and undesirable, yet it could be got rid of only gradually, and it feels that after a lapse of ten years the question of nominating the officials will be entirely dropped, their places being taken up by the Ministers.

12. This Sabha feels that the District Board in Coorg is an anomaly. The smallness of the province which corresponds more or less to a district of the Madras Presidency in area, argues against the continuance of the District Board, whose functions may, with advantage, be taken over by the Provincial Council. This step will give ampler room for the Provincial Council to function, and will also give the provincial officers sufficient work. If this step is taken, then the question of the relationship of the officers of the Provincial Government with the District Board will end. The present powers and functions of the municipalities may continue, and it may be made obligatory that the sanction of the Provincial Government be obtained for every expenditure involving more than a thousand rupees. The municipal constituencies may, with advantage, be made general without bringing in the question of communal electorates or special interests. The municipalities may be divided into wards and each ward be asked to return its member.

13. Provincial Government.—This Sabha feels that the present strength of the council is sufficiently large, and that there is no reason for increasing the seats or changing the electorates. This Sabha feels that the power of passing the budget must be extended to the Council, and that the power of certification, which may be vested in the Chief Commissioner, if exercised, must be so exercised with the approval of the Governor-General in Council. The question of running the administration through the Ministers, chosen from amongst the elected members of the council, though very desirable, over which the Sabha is very anxious, yet on account of the smallness of the experience of council government gained by the people, and on account of the financial stringency of the province, it is not advisable for another ten years to come. This Sabha feels it is only as a caution that this step is to be advocated, though the Sabha feels that there are sufficient numbers of non-officials in the province, who can well run the administration of the country. This Sabha urges, however, that in the place of Ministers, a provision for the formation of standing committees elected by both the official and non-official members of the council from amongst the non-officials, be made to co-operate with, and advise the Government on all matters of general and departmental administration, and thus a way will be found to meet the aspirations of the people and solve the exigencies of finance. This Sabha had had to put forth this plea instead of a plea for dyarchy as the experience in the major provinces point to the impossibility of the smooth running of dyarchical form of government. This Sabha feels that in case of difference of opinion between the standing committee and the Commissioner or the other heads of departments the matter has to be decided by the Chief Commissioner to whom the question has to be submitted with the official and the non-official views concerned. The smallness of the province and the powers of the council do not warrant any serious consideration of a second chamber to the provincial council.

14. This Sabha feels that both as a matter of right and equity this province must be represented in the central legislatures and that the same must be by election. This Sabha feels that there should be two seats in the Legislative Assembly with the reservation of one for jama constituency and one seat in the upper chamber. The qualification of the voters and the candidates for these constituencies may be on the same lines as those found in the major provinces with such modifications with regard to the question of payment of assessment as to ensure a sufficient number of voters and candidates in the province. It will not be possible for this Sabha to lay down any specific propositions on these qualifications without at the same time taking into consideration the provisions elsewhere. This Sabha shares the opinion of every man in the province about the necessity of a representation of this province in the central legislatures. The present exclusion is neither justified nor tolerable. This Sabha is emphatic in having the central legislatures as a bicameral institution.

15. The geographical position and the nature of the country makes the question of transport a matter of more than ordinary difficulty, and this Sabha feels that the failure of the central government to extend even a feeder line of railways in spite of the fact that more than a crore of rupees has been taken away from the slender resources of this tiny country is a very great handicap on the progress and prosperity of the people of this province. Coorg, after nearly a century of British rule, with a surplus revenue has not been given the benefits of railway, neither can it be said that the Government has compensated this by any large network of good roads. This Sabha therefore urges that in consideration of this handicap, the central Government will forego its present claim of the income tax of the province.

16. The crushing cost of the top heavy administration is responsible mainly for the unstability of the recent budgets. The engineering department and the forest department need thorough and radical retrenchment and this Sabha feels that in these two departments only a saving of sum of at least a lak of rupees could be effected without affecting the efficiency of the department. The question of the cost of administration of the province in the other departments also need a thorough revision in the hands of a capable committee.

17. This Sabha is emphatically of opinion that the judiciary must be independent of the executive. The present system of investing the Chief Commissioner with all the powers of a High Court is not desirable and requires a change, and the functions of the District Superintendent of Police and the District Magistrate must not in any case be confined in one and the same person.

The judiciary must be subordinate to the High Court, which may be composed of judges chosen from amongst the judges of the other High Courts to sit along with the Chief Commissioner once in a quarter for such days as may be necessary. This Sabha is also of opinion that appeals from the High Court must be for a Supreme Court of India constituted to sit in some suitable place in India.

18. This Sabha feels that the Territorial Force is an excellent institution and deserves encouragement of the Government in every way. The Territorial Force has been a success in Coorg, and it is generally felt that it is one of the surest methods by which a military character could be fostered amongst the people after the long lapse of any military training and the enactment of the Indian Arms Act. This Sabha feels that before drastic changes about the defence of India could be considered the Government should find its way to make the Territorial Force movement a success, and side by side with it a provision may usefully be made in the curricula of studies in the schools and colleges by which a preliminary military training can be compulsorily imparted to the students. This Sabha while dealing with this subject feels that the present attempts by which some sort of restrictions of the Indian Arms Act which is extended of late even to the Coorgs are unjustified, and goes against the pledges given to the Coorgs when they handed over the administration of their country to the East India Company, and this Sabha therefore submits that such extensions must be cancelled.

Mercara, (Sd.) M. NATCHAYYA,
6th May, 1928. President of the Kodava Sabha.

MADRAS.

28th February, 1929.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION (EXCEPT MR. HARTSHORN), AND OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND AND RAO BAHADUR RAJAH), AND OF THE MADRAS PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation from the Kodava Sabha, Mercara.

The deputation consisted of the following :—

Mr. M. NACHAYA, President.
Mr. A. B. CHENGAPPA, M.L.C., Vice-President.
Mr. P. MEDAPPA, B.A., B.L., M.L.C., Mercara.
Mr. P. A. CHENGAPPA.
Mr. N. SOMIA, Honorary Secretary.

1. The Chairman : Gentlemen, we are very glad to have the opportunity of meeting you. I think we have here Mr. P. Medappa, is it not, who is a member of the Coorg legislative council; Mr. A. B. Chengappa, another member of the legislative council; and I think we have also before us Mr. P. A. Chengappa, Mr. M. Nachaya, and Mr. N. Somia. I am very glad to see you, gentlemen. The Memorandum which you have prepared was sent to us and we are very much interested in it. We gather that your body, the Kodava Sabha, is a very important representative institution representing particularly the landed interests in Coorg ?—(Mr. A. B. Chengappa) Yes, sir.

2. We would like to have your own short statement, if you would like to give it, to supplement the Memorandum. First of all, perhaps you would tell us what you wish to suggest as regards the future of Coorg; whether you wish to remain a separate unit, or whether you suggest it should be incorporated with any larger unit ?—We wish to be a separate unit with all the shortcomings we may have.

3. That is what the Chief Commissioner, who was with us this morning, told us. He was explaining to us the reasons for that. I may say my friend, Lord Burnham, will at least have the opportunity of seeing Coorg and of learning something from the people there. Do you want the constitution of Coorg to be changed at present, or you think it ought to continue substantially as it is ?—We want to have a constitution on the lines of that given to other major provinces.

4. You want to be like a fully-developed province ?—Yes.

5. You are a smaller area, are not you, and there is the administrative expense which will become very burdensome on a small area ?—That we know, but we expect the Central Government to help us in our shortcomings as far as finance is concerned; also we must be protected by the Central Government in securing appointments for our educated young men, as we notice that they are always sent back by major provinces with the usual remark, "Each province for itself." So far there is no Coorg man in the I.C.S., nor in the Railway, Customs, Excise, Post and Telegraph, either in the Imperial or Provincial grade. Our interests in that line should be protected.

6. You are not in favour of being joined up with, as some people call it, the Karnatic province ?—No ; we wish to have our province as a separate unit. That was one of the announcements made when we went under the British Raj, in 1834, and my grandfather, Dewan Bopanna, is directly responsible.

7. You think that the present basis of franchise is working very satisfactorily ?—Yes, it is working satisfactorily, and we wish to continue that franchise for a further period of ten years, as we have mentioned in our Memorandum.

8. And you take the view—I daresay I am quite correct in saying it—that Coorg has made very good progress under the constitution which you have been having for the last few years ?—Yes, it is only during the last six years that we have had the experience of council government and we have made rapid progress.

9. Then you say, at pages 293–4 of your Memorandum, that " Coorg which did not know anything of " journalism has to-day, after the lapse of a little " more than two years of council government, " found its way to start three journals " ?—Yes.

10. And you also say that : " With the increase " of journalism above named, the beginnings of " a party system have come into existence " ?—Yes.

11. You think it is right on the whole to continue at present the idea of having one nominated member to represent the backward classes ?—Yes.

12. And then you express the rather interesting view that the District Board, you think, is an anomaly. It certainly is very curious, because your District Board has the same area as Coorg itself ?—Yes.

13. As regards the two municipalities you have got there, are they included in the District Boards ?—No ; the two municipalities of Mercara and Virajpet are separate.

14. What is the population of Mercara ?—It is 4,500 ; it has a floating population, and at times during the season it goes up to 6,000.

15. Then, I suppose, if there was no district Board, the result would be that the Coorg Legislative Council would do both the Council work and also the District Board work ?—Yes.

16. Then you say, in paragraph 13, on the subject of running the administration through the ministers, that although it is very desirable, " yet on account " of the smallness of the experience of council " government gained by the people, and on account " of the financial stringency of the province, it is " not advisable for another ten years to come." That was what I had in my mind when I asked you just now whether you did not think that at present the general system under which you are living ought to be preserved. You now say that you would like to have a fully-developed provincial government, say, like Madras ; and, at any rate, in some subjects you will have ministers ?—Our idea in putting forward that was that we were short of finance ; and now we are approaching the Government of India that they must give us a good opening balance. Our finance will thus be improved and as far as Council Government is concerned, we are in a fit stage to have an advanced form of Council now. The only difficulty is about finance for which we are leaning on the Central Government now to give us a substantial opening balance which they have taken from us in the way of surpluses from the time we joined hands with the British Government till the present Council was given to us.

17. Apparently you do not want to start a system of Dyarchy ?—No ; we do not want Dyarchy.

18. Then comes a point, which is quite a separate point and an important one too ; I gather that you think that there should be some Coorg representation chosen as such in the Central Legislature ?—Yes. The understanding when Coorg was taken over by the British Government was with the Coorgs alone, and we still hold that there are a lot of people who have come and settled down in Coorg later on, and our interest must be safeguarded as we have got more vested interests in the country than those who form the moving population ; and so Coorg must be represented in the Central Legislature.

19. And you point out your difficulties about transport ; as a matter of fact there is no railway in your province ?—No, although we have had about four or five surveys, we have not got any railway at all.

20. Your country is rather mountainous, is it not ?—When compared with Ooty, it is not very mountainous at all. Practically we are hemmed in between two provinces, on one side Madras and the other side Mysore. Those two Governments have no interest in our country. That is one of the reasons why the railway does not pass from Mysore through our country to Mangalore or Tellicherry.

21. Then you make a point in paragraph 17, which was also mentioned to us by the Chief Commissioner ; you think that the Chief Commissioner should not, amongst other things, have the powers of a High Court, and that there ought to be some separate officer exercising those judicial functions ?—Yes ; it so happens that the Chief Commissioner, knowing as he does all the people there, will have a lot of difficulty for himself to carry on those functions.

22. You are strongly in favour of the Territorial Force ? Yes.

23. It has been as a matter of fact very successful in Coorg, has it not ?—Yes.

24. Thank you, gentlemen ; that fairly describes your document, does it not ?—Yes.

25. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : You want a government like the government of a fully developed province, is that not so ?—Yes.

26. And you want the Central Government to help you in regard to finance ?—Yes.

27. In case the Central Government is unable to help you ; what will be your suggestion ?—The point is that they ought to help us, because they have taken away all our resources of nearly a crore of rupees for the last eighty years, and when they gave us the present Council Government, they gave us no opening balance. Not only that, they have now taxed our poor finance with the pensions of officers who served in Coorg before the present Council Government came into existence, and as such we have got a legitimate claim on the Central Government to give us all the resources they have taken from us.

28. What will be the amount ?—About a crore of rupees ; we cannot be quite sure of that amount.

29. Do you think that it will be enough to run your Government ?—Oh ! yes, it will be.

30. On page 295 you say : " The engineering depart- " ment and the forest department need thorough " and radical retrenchment." Have you got any suggestions to make ?—The council has always been trying to put forward suggestions for the reorganisation of the forest and the engineering departments in connection with their top-heavy administration.

31. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You say at page 293 : " The smallness of the province combined with its " straitened finances have been made use of by " some people outside the province, to enlist a few " of their brethren here to advocate the question of " amalgamation of this province with the Madras " Presidency on the one hand, or in the formation " of a Karnatic province on the other." Who are these people referred to in this paragraph ?—Those people who have come down and settled in the country as lawyers, traders and other settlers and who got some lands later on.

32. Traders, lawyers and other settlers ?—Yes.

33. What percentage of the population would they be ?—Fifty per cent.

34. It comes to this, that 50 per cent of the population is for amalgamation ?—The traders, lawyers, etc., are 50 per cent. But only 10 per cent. of these want amalgamation.

35. Ten per cent. of the population comprising lawyers, traders and settlers are in favour of the amalgamation of your province with the adjoining province of Madras or for the formation of a Karnataka province. What objection have you got to that? —In the first place the conditions under which we joined hands with the British Government are that our entity should be preserved entirely separately. If we are joined to any of these big provinces we will only be a drop in the ocean and our entity will disappear. Even a province like Madras is trying to split itself into different sections, Karnataka and so on.

36. We will take facts as they are and we will assume that the Presidency of Madras remains as it is. You being a very small parcel of area, the smallest province perhaps in India, your development depends upon more money and more men, and 10 per cent. of your population consisting of the people you have mentioned are in favour of amalagamation with the Presidency of Madras. You have given two reasons, one is contract with the East India Company and the other national sentiment?—Our customs and habits are also different from the rest of the people in India. Our tenures are quite unique. We have got jagir lands, the like of which do not exist anywhere except perhaps in Malabar.

37. But your amalgamation with the Madras Presidency would not interfere with all that. There are already four tenures in the Madras Presidency, as you know, the ryotwari, the zamindari, and so on. There will be a fifth. On the other hand according to the English laws every man's custom is scrupulously respected, and you will have the advantage of the High Court of Madras, a very good Court, to shelter you from all infringements of your customs?—(Mr. Medappa) Our individuality is lost.

38. I admit your sentiment of national unity is strong. But apart from sentiment you have no other practical objections to amalgamation with Madras? —Our influence in the Madras Government will be nil, and one representative will have no voice in a big council.

39. Again you come back to the preservation of national sentiment, a very proper thing in itself. —It is quite likely that none of our members will be returned to the Madras council.

40. Supposing you are safeguarded against that. We may say that so many members from your province might be returned to the council to preserve your interests. Have you got any other objection? Now you have got on the one side sentiment and on the other side lack of finance. You have to reconcile these two conflicting claims, sentiment versus poverty, and you want to be placed on the same level as other provinces, the revenues of which are 5 crores, 10 crores, and 15 crores. How can you do that? You cannot have a minister, you cannot have a High Court. It will be a Lilliputian State?—We will be a small entity and people will understand the political problems better if we are separate. If the Central Government helps us with a substantial opening balance, the question of poverty will not come in.

41. As regards your judicial administration, supposing we recommend your judicial amalgamation with the Madras High Court. You have got very few cases. Instead of having a separate judicial officer of the rank of a High Court Judge, suppose you are amalgamated with the Madras Presidency judicially, what objection have you to that course? It will add very little to your cost and you will get justice almost for nothing?—(Mr. A. B. Chengappa) Our ryots will have to spend a lot in litigation in going to Madras and so on.

42. The Madras High Court is the cheapest High Court in the whole of India?—Still we will have to travel about 400 miles to go to Madras.

43. Ganjam and Rameswaram are even further away.—But they have railway communication and they can travel at any time, night or day.

44. Want of transport facilities is the only objection?—Not only that. Already our ryots are poor and going to Madras means a lot of expense. They may not come at all. If they can get justice at their own doors they would prefer it.

45. That is true. But in a case like yours where you have only a very few cases and a handful of people it is very difficult. Suppose a Judge of the High Court here comes on circuit to your province once a month or once a fortnight, will that satisfy you?—Yes, that would satisfy.

46. In that case you will be judicially under the High Court of Madras?—I think one Judge might be appointed for Bangalore Cantonment and Coorg.

47. You are prepared to be linked up with the neighbouring province for the purpose of judicial administration?—He should sit along with the Chief Commissioner in some cases.

48. In paragraph 17 you state: "The present "system of investing the Chief Commissioner with "all the powers of a High Court is not desirable and "requires a change and the functions of the District "Superintendent of Police and the District Magis- "trate must not in any case be confined in one and "the same person." Now you do not want that the Chief Commissioner should exercise the powers of a High Court and you have given weighty reasons just now, in answer to a question put by the Chairman, that yours being a small province the Chief Commissioner is personally acquainted with every person and that it is not right that such a person should sit in judgment over them?—The judge must be part and parcel of the province; he must be under the Chief Commissioner.

49. That again is sentiment. You think that once the province is amalgamated judicially, it might be a thin end of the wedge?—Yes.

50. Apart from that you are prepared to say that your judicial work should be done by a judicial officer apart from the Chief Commissioner?—Yes.

51. That qualifies the statement which you make in the next paragraph. You have stated here, "The "judiciary must be subordinate to the High Court "which may be composed of judges chosen from "amongst the judges of the other High Courts to "sit along with the Chief Commissioner once in a "quarter for such days as may be necessary." In other words you want to compose a Bench of one executive officer and one judicial officer. You have got some lawyers amongst yourselves. Do you think that a thing like this is conceivable?—(Mr. Medappa) Ordinarily the judicial officer will dispose of the cases. But in extraordinary cases we would like the Chief Commissioner to sit along with the judicial officer.

52. What are the extraordinary cases? There may be cases of death to be confirmed, in which cases you may have two Judges. But under your proposal you will have the executive officer and the judicial officer sitting as Judges. You have yourself told us that the Chief Commissioner knows every person of the province. He may say, "this man is a rogue" or "this man is a good man"?—What was in the mind of the Sabha is that the Chief Commissioner being a person who knows the customs and habits of the province will be in a better position to guide his colleague.

53. Then he had better sit alone?—We suggest this; not in all cases, but only in a few extraordinary cases.

54. You cannot expect a judicial officer to sit with an executive officer in trying a case. No judge of the High Court will ever consent to that. You are a lawyer yourself. Do you think any judge will ever consent to this course? (No answer.)

55. The next point I wish to ask you is this. You say "the functions of the District Superintendent "of Police and the District Magistrate must not in "any case be confined in one and the same person." That is to say you mean there must a separation of judicial and executive functions?—Yes.

56. Then you say, "The Sabha is also of opinion "that appeals from the High Court must be for a " Supreme Court of India constituted to sit in some " suitable place in India." You want the establish- " ment of a Supreme Court ?—Yes.

57. The next point that I have not been able to understand is this. You say in paragraph 16, " The question of the cost of administration of the " province in the other departments also needs a " thorough revision in the hands of a capable com- " mittee." Have you had anything like the Inchcape Committee, a retrenchment committee ?—Yes, we had.

58. Did they recommend any cuts ?—Several minor posts were abolished and the higher posts were increased.

59. You think that the retrenchment committee did not do its work well ?—Yes.

60. Can you give me some instances of highly paid appointments which you would like to retrench ? —For instance, the Forest Officer. We have got the Chief Forest Officer on a salary of Rs1,500–2,000 and two other officers on Rs1,000 and Rs800. Instead of these three we would like to have only one officer as before the Reforms.

61. Have you got a development scheme in your province ?—Yes. (Mr. A. B. Chengappa) We had one just as a war measure. As a war measure all these posts were created and they are continued even now. The scheme cost 20 lakhs out of which we did not get even one anna. A lot of new appointments even in lower grades were created and they are still maintained.

62. Can you give me any other instance ?—Take the Public Works Department. We do not want the highly paid executive engineer on Rs1,000.

63. You have got no capital works ?—No. It is all ordinary road repairs, and any work over Rs5,000 is to be sanctioned by the Chief Engineer in Madras. We have also got two subordinate sub-divisional officers on Rs500 each. Being a small province, and the mileage of the road including the district boards being about 400, I do not think we want such a big establishment with a top-heavy administration.

64. You say on page 293, " The Sabha feels that " with a view to give an impetus to education it may " be made possible to give a vote to such of those " who have gone through the School Final Examina- " tion irrespective of any payment of tax to the " Government." How many people will you enfranchise at this rate ?—About 1,000.

65. You want that the candidates, that is to say, the members of the legislature must possess literary qualification ?—Yes.

66. You say, " It may be found advantageous in " this province to prescribe a qualification of literacy " either in English or Vernacular." Have you got any illiterate members in your council ?—We had one member, a nominated member, in the last council.

67. You want to make it a rule that no illiterate man shall enter the council ?—Yes.

68. You want a higher degree of qualification for the candidate so that you will eliminate the ordinary politician, the man who has got no stake in the country, from sitting in the council and making laws ? —Yes. We would suggest Rs100 assessment or any tax to that amount and we may have about 1,000 candidates to select from.

69. You want to enfranchise women. Have you so far got any woman in the council ?—No.

70. Have you passed any resolution on the subject ? —Yes.

71. And yet they are not enfranchised ?—We have passed the resolution recently.

72. Sir Sankaran Nair : What is the language which the ordinary people in Coorg speak ?—(Mr. A. B. Chengappa) Coorg language.

73. It is a written language ?—No ; it is a mixture of Malayalam, Kanarese and Tamil.

74. Have you got any written literature of your own ?—No.

75. In what language are the religious books that you read written ?—We read the books written in Kanarese.

76. Your tendency is to make Kanarese your language ?—I cannot say that ; we are learning English and Kanarese, and one is as good as the other as we will have to learn both.

77. In the ordinary schools is English taught ? —Yes.

78. What is the other language which is taught ? —Kanarese and Sanskrit.

79. All of you speak Kanarese ?—Yes. About 60 per cent. of our people can talk Malayalam very well.

80. In the council what language do you speak ? —Mostly English. When a speech is made in Kanarese it is translated into English.

81. In the law courts ?—It depends upon the person.

82. In what language is the plaint written ? Generally in English.

83. Do the vakils ordinarily speak in English or your vernacular ?—In English.

84. In all the courts ?—Yes.

85. Mr. Cadogan : Are you, broadly speaking, a religious community ?—Coorg has a small population of 40,000. They have got unity amongst them ; they cannot marry from outside. Even if they go outside Coorg for employment or for business, when they are 55 they come and settle themselves down in Coorg alone in the same way as Englishmen go back to England after retirement.

86. There is no communal question in Coorg ?—No.

87. The Chairman : In what language is the newspaper printed ?—The local newspapers are printed in Kanarese.

88. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : Would you tell me if in your province there are men of other religions, for example, Mussulmans and Christians ?—Mussulmans are in very small numbers. The population of Christians also is not much.

89. And people of other religions ?—We have got about five to six thousand Brahmins and we have also a class known as Saraswats from Mangalore. A lot of this population includes the travelling population, by which I mean persons who come to Coorg for work.

90. What is the religion of the majority of them all ? —The Hindu religion.

91. Then you have the same religion and the same tradition, social and political, as the Hindus have ? —Yes, but socially we differ because we do not marry our girls before they are 18 and boys before 25 to 30. We have no untouchability ; we can inter-dine with any community. As we have not got any literature of our own we cannot say how these social customs have come in, but somehow or other we have come and settled ourselves between the hills with some unique functions of our own.

92. Have you any tradition among your people that you come from outside ?—The only tradition is that we are Kshatriyas, a fighting race, and that we came and settled down in Coorg. This is what people say, but there is nothing in writing to that effect.

93. I understand that you are as good as the other Hindus ?—Yes.

94. What objection then have you to the amalgamation of your province with Madras ?—As far as Madras is concerned, I think we have serious objections. Our customs will not agree. The well-cultured people of Madras may over-flock us and drive us away.

95. Have you any industries in your province ?—Ours is an agricultural province. We grow coffee, cardamom and pepper and paddy.

96. Sir Hari Singh Gour : Sandalwood oil ?—We get our main source of revenue from sandalwood.

97. Do you not extract oil ?—No.

98. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : Are there no mines ? —No. We have a small tea plantation.

99. There is no prospect of an increase in your national wealth ?—Not in the near future.

100. If you want to stand alone then your constitutional advance must be according to the measure of your resources ?—Yes.

101. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You say "No." Your resources should be supplemented by the Central Government ?—What they have taken from us they must give us.

102. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : But they might give it you in a lump sum ?—The interest itself will be a big sum.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : The interest alone will come to double the amount of your revenue.

103. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan : Would you be content if there is an advisory council with your own president and secretary ?—No.

104. You want a full-fledged council ?—Yes. The budget must be in our hands.

Memorandum submitted by the Ganjam District Peoples' Association, Berhampore (Madras).

When the Reform Scheme under the Government of India Act, 1919, was introduced, it was expected that all concerned would set to work it successfully and in a reasonable spirit. Every great reform is confronted with difficulties, and could be worked only by a firm faith and a practical spirit. Too critical an attitude is never conducive to practical work. A section of the "Intelligentsia" from its inception looked upon the reforms with hostility and pronounced a priori as unworkable. But the so-called less advanced and the less educated people undertook the great task in Southern India with a determination to work it to the best advantage of the people in this country. They were ridiculed as amateurists unknown to political work, and the opponents of reforms expected a dismal failure. At Delhi and in Simla the party working the reforms in Southern India were grossly misrepresented and the bureaucracy readily listened to such tales without taking the least trouble to verify the same or scrutinize the source from which those tales emanated, but time has shown that opposition brought out the best in the people, and was a source of inspiration for the self-reliance with which the Reform Scheme was worked successfully for what it was worth. Much useful work was done also elsewhere in other provinces and in the Assembly. Experience has proved that successful working of popular Government does not always rest on the "politically-minded" people nor on those versed in formal rules and regulations. People with capacity and self-reliance receive the necessary training very quickly. Political education of the people is not an easy process, but the soil is now properly prepared. In the Memoranda on the working of the reformed constitution presented to the Reforms Enquiry Committee, 1924, which are published as Appendix III to the Reports of the Local Government (pages 101–113) Sir Rajah of Panagal and Sir A. P. Patro described the defects and difficulties of the present system of Government in the provinces and suggested remedies then practicable. Since June, 1924, there have been many changes in the Government of the country, and the result of the general elections in November, 1926, provided the real test for working the dyarchical scheme in the country. In the course of a debate in the Madras Legislative Council on August 24, 1927 (vol. xiii, pages 183–185) it was shown how the system broke down in the existing circumstances, and how it became possible for a few persons, "Independents," who did not seek election on any political programme or on a political creed, and who had no political organization which appealed to the electorates, could be called upon to undertake the formation of the Ministry without any common bond among them or joint responsibility. The Ministers continued at the sufferance of the "opposition," a majority group or party in the Legislative Council for the time. The moment such a precarious support was withdrawn, the Ministers had to rest on some other prop to maintain themselves in the Council. Thus it became possible for any small group or members to be in office with the aid of official nominated votes and to rely on the internal jealousies of parties to help their position. Such a state of affairs hardly tends to create responsibility in the Council or in the Ministers. Of course the straight course would be for the Ministers to resign or for the Governor to dissolve the Council, not being able to form a stable Ministry out of the existing Council. It must however be remembered that the present situation was brought about by the refusal of the majority party in the Council to take responsibility and perform the pledges made to the electorates. "The basis of the system of responsibility is a lively "and effective sense of sanctity of other people's "rights. The majority must practice toleration and "minorities patience. There must be a real per-"ception of public welfare superior to the individual "or party good." The responsibility of a member elected by a constituency is very great as in the present state of political education, the electorate is not very far advanced to judge for itself and hence places great trust in its representatives to work for the general advancement of the country. By entering the Councils as representative of the people the member agrees to work the scheme of Government to the best advantage of the people. He did not inform the people that he would break up or wreck the existing constitution and obstruct Government. The election manifestoes did not assure the people of his destructive policy. It may therefore be a breach of faith in those cases but there is at present no way by which the electorates could call the member into question until the next general election when the candidates seek the support of the constituency. The policy of obstruction may be justifiable in regard to any particular measure or scheme introduced by Government which is not for popular benefit and obstruction is justifiable in a case where the electorate is fully cognisant of it, and approves the conduct of the member. Our electorates have not got the advantage at present of an organization in each area for such purposes. As such there is a greater responsibility on the member, as Trustee of the interests of the constituency to avoid the destructive policy. It is an important matter to be considered whether the responsibility of the member to the constituency should not be regulated until such time as political education has advanced far enough for the electorate to call upon the member to account for his conduct in any matter. Once elected, the member is now free to act as he likes even against the best interest of the country. It is impossible however, to frame rules in the matter. Discretion must be given to the member and it should be left to his sense of honour and political self-respect. The discipline of the party is however a different matter. We have not been able to find any procedure elsewhere to regulate the relations between the elected member and his constituency. The force of public opinion must guide in the matter. We have to see that the agricultural population is represented by proper men, who are of them, as far as possible. The man in the town or the "professional" man may be better educated or more intelligent but he may not represent real interests of the agricultural population in the Legislative Councils. The solution is to devise a system leading to real representation of the ryot and agricultural population. We recognize however that electorates have just begun to develop responsibility and the growth of proper relations between the member and the electorate is a matter of time.

Analogy is drawn frequently from Colonial forms of government and the scheme of "Provincial Autonomy" is suggested as the remedy for the defects of Dyarchy. Apart from the difficulty of defining "Provincial Autonomy," as each writer or speaker adopts it for the occasion, the theory is capable of a variety of implications. The immensity of the problem must be kept in view, the vastness of the country and the population of varying degrees of civilization differing in different areas from the hill tribes to the highest products of western education. We have to deal with a whole continent. Over all these areas, there has been one Central Government for India and the provinces had only subordinate administration. Indian Constitutional History points to the existence of one Imperial Government which had complete power of direction, superintendence and control over the entire administration and the province had no individuality or independance in the legislative, administrative and financial matters. The constitution of the Central Government was wholly bureaucratic. The various Reforms Acts gradually relaxed this control, direction and superintendence to such a degree that the Act of 1919 prepared the way for the application of the principle of "Full Responsible Government" in the provinces. The most important feature of any system of Provincial Autonomy is the division of functions between the Central Government and the Provincial Governments. While in the Colonies each one of the States grew up according to its own genius, strength and character and became independent for all purposes, the provinces held their Governments irrespective of the outside control A central Government had to be brought into existence later on, as a unifying force to facilitate inter-state and external relations of the States through a common agency. The Central Government is of later growth. The Provinces or States relaxed or surrendered some powers and vested them in the Central Government and defined those powers that could be exercised by the Central Government.

The present constitution which has taken the federal form is of gradual growth and seems therefore natural and most suitable. This development is different from that of Canada or of the United States or of South Africa. The States in those Governments entered into an alliance to form a Federation each independent of the other, having a separate mechanism of its own. The constitution of the United States enumerates the powers of the Federal Government thus leaving all power of Government not taken over by the Federal Government to be exercised by States Governments. In Canada the Act enumerates the powers of the Provincial Governments leaving all powers not so enumerated to be exercised by the Dominion Government. In India therefore the problem is to define clearly the relationship between the Central Government and the Local Governments. Devolution Rules were made to define this relation reserving certain powers to the Central Government in respect of legislation, finance, foreign affairs, etc. The Central Government or the Imperial Government of India was practically autonomous and its powers of direction, control and superintendence were gradually relaxed until the constitutional stage was reached in the Act of 1919 which embodied the memorable policy of the British Government proclaimed on August 20, 1917—" gradual development of self-" governing institutions with a view to progressive " realization of Responsible Government in India " as an integral part of the British Empire and the " increasing association of Indians in every branch of " administration." " Declaration of rights " of the people may be sound in theory. It should be however sufficient for all practical purposes that the Government of India Bill finally declares and confers upon India the status of a self-governing Dominion making certain reservations regarding the defence of the country and foreign or international affairs. The scheme of self-government should be capable of automatic development in successive stages. What is most essential is to develop self-government institutions in the country with a view to the full realization of Responsible Government in the Provincial and Central Governments. The conditions of this problem were fully dealt with in Chapter VI of the Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms. In paragraph 153, it was observed that the successful working of popular Government rests not so much on status and written constitutions as on the gradual building up of conventions, customs and traditions. These are based on the experience and political thought of the people, but are understood and appreciated by both the governed and the Government. No one who has observed the conditions in India during the last decade can fail to see the wonderful progress made among the rural classes. The appalling state of illiteracy, poverty of the people and their economic helplessness may prima facie appear to be desponding. Nevertheless it is encouraging that the enormous country population is slowly becoming conscious of the new system.

" Provincial Autonomy " or Responsible Government in the provinces implies changes in the constitution of the Central Government. Unless there is a corresponding responsibility in the Central Government, the scheme of " Autonomy " becomes incompatible. The executive in the Central Government is now irremovable and is in a minority, though vested with political powers, while the legislature consists of a large elected majority with no power to enforce its resolutions. It is only in the grant of supplies or during the budget demands of the Government, the Legislature can show its resentment or disapproval of policies. The executive is subject to the control of the Secretary of State for India who is responsible to the Parliament. The anomaly of an executive council irresponsible governing the country with an elected majority in the Legislature which has not got the sanction necessary to enforce its decisions, is an irritating and incongruous position. What is the remedy ? Will the constitution of proper electorates bring in a more desirable relation between the executive and the legislature or will the introduction of responsibility in all the " Civil Administration " bring about better results ? Until India gradually attains the stage when she could have control over the army, navy, defence and international relations the Governor-General must have control over the administration of these departments. Even in the Dominions, executive power of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, as also the chief command of the naval and military forces is vested in the King, represented by the Governor-General who is advised by a Cabinet consisting of a Prime Minister.

One essential characteristic of Responsible Government and the main source of its success lies in the development of party system in politics. Responsible Government will not be stable unless based on the party system. If a Government fails there should be the constitutional opposition to form an alternative Government. Ministerial responsibility will be meaningless if there are no parties ready and willing to form and support another ministry and carry on the administration of the country. In India there is a growth of party system though in multiple forms. There are many political parties and they are all tending towards the parliamentary system of Government and constitutional opposition, This is more fully referred to in the Memorandum. The history of the growth of the party system in other countries gives no room for doubt or diffidence in the gradual evolution of party system in India. The principles on which parties are formed will differ in different provinces. Racial or caste or communal antagonism will wear out in course of time. Nationalism must be based on more substantial basis than at present. It is worthy of notice that the rapid development of party system was stimulated by the working of the Reforms Scheme. In the old councils prior to 1919 there was no possibility of forming party system as there was no element of responsibility. There was the Government and all other additional members formed the opposition.

Again the success of representative institutions depends upon the degree of political education in the country It is not only the rights of the people they should know, but they should realize the liabilities which they should shoulder, and this is a condition of sound political progress The countryside is not unenlightened though not literate for purposes of statistics, and there is a great deal of social and political activity among the people. The Reforms have taught the voter that he has power in his hands, though this knowledge varies in degrees in different parts of the country. This is not peculiar to this country alone. The history of other countries shows that the growth of a desire for education among the peasantry is generally slow, while political and economic conditions remains static and the quickening influences come mainly from the better educated sections of the country, which are more sensitive to political and economic changes. A desire for a better state of things exists among the people. The agricultural population were ignored or neglected before, in every scheme of political reform. They are now taken into consideration under the Reforms Scheme. They are at present counted as of some value and use and hence attention is directed towards them and their condition. The ryot at present cares more fully for his taluq or district and higher problems are beyond his present vision. He is now given a right of vote. The capacity for administration will come through the exercise of political responsibility. It should not, however, be overlooked that there is more intensive work from one side only, more in the direction of making the Government responsible for everything, for acts and irregularities which cannot properly be placed to the credit of the Government. This propaganda created a feeling of sullenness and discontent among the masses. There will be a greater degree of responsibility among the political workers of all parties when they realize that they must make good their promises. This has now dawned on that section of the population that was responsible for thwarting the success of the Reforms Scheme. They are struggling between stagnation and progress and will ere long, accept responsiblity. They cannot be ploughing the sands for all time. It has become a wearisome task in public life. People have begun to realize that the Reforms adumbrated in the Act of 1919 are worth something. The rapid expansion of rural elementary education, through aided and panchayat agency, the construction of village roads and opening of rural medical aid, supply of drinking water and development of co-operative credit system have really opened their eyes to the fact that non-official agency has been doing rural welfare work. The elections for the panchayats and the local boards are becoming increasingly interesting. The percentage of attendance at the polls and the keen contest at the elections show that the people have begun to realise the importance and the power of the vote. On the whole political education has begun on the right lines. There is also an awakening for social justice. The Reform Scheme awakened the lower classes to assert themselves in the march of progress. The cruel injustice done to them under the alleged teachings of the Code of Manu and the inhuman customs established under its authority, are being realized slowly. The evils of caste are many and are deep-rooted in society. Men's minds are being prepared for rapid social changes. In all public schools there is no impediment to the free admission of the boys of the Depressed Classes though we wish it to become universal. The railway, the tram and the canals are doing their own bit. Protected water supply or supply through pipes and fountains in urban areas is breaking down the barriers of cast. Caste system is gradually giving way. The work is great and the time was short for the Reforms Scheme to effect a revolution. A beginning has been made. The farm labourer demands his adequate wages on threat of emigration to Burma, Ceylon or to the Straits Settlements. The old custom of tying the labourer to the land is gradually losing its hold on the farm servant. The workmen in the Municipal and Union areas are now combined. Industrial labour is organizing itself, though slowly. Labour organizations ought to be conducted by representatives of labour and not by those who have no share or lot in labour conditions. Depressed Class missions are now teaching them the right way to assert their rights. The Christian Missions also contribute to the emancipation of these classes. Educational work of non-Christian and Christian Missions is helped by public funds, by providing grants to elementary education in a larger measure after Reforms. We cannot go simply to statistics for the measure of these things. We cannot turn to census tables and tabulate the extent of growth and development so rapidly effected under the Reforms.

The problem of unrest in rural areas is two-fold, political and economic, more of the socio-economic. The governing factors are not all political. The ryot and the agriculturist are exploited when there is economic difficulty or distress in those areas. The solution of the rural problem lies in the economic and agricultural development of the country. Political rights alone will not improve his lot. The extent of relief he could obtain may be gathered from the following among others :—

Relaxation of rules regarding the grant of (1) loans to agriculturists ; (2) of Taccavi and remission regulations ; (3) providing better facilities for using the Land Improvement Act ; (4) opening of grain stores ; (5) facilities for irrigation and opening of communications ; (6) easy access to cheaper money and improvement of agricultural knowledge, urgent provision for improving the village surroundings. Political education will be slow until the ryot is able to get over the economic and social difficulties. Agricultural improvements will perhaps be dealt with by the Royal Commission but the demand is more pressing than appears on the surface. Any scheme of political reform ought not to overlook the present state of the ryot or the cultivator unless relief is provided to improve his surroundings and create self-respect in him. Political reform alone will not be an effective remedy.

We will now note briefly under some of the heads indicated in the Statutory Commission's statement. The term of reference included (1) an enquiry into the working of the system of Government. This subject was dealt with in the Memorandum and the conditions under which the Dyarchic system could be worked. We may again draw attention to the summary of the reports of the Madras Government in the Despatches of the 16th and 28th July, 1924, para. 18, " the above survey indicates in the opinion of His Excellency the Governor-in-Council that the transitional constitution has worked with a considerable measure of success in Madras. The habit of joint consultation in all matters has borne fruit in the smoothness of administration ; there has been little or none of the friction between the different elements constituting the Government which is believed to have hindered the working of the Reforms in other provinces and has eventuated in complete break-down in some, and if an earnest endeavour to work on constitutional lines is a qualification for political advance, His Excellency the Governor-in-Council has no hesitation in asserting that the Madras Presidency has shown itself fitter for an advance than any other province." It is unnecessary for us to take a general survey again and reference is requested to pages 5—117 of the Report. On the question of the extent to which the Council represents and acts on public opinion reference is requested to para. 66 (page 78). In para. 67 the Report deals with the question of " How far and by what means relations have been maintained between members of the Council and their constituences." On the question of the formation of parties within the Council, the Report in para. 68 stated, " If the two contending parties were to be described in political parlance and excluding the few individuals who hold extreme views postulating the absolute disconnection of the country with England, they might be called respectively progressives and ultra-radicals." The opposition now consists of Non-Brahmins, Swarajists, and Independent Nationalists. As regards the progress of Parliamentary practice and traditions it is said, " On the whole the members may be said to have accustomed themselves gradually to the restrictions required by Parliamentary decorum, no less than to the assertion of Parliamentary rights and privileges. In particular, it is gratifying to note that the number of occasions on which members lapsed into unparliamentary language have been exceedingly few." Party organization in the Council is described in para. 72. Since the note was written more definite organizations were formed, whips were appointed and party meetings were frequently held. The whips and party executives are ever on the alert to promote party interests and purposes. The interest evinced by the constituences and the public in the work of the Council has been growing steadily and rapidly. It is becoming increasingly clear that the parties are working through party machinery. The present constitution being transitional, it will naturally give rise to difficulties but the system did result in a great measure of benefit to the people. People who ran away from the responsibility of working it could only speak of it from outside and without experience, criticise it as a failure and as unsuited for the advancement of the people. But for the financial difficulties and the "Non-co-operation" movement there would have been greater success and greater benefit to the people from this transitory and transitional experiment. Suffice it to say, that in the direction of rural reconstruction very good beginnings were made when the finances of the provinces showed some improvement. (2) Regarding the growth of education, it may be confidently asserted that the expansion of mass education among the people was the chief aim of the Government. The vast problem of mass education would not be solved in six years. What remains to be done must not obscure what was done hitherto. Rapid advancement and improvement is demanded on all sides and this means money which can be raised only by taxation. We are all unwilling to be taxed. It is the same all over the world. Therefore those that carry out the work are placed in a difficult position.

A survey of the elementary education was made and the areas unprovided with any school were marked out on the map of every taluq and efforts were directed to supply the need. Local aid and local enthusiasm was stimulated and local panchayats were encouraged to take interest in the work. Villages are associated with schools. It was the object of the Government to awaken real interest in the villagers for the village school. Success has resulted by adopting such a policy. Part-time schools and night schools also were encouraged with a view to bring the principle of compulsory education into operation as early as possible. Compulsory elementary education is working in nearly one-half of the municipal areas. Educational cess is being levied in most of the Local Board areas. The educational councils under the Act are doing useful services. These are non-official bodies created statutorily to help the spread of elementary education, free and compulsory. After spreading schools in all villages a revision or consolidation is necessary to make the school more serviceable. Village libraries were subsidised, panchayats were enabled to open libraries in villages; (b) similarly secondary education was overhauled by a Committee and the High Schools were encouraged to adopt a practical bias for manual training in the curricula of the schools to train the hand and eye of the pupils. A special Officer was appointed to advise the schools on the nature of practical and vocational courses which would be useful in the particular locality. Practical education has become popular among pupils and management in many schools. Private enterprise is more largely aided in the development of secondary education. The Madras University was reorganized to make it more a teaching and residential University and a new University was established in the Andhra Desa. With the aid of more money and with revised scheme of elementary education, rural education must be carried on more vigorously. This is a pressing need. Details are not now discussed.

(3) Development of representative institutions has been a marked feature under the Reforms Scheme. The village is slowly and gradually awakening to the sense of self-respect which it had in the old days. The village panchayat, the village forest panchayat, the village irrigation panchayat, the village school panchayat, the village temple committee are some of the agencies which are reviving the old life in a new form; the village is the basis of national life and development. The elections conducted for the various rural organizations are developing a sense of responsibility. The working of the Union panchayats and local self-governing institutions show irregularities and failures, but it is gratifying to note that the work has been of solid and satisfactory nature. A comparative study of local institutions and their working in other countries will make it clear that the Indian institutions have very rapidly developed the spirit of self-help and are capable of greater improvement. There are always men of capacity and self-reliance ready to take up honorary work and they do it well. The elective principle is working its way to create a sense of responsibility in the member elected to the Municipal or Local Board. In the nature of things the voter will take time to be independent and there is every hope of his doing do.

Representative system as applied to British India, e.g. (a) the basis of franchise:—We consider that there is no need to radically alter the franchise for the present and introduce needless complications now. But the franchise may be extended to half of the present qualification or tax-paying capacity in urban areas. The power of further extension may be given to the local bodies themselves.

In the Parliamentary system the power of enfranchising population always remained with the Parliament and the Reforms Acts did not prescribe the extent of franchise. By the will of the people franchise is gradually extended. If by a majority of the local body at a meeting specially convened for the purpose it is decided to extend the present franchise they may do so with the approval of the Local Government. The basis of the present franchise is property and income. We would not, for the time being, advocate "Adult Suffrage." The existing rules of procedure may continue with modifications. In the case of the Depressed Classes the franchise may be lowered to enable them to take part in Municipal Elections. Madras Electoral Rules provide for qualification for electors. Rules 4–8 govern rural and urban constituencies. It may reasonably be asked how could Responsible Government be established when only 3 or 5 per cent. of the population is enfranchised and the electorates are illiterate? This is not a novel feature in India. The constitutional development in other countries shows how gradually the franchise is extended till we come to "equal or flapper vote." Moreover India as a whole cannot be considered for purposes of franchise. The present franchise may be broadened to represent the interests of the general population. This will be a gradual process. The conditions are improving and electoral experience is growing fast among the people. The expansion of franchise is indissolubly connected with Representative Government. At the outset it may seem that the masses are poor, ignorant and helpless and the entire population lives in rural areas. The town-dwellers contribute only a small proportion to the revenue of the State and therefore the political advancement must be slow until the rural population has been more fully educated. But as we have made it clear, the awakening in the masses has been very rapid and political education will grow more through the exercise of responsibility. Mistakes may be made and through such mistakes people will learn responsibility. The impetus now given by the Reforms must be continued and carried forward in higher stages of responsibility from the Panchayat to the Councils.

(b) The method of election is governed by the regulations for the preparation of electoral rolls for general and special constituences of the Madras Legislative Council and by the regulations for the conduct of elections. These regulations have worked satisfactorily.

(c) The existing system of separate electorates is necessary for a time though this is not the ideal system. This has worked well so far. But with regard to the Depressed Classes it is necessary to organise unions or societies for them wherever possible and such organisations should be worked or controlled by leading men of that class. These societies may nominate representatives to a central body in the district which shall advise Government and prepare a schedule of suitable persons for nomination into the various local bodies, Provincial and Central Legislatures. Steps however may be taken to form electorates wherever it is possible and practicable in urban areas by reserving seats for them. This is only tentative and is subject to revision by the Legislative Councils if the members representing the community demand by a majority vote for a modification of this scheme.

(D.E.F.) GROWTH OF PARTIES AND GROWTH OF INFORMED PUBLIC OPINION.

We indicated in the preliminary remarks that the Reforms Scheme has given stimulus for the party system and for creating informed public opinion. Parties on definite political principles are being formed and there must be some time before a well-developed and well-regulated party system could develop, throughout the country. The destructive creed of the Swarajists had not helped the development of party system on sound lines. If that party had undertaken the working of the Reforms Scheme then there would have been greater scope to form separate groups on special policies and that would have helped the formation of party system. One of the basic principles of parliamentary government is a party system. There are parties with a nationalistic programme and also for communal justice. In this country where communal differences are based on social customs and religious doctrines and sanctions, inequalities are inevitable. Education has progressed in one community more rapidly than in another and facilities therefore must be provided for all others in order that justice may be done to all communities in the administration of the country. The demand for communal justice is real. The growth of informed public opinion may be seen from the number of vernacular newspapers multiplied during the last six years and in the number of new institutions started in the country for carrying on social and political work. The two great political parties in South India, the Congress and the Justice Party have their organizations in every district and conduct party newspapers. Social and political work is carried on in the districts by holding conferences and conventions and by sending out social and political workers to popularise the particular creed and programme of the party. Pamphlets and leaflets and newspapers of all sorts reach the villagers. In the village the more literate among them read out news to the villagers and discussions ensue therefrom. The growth of independent public opinion must take time and it depends upon the dissemination of proper education. The growth of sound principles of Local Self-Government will be an effective agency to awaken the ryot or agriculturalist to the consciousness of his rights or duties.

Nomination of officials and non-officials may be continued but their votes may not be taken into consideration especially those of officials. They should be entitled to sit in the Councils and the Assembly and have the right to address and give the benefit of their advice and knowledge. The nominated officials are always useful in the Council. The nomination of non-officials to represent minority communities and unrepresented classes is necessary until provision could be made for elected representatives. The method by which particular interests or communities could be represented depends upon the extent to which the interests or communities affect the body politic. It seems to us that the present method of representation in respect of special communities or constituencies may be maintained. It is not possible to avoid them in any scheme of Representative Government in India. The problem of representation of industrial labour by "labour" proper is not easy. While there may be a large number of labourers in the mill-areas the railway workers, miners, workshopmen other than railway men also form the bulk of the labouring class. They spread over several districts in the province. What is the representation that will be given to this class? The number of representatives must bear relation to the number of voters and that may be fixed in proportion to the strength of the Councils, every worker of a certain age and of a certain wage-earning capacity may be enfranchised for the purpose. A detailed census of the strength of the districts is preliminary to any calculation in this matter as in the case of the Depressed Classes.

Suitability of existing areas for legislative and administrative purposes and for the growth of representative institutions. The principle of formation of provinces on linguistic basis is sound for administrative purposes but the difficulty lies in procuring sufficient financial support either from the people or from the Government. A detailed examination is necessary before we could state definitely in the matter.

A. LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT:—

The provinces are divided into districts and taluqs for the purpose of revenue administration. The taluqs are again divided into firkas, within these firkas are a group of villages; in a largely populated village with a population of three thousand people, a union is established for local self-governing purposes. There are other functions exercised by the panchayats but the main work lies in looking after sanitation, opening of communications within the area and control over markets for the sale of food stuffs. Lighting of the Union area is also undertaken by some Unions. Powers to levy a small rate on property and income are given to the Local Bodies. The Union Boards are constituted on an elective basis, the franchise being payment of half a rupee as house or property tax or an income. In addition to these rural Unions, there are panchayats constituted under the Panchayat Act. These bodies consist of elected and nominated persons and have powers of administration. The Act has been in force for some time and the known defects may be amended in order to create a spirit of service and patriotism. During the year 1924–1925 the Ministry prepared drafts for amending the various Acts. Bills relating to Local Boards and Municipalities and bills for expansion of elementary education and to introduce the principle of compulsion in the rural areas were ready. In the drafts, devolution of powers was proposed and greater responsibility was vested in the Panchayat Taluq or Divisional Boards by the centralisation of functions. Greater financial independence, subject to the periodical audit was proposed. The reluctance of the local bodies to tax themselves was sought to be got over by relaxing the control of the Government. There should be officials connected with all these Boards. The Collector will continue to have certain emergency powers as is now provided in the Acts. The directions in which Government control could be minimised is not an easy matter. While audit is a safe check, there should be certain emergent executive powers in the Government to interfere in cases of misconduct and gross abuse of powers. To what extent this control should be exercised is a matter of detail. Local bodies are now accustomed to look forward to Government subsidies. This must be discontinued. Local rates and taxes may be so adjusted that fixed grants may take the place of the present system and any further demand by local bodies must be met from loans or rates. They must be accustomed to this financial self-reliance. This will lead to the true realisation of the spirit of self-reliance. The institution of local self-government forms the real training ground for many public men. They see therefrom that barren opposition to the administration will do no good to the people. Constructive work and service will alone bring happiness to their constituencies. From the local bodies trained men have come forward for the Provincial and Central Councils. The progress of local self-government in South India is most promising since the Reforms and contributes largely for the successful work in the Legislative Councils. The administrative experience gained in the divisional and district work encourages real responsibility. On the Legislative Councils we find a large number of elected members who had such training and experience.

PROVINCIAL COUNCIL :—

(a) The present constitution of Councils should be more satisfactory in the sense that the real representation of the agricultural population should be more adequate. The change in constitution depends upon the formation of electorates. The question of electorates has a distinct bearing on the constitution of the Councils. It is preferable to have single member constituencies, irrespective of the revenue divisions as they at present exist. The number of representatives may be based on population of the area. In an enlightened and richer division there may be more voters than in a poorer but more populated area. The principle of representation by population seems to be better in these cases than representation based on voting strength. If the franchise is lowered to half of what it is at present, the area of representation will be wider. We said already that the special electorates may be continued and the system of nominations also with modifications. The strength of the Legislative Council may be raised to 200 with power to raise it in case the franchise is further lowered and the electorates become further larger and the Councils also resolve for the purpose. A large addition is likely to lead to greater expenditure and perhaps inefficient work.

(b) The working of Dyarchy was described in the Memorandum referred to above.

(c) The points referred to in (d) to (k) were dealt with under sec. 49 (i), clause 2. Business rules framed in this Presidency do not give Ministers sufficient freedom to transact business independently. In the rules framed by the Governor he takes large powers to himself. Moreover under the Act the Minister is to advise and if his advice is not accepted he may resign or if he does not comply with the view of the Governor he may dismiss him. It is a precarious position. The relations between the Minister and the Governor as defined in the rules are not satisfactory and do not tend to smooth working. No doubt it depends upon the persons and personalities to a large extent. Even a nomination to the local bodies must receive the approval of the Governor. In the Transferred Departments schemes of development are often delayed and the financial scrutiny does not confine itself to giving advice on the schemes of new expenditure or other functions detailed in the Devolution Rules 37–39. Experience shows that the control should be limited as much as possible. There should be no transferred and reserved subjects. The power of veto may remain in certain cases relating to law and order. When the Provincial Councils are enlarged and when full Responsible Government is conceded to the provinces at once, a second chamber is necessary. The constitution of the chamber will be different from the Councils and shall consist of fifty members and a certain property qualification is essential. Further, one who is not thirty-five years of age shall not be qualified to be a member. The establishment of full Responsible Government in the provinces will necessitate readjustment of the division of subjects into provincial and central. The list now given in the Devolution Rules may be recast. How far should the control of the Central Government be retained after the change ? Sec. 45 (1) of the Government of India Act regulates the relation of Local Government to the Governor-General in Council. There are three ways in which direction or control is exercised : (1) Legislative veto of the bills ; this power is rarely exercised ; (2) Financial, after the release of the province from provincial contributions and a readjustment of the sources of revenue and re-allocation of revenue for the provinces as in the Devolution Rule 14 and with the rules regarding the raising of loans, provinces have practically financial autonomy ; (3) Administrative. This is necessary in cases of emergency where the army will be required to maintain law and order in the provinces. The control over the transferred subjects was limited by Devolution Rule 49 and a similar limitation will be made when all the subjects are transferred and Devolution Rule 13 will consequently be modified as also schedules I and II of the Devolution Rules. It is most important to define the limits of control by the Central Government. In the division of functions there are subjects allotted to the Provincial Government over which superintendence of Central Government is inevitable. The Central Government must have residuary and reserve powers.

CENTRAL GOVERNMENT :—CONSTITUTION, POSITION AND POWERS OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

" It is no longer sufficient to administer India. It is necessary also to satisfy her political aspirations." This must be the true spirit of Reforms in the Central Government. The experience gained in the past is of great value to the nation, we do not wish to theorize in dealing with the problem ; it is beset with many practical difficulties. We venture to state our views so that they may be carefully considered. The Central Government may consist of experts who have Parliamentary training and experience and other members of the executive council who should be responsible to the Assembly. An irremovable executive was tried in other countries, the conditions of the Assembly may justify a similar experiment, it was no doubt rejected in the Montford Report. A review of the principle seems necessary after the experience of the past years. The position of the Governor-General is stated in Sec. 33 of the Act subject to the control of the Secretary of State for India who is responsible to Parliament. We must take a plunge forward and have faith in the future and in the political capacity and self-reliance of Indians and introduce responsibility in the Central Government. The Assembly may be reconstituted in a manner that one member may represent one district area in British India. This may secure reality in the representation of agricultural population. The qualifications of members may be raised and the electorate may be broader based. The object of our suggestion is to have a more real representation of the people of the country. Similarly, the Council of State also should be enlarged. In the Government of India, the Governor-General shall be responsible for the following subjects :—

1. Defence of India. 2. International relations. 3. Relations with Indian States and all other subjects shall be administered by members responsible to the Assembly assisted and advised by experts where necessary who shall have offices for a fixed term of years. For " it should be the purpose of any scheme, desired for the Self-Government of India to blend together as far as possible the British and Indian Agents in the great task." The Governor-General shall be the President of the Executive Council and shall have reserve powers to exercise in times of emergency. The relations between the two Houses may continue to be as it is now. H.M. The King is the ultimate authority and source of power for the Government of India. The Legislative power of India shall be vested in H.M. The King, and the Assembly. British Parliament will retain power to intervene in matters pertaining to foreign relations and defence. India should have an equal status and shall be a partner in the Empire along with the Colonies. To this end the power of the Secretary of State for India must be totally revised in order that India might have a Secretary on the lines of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. It may be reasonably asked while the present system of Dyarchy is a failure how will it be practicable in the Central Government ? and again while the executive government is now placed in a difficult position with the present strength of the Assembly any increase will it not create greater difficulties ? To the first we would submit that there is no question of transferred or reserved as in the present system. To the second, we are confident from our experience of Madras elections that there will be facilities for more proper representation of rural population than at present who will be more responsible.

There will be no need for the Council of India. The affairs of India under the changed conditions cannot be administered from Whitehall though the air-craft and radio have bridged over space and time. The large powers and responsibilities of the Secretary of State to superintend, direct and control Indian affairs is a relic of Sec. 21 of the old Act of 1915. Mere delegation of powers to the Government of India is not sufficient. Government of India ought to be responsible to the people of India and to H.M. The King. The Secretary of State shall be the channel of communication to the British Government on Indian affairs. The existing services must be guaranteed all their privileges and rights and the recommendations of the Lee Commission were generally accepted by us. Appointment of a Public Services Commission is not an effective remedy to adjust inequalities in the services. In certain provinces particular classes are predominant and other classes or castes equally qualified with others have yet no chance of entering the services owing to a practical monopoly of the places. Unless there are rules to regulate recruitment in such a manner as to render justice to all classes of people, recruitment through the Public Services Commission will not create contentment. The function of a Services Commission is to select candidates of equal qualifications and prepare a list for the guidance of departments out of which the heads of departments may make the necessary appointments. That is what the Staff Selection Board is now doing in this province. From a re-survey of the situation it seems necessary that the functions of the Public Services Commission as at present defined do not adequately safeguard the claims of people all round.

As long as India depends for her internal peace and external protection on the military and navy of Great Britain it is vain to talk of "independence," or "self-determination," and whatever may be the other constitutional changes that will be made; the Military and Naval independence of India should proceed quicker and steadier, in order that efficient Indian Military units may be developed. Until then the British Parliament is bound to continue to control India's foreign policy. For our part we will fight for our freedom and will fight on the side of Britain. So far as the changes in the Central Government are concerned we have indicated above that responsibility may be introduced in the Central Government and that the administration of defence, foreign relations and dealings with Indian States should be vested in the Governor-General of India. We have also suggested the idea of irremovable executive as in the United States of America, as an alternative principle. The policies in these departments under the Governor-General may be open to discussion in the Assembly, their finances will be non-voted, after the Assembly has had the opportunity of examining their financial condition by an expert committee. We suggest that after the recommendations of this committee are accepted by the Assembly the allotments shall not be subject to reduction but any excess expenditure will be dealt with on its own merits subject however to the certification of the Governor-General on special grounds relating to peace and tranquility and good Government of the country. In the case of other departments the members administering them, be they officials or non-officials shall be responsible to the Assembly. In the case of experts in Finance, Commerce or Railway they will also be equally responsible to the Assembly and would only vacate their seats if a direct vote of "no-confidence" is passed against the Government as a whole by two-thirds of the members of the Assembly. In the case of officials of the Government they revert to their former position as Secretary or Commissioner and in the case of experts they resign and retire with all the terms of contracts duly fulfilled by the Government. These members will bring new ideals and fresh life into the Assembly so that it may carry out the highest traditions and the best ideals of Parliamentary Government. Rules may be made to regulate work in the Assembly but example is far more effective; Swaraj or Responsible Government in India must imbibe the spirit and character of the Parliamentary Government and those who have experience of the art and science of the system are best able to assist us. A blending together of British and Indian elements is absolutely essential for the good Government of the country. Therefore it is that we emphasized the desirability of securing places in the Government for experts of the class. We have also referred to the gradual building up of Responsible Government in India. We propose that a scheme of Government may be framed which will automatically carry forward to the goal, provided the progress is not retarded by causes for which the scheme is no longer responsible. There should be no room for doubt as to the goal to which we are advancing. When the people have gained practical experience and political self-reliance and have proved their capacity and character it should be possible for the representatives of the people to determine the nature and form of Government for the country hereafter. Here again as in the case of Local Self-Government they may make mistakes but will learn from the practical working of the administration. We anticipate difficulties in preparing a scheme which will automatically take all the people of India from one stage to the other and to make provision for necessary conditions of development. Periodical survey by the representatives of the people to determine the further lines of political development assisted and advised by British representatives if necessary may be one of the means of ascertaining whether the people are ready and willing to take the step forward with all its consequences.

The foundation for the whole scheme must be laid in the full development of Local Self-Government, which should provide opportunities to the ryots and the rural voter to realise real responsibility, to learn to vote independently and to acquire experience and knowledge of the methods of the administration. Swaraj will inevitably become possible when that development is reached.

Memorandum submitted by the South Indian Liberal Federation, Madras.

In presenting this Memorandum regarding the future political constitution of this country, the Federation desires to confine itself to making recommendations which can immediately be given effect to, and to suggesting improvements in the constitution which can readily be made, without danger either to the internal peace and security of the country or to the legitimate interests of any section of the people therein. The Federation desires it to be distinctly understood that the proposals herein contained have been put forward after careful consideration and in the hope that if accepted they will result in organising public opinion in favour of the new constitution and giving it such support as would enable the new constitution to be successfully worked. The main suggestions of the Federation are :—

1. The establishment of Provincial Autonomy with an Executive responsible to the Legislature in the Provinces.
2. The creation of a responsible Executive in the Central Government with reference to certain subjects.
3. The continuance of the control of the Military services in the hands of the Imperial Government.

PROVINCIAL AUTONOMY.

The present system of Dyarchy in the Provinces cannot be worked much longer and it must give place to some better and less rickety constitution. It is unnecessary to dilate on the many disadvantages from which public workers, Legislative Council members and administrators are suffering on account of the somewhat abnormal constitution which exists in the Provinces at present. The system requires exceptional conditions for its satisfactory functioning, and it is becoming increasingly clear that such conditions cannot be predicated of any Province much longer. The only alternative to the present system is taking a bold step forward and granting full responsible Government in the Provinces. Dyarchy must go, yielding place to a Unitary Government responsible to the Provincial Legislature. There have been attempts to speak of Provincial Autonomy with a number of mental reservations as regards what is implied by the phrase. The Federation deprecates any idea of centralising subjects which have now been declared Provincial. Whatever defects may be pointed out regarding the classification of the subjects into " Reserved " and " Transferred " in the Provinces, the classification of central and provincial subjects has, on the whole, been satisfactory. If complaint there is at all, it is in the direction of suggesting that some central subjects at present may easily be provincialised in the interests of efficiency and quick dispatch of business. When, therefore, the Federation speaks of responsible Government in the Provinces, it means a Government responsible to the Legislature for the administration of all those subjects which are now in the charge of the Provincial Government and which have been declared as provincial subjects.

LAW AND ORDER.

The Federation is aware that difficulties have been suggested in the way of granting such autonomy to the Provinces, particularly in relation to the administration of the subjects of Law and Order. It has been pointed out that these are subjects which require a higher degree of unbiased efficiency in the administration and that it is difficult, if not impossible, to expect Ministers responsible to democratic assemblies to administer them in that manner. The Federation would like to reply by pointing out two distinct and different considerations which may negative the force of this criticism. In the first place, this kind of reasoning involves a want of confidence in the sense of responsibility which Ministers may have, and will naturally lead one to the conclusion that Provincial Autonomy and much more Dominion Status is an impossibility in this country. The history of Ministerial administration throughout the country and particularly in this Province does not justify one in entertaining these fears regarding impartial and efficient administration. It may also be pointed out that the administration of Law and Order has, at least in this Presidency, been in the hands of Indian Executive Councillors during the past few years, and there is no suggestion whatsoever that there has been a slackening of effort to administer Law properly or to maintain Order in the Districts. If the argument is seriously raised that an Indian Executive Councillor is, after all, not directly responsible to the Legislative Council and that his seat in the Government is secure and is unaffected by decisions of the Legislature it may be pointed out that Indian Executive Councillors have shown themselves as much liable to be influenced by the legitimate wishes of the Legislative Council and have shown an anxiety, with rare exceptions, to obtain the goodwill of the Legislative Council and its moral support in the administration of their subjects. In fact, it would be equally fair to suggest that, with some few exceptions, Executive Councillors, whether Indian or European, have been as popular with the Legislature as Indian Ministers and that they have often tried to concede to the wishes of the Legislature without detriment to efficiency and without the officers of the Police Department being under the fear that they may not receive support from their superiors on critical occasions.

THE MADRAS RECORD.

The records of the Legislative Council, also, will amply establish the fact that a sense of responsibility has been shown on numerous occasions by the Provincial Legislative Council in regard to this very question of the maintenance of Law and Order. Madras has had its problems in relation to this vexed question and they have been problems not certainly inferior either in complexity or in their far-reaching consequences to problems elsewhere. The Moplah rebellion, which broke out early in 1921, the Non-co-operation Movement which convulsed the entire Presidency by an unprecedented agitation, the Bardoli programme of non-payment of taxes which had its echo in the Guntur District, where there was a refusal of payment of taxes and the whole system of Revenue administration was in danger of breaking down, the passive resistance movement with reference to the establishment of a municipality at Chirala, the determined stand of the landholders of Tanjore against the proposed enhancement of taxation due to resettlement—these were some of the problems which faced the Member in charge of Law and Order and presented themselves to the Legislative Council. What was the attitude of the Legislative Council with reference to every one of these problems ? Even at that time when the subjects were reserved, when the Legislature could have afforded to remain as if unconcerned with these problems and to have taken up an attitude of antagonism to Government in the safe belief that ultimately extraordinary powers will be brought into use if necessary—even at such a stage when the path of ease and popularity lay in the Legislature not supporting the Government in the drastic action that it sought to adopt to combat these problems—the Madras Legislative Council by a very large majority supported every measure which the Government advocated with reference to these various problems. It seems to the Federation that it is unfair to such a Legislature to suspect that, when its powers are greater and its responsibility more direct, it would not rise equal to the occasion.

INFLUENCE OF MINISTERS.

There is another consideration which the Federation would like to place as an affirmative reason for transferring the subject of Law and Order to the control of popular Ministers. It has been the experience not merely of the Madras Legislature, but of practically every Legislature in the Provinces that Ministerial administration helps to create a body of public opinion in favour of measures which Ministers desire to adopt. So far from the Ministers yielding to the clamour of the Legislative Councils without regard to their responsibilities or the interests of the country, it will be found from an examination of the proceedings of the Councils that Ministers have stayed the Legislatures from rushing into the adoption of policies which do not bear a thorough and careful scrutiny. The Federation would like to instance the administration of the Excise Department in the various provinces as a test case of how Ministerial responsibility tends to promote a steady policy in the administration of such Departments.

When Excise became a transferred subject, it was generally felt that the keenness with which the Indian public, and particularly the educated section which is generally prohibitionist, desired to pursue a policy of total prohibition, would result in the extinction of the Excise Department and the total abolition of the excise revenue; and nothing stood in the way of the Provincial Legislatures declaring themselves immediately for total prohibition, and in fact moves of that kind were made by individual non-official members of the Legislatures, sometimes from enthusiastic reformatory motives and sometimes with devious political objectives. But it must be acknowledged to the credit of the Legislatures and to the support which the Ministers enjoyed, that these motives proved futile. If the history of the administration of the Excise Department during the last ten years is any indication at all of how policies will be changed by a popular Legislature, the inference is clear that responsibility to the Legislature will strengthen the hands of the administrator in stabilising the policy of the Government.

The Federation feels, therefore, that as far as it is humanly possible to foresee the trend of events, there is no reason to fear that, either with reference to the administration of Law and Order or with reference to any other subject, chaos or want of sound policy will characterise the working of Government if these subjects are transferred to the control of the Legislature. At the same time, the Federation realises that the constitution must make provision for all eventualities, however unlikely, and for emergencies, however rare. The question of providing for safeguards when Provincial Autonomy is guaranteed is, therefore, a question which the Federation must squarely face.

After giving the subject its most anxious consideration, the Federation has come to the conclusion that the only safeguard it can think of is the vesting of extraordinary powers in the Governor of the Province to intervene on occasions of emergency. These occasions would, naturally, be extremely rare, and it is the hope of the Federation that they may never arise at all. But still, as the Federation has already observed, it is a provision or an insurance against extreme contingencies.

The Federation would only like to observe, finally, with reference to this aspect of the question, that anything short of full Provincial Autonomy in the sense suggested above would fail to satisfy any section of the people and would lead to greater complications than exist at present; and it is the fervent hope of the Federation that the Commission will recommend, and the Parliamentary authorities will accept, this recommendation.

CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.

The position of the Central Government vis-à-vis the Central Legislature is at present one of great anomaly. The learned authors of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms gave the most convincing arguments against the creation of a Legislature with mere critical powers and with no responsibility for actively shaping policies. It is inexplicable why, with the lesson so well learnt from the Minto-Morely system of Reforms, the same system should have been continued in the Central Government. The time has come when responsibility should form a feature of the Central administration also. The argument that the present Central Legislature has, by its irresponsible methods of dealing with subjects, shown itself incapable of developing a sound system of democratic constitution is, even if correct, an argument round a vicious circle. The Central Legislature has the record it at present possesses merely because no power and no responsibility has been conferred on it, and so long as that system continues so long will irresponsible criticism be the main characteristic of any Legislature. The Federation is aware that there are two schools of extreme thought diametrically opposed to each other on the question of introducing responsibility in the Central Government. On the one hand, there is a school of thought which believes that the entire Government can be made totally responsible to the Legislature and that immediately. On the other hand, there is a view that no sort of responsibility can be introduced in the Central Government and that the Central Government stands for order and for the prevention of that chaos which will overtake the country if the prestige and authority of the Central Government is in any way weakened, that the line of reforms is not to dilute responsibility in the Central Government, but rather to stiffen and strengthen that responsibility and make it more absolute than it is at present and less liable to have its policy affected by considerations of respect and regard for public opinion as expressed in the Indian Legislative Assembly. It has been freely stated that, though under the present constitution there is no responsibility given to the Legislative Assembly and that the members have only the free right to criticise, still the intangible and imperceptible, but none-the-less real, pressure which the Legislative Assembly exerts on the Government has acted to the detriment of the administration and made it weak and to a certain extent unstable. These are views with neither of which the Federation is in a position to agree. The Federation has stated at the very commencement that its object in presenting this Memorandum is to put forward a system which is as close to the practical realities of the situation as any system can be and that it has taken into its consideration every difficulty and tried to find methods by which these difficulties can be obviated. The Federation recognises that there are branches of administration which cannot at the present moment be handed over to the control of a popular Legislature. The difficulty and complexities that surround the administration of the Army and the Navy, the relation of the Indian Government with Foreign Powers, the relation of the Government with the Indian States, are subjects of such vast and obvious importance that the Federation feels it would be neither statesmanship nor political wisdom to suggest that complete responsibility in the management of these subjects should under the present circumstances be vested in a Government under the control of a popular Legislature. On the other hand, the Federation feels that those who advocate a policy of reversal, or at least a policy of standstill with reference to the Central Government, have not taken into account the spirit of the times, the mentality of the people, the political advance the country has made, and the dangers of a policy of stagnation. A policy of reversal carries with it its own condemnation. Public opinion, which has been accustomed to express itself in the manner in which the Legislative Assembly has done, cannot be shut out by statutory enactments. The Federation is, therefore, forced to the conclusion that a policy of progress is as much needed with reference to the Central Government as with reference to Provincial Governments. It is strongly of opinion, therefore, that a certain amount of responsibility ought to be introduced in the Central Government. It may, however, be asked whether it is not illogical to suggest Dyarchy in the Central Government while condemning the very system in the provinces. The scheme that the Federation suggests tries to eliminate as far as possible the element of Dyarchy as it is now understood. The future Legislative Assembly, the Lower House of the Central Legislature, would have control over all subjects now classed as Central subjects, except the Army and Navy, Foreign and Political Relations, Relations with the Indian States and allied subjects—these subjects will be entirely withdrawn from the purview of the Legislative Assembly. No resolution will be permitted with reference to these subjects. No budget grants will be moved for finding money for the administration of these subjects. The Lower House will have no connection, directly or indirectly, with the administration or financing of these services.

ARMY AND NAVY.

The question then arises how these subjects will be administered and whether at some stage or other public opinion should not express itself even by way of criticism with reference to the administration of some of these subjects. It will be readily pointed out that the proposal of the Federation involves a resiling from the existing state of affairs, that the Assembly now has a right to criticise the Army Budget and move resolutions regarding the administration of the Army and move special motions regarding the conduct of any particular sub-department and in other ways try to influence the administration with reference to these subjects. These are valuable rights, however ineffective they may prove themselves to be in the ultimate, which the present proposals would deprive the Legislature of. The Federation realises the force of this observation, but feels that there is no help for it, particularly if, as is very desirable, the pitfalls of Dyarchy should be avoided in the Central Government. But, at the same time, to give scope for the ventilation of public views in some form or another and at some place or other, the Federation suggests that these subjects may be discussed in the Council of State and in the Chamber of Princes. The subjects, which the Federation wishes to remove from the purview of the Lower House, concern not merely British India but also the Indian States. The Indian Princes are as much interested in the question of an adequate Army and a proper Navy and Foreign relations as the people of British India, and both are interested in a proper understanding of the relations between British India and Indian States. The Federation, therefore, proposes that besides the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State, a third Chamber—a Chamber of Princes—should be constituted by a statutory enactment and that the subjects referred to herein should be discussed at a Joint Session of the Council of State and of the Chamber of Princes. Over this Joint Session of the two Houses His Excellency the Viceroy will preside. At this Joint Session the power of moving resolutions regarding these subjects and the budget relating to them will be exercised.

The financing of these services, which have been removed from the control of the Indian Legislative Assembly, is naturally a question which has to be solved. The Federation suggests that a Commission should be immediately appointed to fix the amount that is required for these services and that this amount may be treated as the maximum amount which can be utilised without the sanction of any authority for the administrative departments, subject, of course, to the control of public audit and other departmental controls for a definite period of time, say 10 or 15 years. Over and above this, His Excellency the Viceroy will be given the power to allot, in cases of emergency, such amount as may be required in excess of the maximum fixed by the Commission. The revenue of the country will be allocated in the manner suggested above, and, after the amount required for these subjects is appropriated the balance will be distributed among the different departments and the budget so framed with reference to those departments alone will be placed before the Indian Legislative Assembly for its consideration.

FRANCHISE AND ELECTORATES.
PROVINCIAL.

The question of franchise and creation of electorates is not the least difficult of questions that face those who desire to formulate a constitution for any country. The Federation is in favour of continuing the special and separate electorates existing at present, so long as there is no move either from the interests which have received special representation or from the communities who enjoy separate electorates that this system be changed. The experience of the Federation of general electorates has not been so happy nor of the separate electorates so bitter that it could readily join in the cry for the abolition of the latter or the perpetuation of the former. The Federation does not agree that all communal evils existing in the country at present are due either wholly or in a very large measure to the creation of separate electorates. In particular with reference to the Hindu-Moslem representation, the Federation feels strongly that so long as there is no desire among the general mass of the Moslem public to change the system of separate electorates into one of Joint electorates, either with reservation or otherwise; so long as the Moslems feel still doubtful whether their interests will be safeguarded under any other system of electorates; so long as there does not exist complete trust and confidence in the larger communities; so long will it be neither wise nor politic to insist on the creation of joint electorates. The remedy for the removal of communal evils is not the mechanical substitution of one system of electorates for another, but the more difficult psychological process of creating mutual trust and confidence. The Federation must unreservedly state it as its opinion that in the country as a whole, and in this Presidency in particular, Moslem opinion continues to be strongly in favour of separate electorates. Even those Moslems who agree to the system of general electorate with reservation couple it with conditions which clearly and conclusively prove that it is not so much the advantage of general electorates that they have in view as the advantage of adventitious and subsidiary conditions which they propose in consideration of their accepting joint electorates. The Federation is, therefore, clearly of opinion that till the Moslems make a definite move on their own initiative for the abolition of separate electorates and their substitution by joint electorates, the present system should not be disturbed.

HINDU-MOSLEM QUESTION.

It should also be remembered that the system is the result of a definite compact or compromise between the two high contracting parties, the Moslems on the one hand and the Hindus on the other, arrived at at Lucknow and ratified by the Imperial Parliament itself. It has been put forward and very rightly by Moslem delegations that this pact should not be reopened without the complete concurrence of both the contracting parties and that separate electorates should not go unless the Moslems are willing parties to general electorates. The logical corollary also follows that any change in the present system like the variation of the strength of the two communities in any of the legislatures ought not to be made either to the detriment of the Moslems or that of the Hindus without the consent of the contracting parties. The Federation feels that this is wholly the crux of the problem and trusts that the Commission will leave matters in status quo till there is a determination on the part of both the communities to adjust their mutual rights and obligations to the satisfaction of each other. Till then, the Lucknow pact ought to be continued and no political party will be justified in advocating its disturbance. In this Presidency the Moslems have had representation in excess of their number whether population is the basis for electoral rights or whether the voting strength according to property qualification is considered the basis. The province has adopted it during the last decade and the Federation does not feel justified in advocating a change under the circumstances stated above. The same observation applies, though, perhaps, to a less degree with reference to the European, the Anglo-Indian and the Indian Christian special electorates which exist in the Province. The Federation does not also propose to disturb the special electorates of the landholders and of commercial interests. It recognises the need for such representation and feels that there is nothing opposed to a democratic system of Government in a fairly balanced representation of all interests and of all classes.

FRANCHISE.

Having advocated an extension of responsibility the Federation may be asked whether it proposes to widen the basis of that responsibility and, if so, to what extent? The Federation undoubtedly believes that adult franchise is the ideal, but no country has jumped into adult franchise—at least in the British Isles—and unless one is prepared to face a possible breakdown of the electoral machinery and the creation of forces the exact scope and nature of which it is impossible to forecast, one is bound to be cautious in the advance towards broadening the basis of democracy. The Federation feels that reducing the present qualification by half will be sufficient broadening of the electorate for all practical purposes, and puts forward the suggestion in the hope that it will be acceptable to reasonable opinion throughout the country.

THE DEPRESSED CLASSES.

The question of representation of the Depressed Classes in the Legislatures has engaged the very serious and anxious consideration of the Federation, and the difficulty of the problem has not been lessened by the obvious fact that the Depressed Classes themselves have naturally felt that the complexity of the problem is such that they cannot put forward a ready-made system. There are some considerations however, which ought to prevail and regarding which there seems to be unanimity of opinion. That the present system of nomination of Depressed Classes should go admits of no doubt whatsoever. That it should give place to some system wherein an element of election would exist, and that the will of these classes should somehow be ascertained equally admits of no doubt. What exactly is that system which can give the right of election to the classes and yet not involve the expenditure and other consequences of a wide and vast electorate—consequences which would fall particularly hard on members of a community situated as the Depressed Classes are—that is the problem which has to be solved. One possible solution is the division of the Depressed Classes under different groups and according to their residence in different geographical areas, and the formation of Unions among them recognised like Trade Unions under a proper statute and the giving of power to these Unions to send representatives to an electoral college which in its turn will choose the required number of members of Legislative Council. Another suggestion is to get the various registered Unions to suggest names and out of the panel to get the requisite number of representatives by selection by the Government—a process which involves a limited right of nomination. These are suggestions which the Federation has put forward with great diffidence. The Federation is agreeable to accept any reasonable proposals which the affected classes themselves put forward for their proper representation. It may, however, be observed that in the general Hindu electorates these classes will continue to have their votes under the lowered franchise and will continue to exercise their general influence in the elections which as the franchise gets lowered more and more will be greater and greater. As regards the number of representatives from these classes, it should be remembered that at present there are ten members nominated from these classes in a Legislative Council of 134. That it is not altogether an inadequate number will be realised from the comparative strength of other communities. The Federation is, however, agreeable to a maximum of ten per cent of the elective strength of the Council being reserved for members of the Depressed Classes, in which category come the Adi-Dravidas, the Adi-Andhras, the Arundhateeyas, the Yeluvans, the Mukkavans, the Oobravas and other communities which are really depressed.

LABOUR.

The question of the proper representation of labour in the Councils has been prominent before the Federation, and the Federation has come to the conclusion that, apart from the lowering of franchise, a special effort should be made to get certain classes of labour more directly represented in the Councils. Labour in this Province may roughly be divided into two classes, the agricultural labour and the industrial labour. So far as agricultural labour is concerned, not merely by the reduction of the franchise suggested above, but by direct representation of the large body of the Depressed Classes, the Federation feels that adequate representation has been secured for it. Agricultural labour is very largely constituted of the Depressed Classes, the term being used in the extended sense referred to above. In rural areas, moreover, the petty proprietor who is proposed to be enfranchised under the scheme of the Federation, is the actual manual labourer, and the reduction of the franchise leads to his vote being recorded at the elections. The class of labour that may not get representation is the labour employed in industries in urban areas. To the extent that even here the franchise has been lowered, to that extent the industrial labourer will share in choosing representatives. But that by itself would not ensure a representative of his solely devoted to the interests of labour finding a seat in the Council. The Federation, therefore, proposes that industrial labour in urban areas should have separate representation by forming special electorates in selected areas consisting of actual labourers, or by recognising registered Trade Unions as electoral colleges for the choice of labour representatives to the Councils.

STRENGTH OF THE COUNCIL.

The system of responsible Government in the Presidency advocated by the Federation naturally involves the removal of all those elements which lend strength to whatever party is in office. The system of nomination of officials and of non-officials ought, therefore, to go. The present strength of the Council is 134 in this Presidency and the Federation proposes that the strength should be raised to 200. The lowering of the franchise naturally leads to a larger number of electors being on the rolls and the need for a greater number of candidates representing them and the re-distribution of electoral areas so that they may be more compact, less unwieldy and more manageable. It is impossible to expect a candidate or representative to be in touch with the entire electorate when by the extensiveness of the area and by the vastness of the number of voters he is physically unable to do so. The Federation advocates the division of electoral areas into compact tracts and the increase of the number of elected members to two hundred as suggested above. The proportions between community and community and between interest and interest which have been standardised at present will continue in the new Council.

So far as the strength of the Government in the provinces is concerned, the Federation suggests that there ought to be seven Ministers including the Chief Minister, and that the principle of Joint Responsibility should be recognised in the Cabinet.

TERM OF COUNCIL.

A question of some importance which was not appreciated in 1919 when the system was introduced is the question of duration of the Councils. It is generally felt that the present term of three years is altogether inadequate for any constructive policy to be carried out by a Ministry and that the Council should have its life for a period of five years as the House of Commons. The Federation, therefore, suggests that the term of life of the future Councils may be fixed at five years.

CENTRAL LEGISLATURE.

The arguments addressed above with reference to Provincial Legislatures apply in a very large measure to the Central Legislature, particularly arguments relating to separate electorates and special electorates and the representation of the Depressed Classes. The term of the Central Legislature has also to be of five years. There is one question relating to inter-provincial representation in the Central Legislature which the Federation would like to emphasise. It is perfectly true that when once the Central Legislature is constituted, representatives should begin to think not in terms of provinces, but in terms of the country as a whole. This feeling has to be promoted, whether ultimately the Unitary system of Government or the Federal type is adopted. But that does not imply that unequal representation as between the provinces ought to be permitted in the Central Legislature. According to the present system, we feel that the different Provinces are not given the same amount of representation. The only basis for that representation being population, the Federation suggests that in the future constitution of the Central Legislature this basis should be adopted, and seats allocated to each Province according to the strength of the population in that Province.

PUBLIC SERVICES.

One of the most important political issues in this Province is the question of proper recruitment to the Public Services of the province. It is freely stated by those who have not understood the part that to this day the Public Services have played in shaping the many activities of the people directly and indirectly that the question of Public Services is a very simple question, that all that is required is the securing of efficiency, and that by the magic test of a competitive examination efficiency can always be secured. Every one of these statements expresses only a half truth. The Federation feels strongly that in framing rules for the recruitment to Public Services under the powers given by the new constitution regard should be had to the fact that the predominance of any particular community should be avoided in any service, Provincial or Central. The Federation is thankful to see that after all this principle has been recognised by His Excellency the Viceroy and by the Central and Provincial Governments. But it desires to be assured that the principle will continue to receive the same recognition in future, and, what is far more important, that besides a theoretical recognition it will be carried out in practice.

CONCLUSION.

As has been already stated, the Federation has very carefully considered the question of constitutional advance at various Confederations and particularly at a Special Meeting of the Executive Body of the Federation, and has put forward the suggestions with due regard to all aspects of the question and not ignoring the difficulty, or the precautions to be taken, in making an advance. The Federation feels that the country is at the parting of ways, and while there is a strong section determined to do constructive work, believing in the fulfilment of a higher purpose that India and England should work in political union and believing that every legitimate political aspiration of Indians could be satisfied by the continuance of that union, there is another section growing in numbers which is out for ruthless destruction of all that is held dear by those who put their faith in constitutional principles. It is not the line of wisdom merely to preach to the country to pursue a policy of peace, of goodwill and of good understanding, and not to strengthen the hands of those who are pursuing this very policy by adopting their reasonable suggestions. The Federation feels certain that with the larger experience which the Commission has gained of the country during its extensive tour and with the materials gathered by it, it would have arrived at two conclusions—first, that there is a large body of opinion in favour of political advance by constitutional methods; and, secondly, that, unless the faith which that party has placed in constitutional methods of agitation is vindicated in the very near future, the result will be a landslide in the direction of the gathering forces of disaffection and disorder and the weakening of the hands of those who desire to arrest such a process. The Federation is hopeful that such a catastrophe would be avoided and its good wishes go with the Commission for a successful solution of the many problems that face the Commission.

The Federation has nominated Mr. A. Ramaswami Mudaliar, President of the Corporation of Madras, and Mr. A. T. Pannirselvam, President, District Board, Tanjore, to appear as witnesses on behalf of the Federation before the Commission.

MADRAS.

1st March 1929.

PRESENT:

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION, OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND) AND OF THE MADRAS PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

CHAIRMAN:

SIR JOHN SIMON (for part of first deputation only).
LORD BURNHAM (for remainder of first deputation).
COLONEL LANE-FOX, (for second deputation).

Deputation from (a) the Ganjam District Peoples' Association (b) the South Indian Liberal Federation.

The deputation consisted of :—

(a) Mr. KOKA APPA RAO NAIDU, Advocate, Joint Secretary, Ganjam District Peoples' Association.
Mr. W. V. B. RAMALINGAM PANTULU, Vice-President.
Mr. BHUVANESWAR RUTH, Advocate.

(b) Mr. A. RAMASWAMY MUDALIAR, President, Corporation of Madras.
Mr. A. T. PANIRSELVAM, Barrister-at-Law,

1. The Chairman: We have a Memorandum from the Ganjam District Peoples' Association, and also a Memorandum on constitutional reforms presented by the South Indian Liberal Federation of Madras. The two run very much on the same lines, and it is a good plan to take them together. We notice that both of them take the broad line that provincial autonomy is desired. When you use that phrase, are you thinking of self-government in the province, as opposed to subjects being reserved to members, or are you thinking of the relation of the province to the Central Government?—(Mr. Mudaliar) I am thinking of both.

2. So you propose that the province should be quite separate from the Central Government?—To the extent that subjects are provincialised.

3. Do you think that the provincial authorities should have an exclusive responsibility; exclusive, I mean, of the centre, on all matters connected with keeping order?—Yes.

4. You do not want any assistance from the Army?—No, that is not the meaning. The assistance from the Army would be obtained on application by the province to the Central Government, if necessary; but the determination of whether that assistance was necessary would be the determination of the Provincial Government.

5. The phrase is constantly used in these controversies in two quite distinct senses. Many people use the words, "provincial autonomy" when what they mean is that they want to end Dyarchy, and they want to have a Provincial Government which is wholly responsible to the Provincial Legislature. That I follow, quite, of course; but the other question is the relation of the province, however it is governed, to the centre, however it is governed. Then when one comes to some specific things—I am taking the Ganjam document—on page 303, you deal first of all with local bodies. I am not quite clear what your suggestions or proposals are. Apparently it is this, on page 303: "We consider that there is "no need to radically alter the franchise for the "present and introduce needless complications now. "But the franchise may be extended to half of the "present qualification or tax-paying capacity in "urban areas. The power of further extension may "be given to the local bodies themselves." Is that referring to the franchise in the local bodies?—No, I think that needs correction. That was with reference to the local Council itself. So far as the franchise for local bodies is concerned, that would naturally be adjusted by the local Council.

6. That is rather what occurs to one. It may be that whatever the constitutional changes are likely to be, as far as the Conference is concerned or the Imperial Parliament is concerned, it will not itself attempt to prescribe what should be the franchise in the local bodies?—No.

7. Then I am to read this passage, on page 303, as referring to the franchise for the provincial Council?—Yes.

8. Sir Hari Singh Gour: "But the franchise "to the local Council may be extended," and so on?—Yes, and certain areas may be cut off. This other Memorandum makes the point clear.

9. The Chairman: You mean the Memorandum of the South Indian Liberal Federation?—Yes, at page 310.

10. Quite right. "The Federation feels that "reducing the present qualification by half will be "sufficient broadening of the electorate." Then the next point is on page 303 of the Ganjam document, where you say, near the bottom of the page: "The "existing system of separate electorates is necessary "for a time, though this is not the ideal system. "This has worked well so far." I gather that that is the view, also, of the South Indian Liberal Federation?—Yes.

11. It is on page 309 of the Liberal Federation's document?—Yes: "The Federation is in favour of "continuing the special and separate electorates "existing at present, so long as there is no move "either from the interests which have received "special representation or from the communities "which enjoy separate electorates that the system "be changed."

12. I see you go on to say: "The Federation "does not agree that all communal evils existing "in the country at present are due either wholly or "in a very large measure to the creation of separate "electorates." What is it to which you do attribute for the most part the communal evils of which you speak?—Mainly it is due to the desire of either community to gain a place in the administration—to gain political power.

13. I dare say you are right. You think it really is a competition for power?—Yes.

14. And perhaps preparation for the future?—Yes; and that competition will be there whether there are separate electorates or not.

15. I do not want to argue it; but if you say it is not due to one thing it naturally occurs to one to ask whether it is due to the other. Do you consider that this communal tension is materially affected by the desire to secure appointments for members of a particular community?—I would rather put it slightly differently. It is due to the apprehension that members of other communities may gain an undue advantage.

16. Anyhow, apparently the view is that though it is not an ideal system, you think separate electorates are necessary for a time?—Yes.

17. Have you anything to tell the Conference as to how you think that time will come to an end? I do not ask you to fix a date; that is a thing nobody can do; but you speak of it being necessary for a time, which means that you do not regard it as necessary for always. Well, what is the change that is going to make it unnecessary?—Supposing full responsible government is given in the provinces, both the communities have to work together in a joint cabinet where members of each community must find a place, and that would certainly pave the way for a better understanding between the two communities through the leaders of the two communities working together.

18. I quite appreciate that you have not got it extending over every department, but you have at present a minister of one community and a minister of another community working together?—That is true; but at the present time the responsibility is not entire, and the ministers are appointed more because members of each community have to find a place than because they have a joint responsibility as between themselves.

19. Then, what you contemplate, apparently, in the future, is that the provincial cabinet should contain ministers drawn from the different communities?—It must necessarily contain members drawn from different communities, but acting as a joint whole with undivided responsibility as between themselves.

20. But when you say they must necessarily be drawn from different communities, you are not proposing to provide that in the constitution?—No, I take it that the natural course of things will be that.

21. Would it, do you think?—I think so.

22. Then I think you are also disposed to recommend that the present special representation, for instance, of landholders, and so on, should continue?—Yes.

23. We have had this point up before. Why do you think that the special representation of landholders should continue?—In the first place, they have certain rights which have accrued to them through the process of time, and it is only fair that they should be given every opportunity to express their viewpoint, and it is not unlikely that if that special representation is not given to them they may not have a proper share in a wide, democratic electorate; and in framing the scheme of reforms every interest has to be protected as far as possible. The whole success of the future depends upon removing apprehensions as far as possible, without in any way diminishing the vital principles of the scheme itself.

24. I would like to ask your view on the subject of retention of university representation ?—I am not in favour of it as it obtains at present. I am for university representation, certainly, and that is representation by the senate of the Universities, for two reasons. Even in England, before the Parliament Act of 1918, it was the senate that was given representation in Parliament, and it was only in 1918 that the graduates of the University were given representation; and more particularly in this country, the graduates have no direct connection with the University, and there is not that feeling of corporate interest among the graduates who leave the University. If the representation of Universities in the Council is to mean anything, the proper thing is to give to each of these Universities a direct share in that representation through that corporate body which manages the administration of the University, that is, the senate of each University. I am entirely in favour of giving one seat to each of the senates of the Universities that have been formed in this Presidency, or in any Presidency.

25. One seat to each ?—To each of the Universities in the province.

26. You mean that you want three University members ?—Yes.

27. How long has the third of these Universities existed ?—It has just come into existence, but I do not know when the next scheme of reforms will come into existence.

28. We none of us know that ?—Probably it will be two or three years old by that time.

29. Perhaps there will be two or three more Universities ?—Well, it can be stated that any University of five years' standing should get representation automatically.

30. However, you are not, apparently, disposed to support the present method of University representation ?—No, I am not.

31. Do you consider that the present method of University representation secures as University members—I am not speaking of any individual, of course—persons of particular gravity and sobriety of thought and expression ?—Well, it is very difficult to say that, especially of one's own colleagues in the Council, but I think from the University point of view it would be far more satisfactory that the senate should have representation. As it happens, the Corporation of Madras has a seat given to it from the University, and the member of the Corporation of Madras is elected by the senate.

32. You regard that as the proper method of election ?—I think so.

33. Now, let us turn to the Depressed Classes. Here you make a very interesting suggestion. You suggest that special Depressed Class organisations should be formed, and they would prepare a list—I think you call it a schedule—of suitable persons to be nominated, or from whom the nominations should be made ?—Yes.

34. That is an interesting suggestion. Then you say that in some areas it might be possible to form an electorate of the Depressed Classes ?—Yes.

35. You think they are sufficiently numerous and living sufficiently together ?—In a compact area, yes.

36. Will that be so in Madras city ?—Yes.

37. There is an interesting feature on page 304 of the Ganjam document. Your proposal there is that officials should continue to be nominated as members of the Provincial Legislature ?—That has been corrected since.

38. I know nothing of any corrections. Do you mean that some corrections have been sent to the Secretariat ?—I am not sure.*

* See also Q. 118–122 on page 316 below.

43. On page 305, I see you say: "There "should be no transferred and reserved subjects." You mean, I suppose, that there should be no division between the two. Then in the next sentence you say: "The power of veto may remain "in certain cases relating to Law and Order." I may be wrong, but I do not think there is anything in your document which explains that. What do mean by that ?—We are referring to the emergency powers, which His Excellency the Governor may exercise in certain special cases by way of certification.

44. What are they ?—If a grant which the Governor considers absolutely necessary for the proper administration of the subject is denied by the Council.

45. You propose to retain that power ?—To retain the power of certification so far as Law and Order is concerned.

46. "Law and Order" is a phrase which is very frequently used, but it is not very clear to me. What does it mean ? Police ?—Really, it means the Police.

47. Does it mean anything else ? Does it mean subordinate magistracy or jails ?—It means jails, the magistracy, and even civil justice.

48. Then it means much more than the Police. We have now the Police, jails, the subordinate magistracy and civil justice ?—But the power of certification or veto has special reference only to the Police.

49. Now I understand what you mean by certification; it apparently has to do with the grant of money. But what is veto ?—The power of veto can be only with reference to legislation.

50. That is what occurs to one. For purposes of a grant or for purposes of legislation there should be a power of certification or veto, but of course, as you will appreciate, the real anxiety about such a subject as the Police largely turns on questions of administration, and the possibility of what some people call a breakdown. A breakdown is not legislation ?—A breakdown may be caused by withholding grants for necessary expenditure.

51. It might be, but it is not necessarily so caused. Is there anything more you want to tell us about this statement that the power of veto should remain in certain cases relating to Law and Order ?—No.

52. The Liberal Federation document deals with the subject on page 308, but naturally uses slightly different language. In the second paragraph, on page 308, they say: "The Federation feels, therefore, "that, as far as it is humanly possible to foresee "the trend of events, there is no reason to fear that, "either with reference to the administration of "Law and Order or with reference to any other "subject, chaos or want of sound policy will "characterise the working of Government if these "subjects are transferred to the control of the "Legislature." I want to know about the next sentence: "At the same time, the Federation "realises that the constitution must make provision "for all eventualities, however unlikely, and for "emergencies, however rare. The question of "providing for safeguards when Provincial Autonomy "is guaranteed is, therefore, a question which the "Federation must squarely face." And then: "After giving the subject its most anxious con-"sideration, the Federation has come to the con-"clusion that the only safeguard it can think of is "the vesting of extraordinary powers in the Governor "of the Province to intervene on occasions of "emergency," and you say you hope the occasions will be rare. Will you tell me, then, as far as the Federation is concerned, what is the nature of, and how you propose to define, the emergencies in which the Governor may intervene ?—If there is communal trouble or rioting in any district, and it so happens the minister is unable to carry the Council with him in regard to the necessity of having special Police to quell the riots.

53. What is to happen then?—The Governor will have to intervene.

54. You will agree, "to intervene" is rather a general phrase. Imagine you are the Governor. What is it you would do?—He will order, through his ministers, the necessary Police to be dispatched to the place to prevent the riot.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: But the despatch of Police is done without consulting the local Council; it is an administrative act.

55. The Chairman: That is what I mean. I am not in the least seeking to criticise; I am only trying to follow what it is that you propose. It seems to me, as it seems to my learned friend, Sir Hari Singh Gour, that if that is what you have in mind it is not a question of over-ruling the local Council, but of removing the discretion from the minister?—May I give an instance of what is meant? We had riots in Malabar, and it was felt necessary, after the riots were put down, that special Police should be mobilised for the district. The grant for these special Police came before the local Council, and if the grant had been cut down or reduced or thrown out by the local Council it would not be open to the minister to do anything, as it would be a transferred subject. If it is transferred it will be the Governor who will have to intervene and restore the grant, so that special Police may be stationed in such a district.

56. Are not you proposing to keep the Governor in reserve in case anything goes wrong, and are not you going to put him in a position which it is rather difficult to ask anyone to fill?—It is difficult.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: The ultimate control of policy would then rest with the Governor in any case.

57. The Chairman: I agree. If other people are going to drive a motor-car downhill, it is a little difficult to say that however unlikely it is we must provide for the eventuality of the car running away, and that in that case the Governor has to begin to drive?—If I might respectfully say so, it seems very much like arguing round a circle. If I do not give such power to the Governor you may well turn round and ask what are you to do to prevent the car running downhill?

58. I quite recognise you are dealing with what you think is an unlikely event, but I am interested in the constitutional scheme. However, I quite see the difficulty. The Federation realises that it must provide for this eventuality and must provide for emergencies, and it thinks the best thing to do would be to transfer all the powers to ministers and to the Council and then provide that if things go seriously wrong the Governor of the province shall intervene?—It is an anomalous position, but it is meant to meet an anomalous situation.

59. What is the anomaly?—That having given Provincial Autonomy and responsible government the Governor should intervene on these occasions against the advice of the ministers or in contravention of their advice, or in any case against the advice of the local Council.

60. I gather that your Federation is taking a very responsible view; you think, however anomalous, such provision must be made?—Yes.

61. I notice that on page 305 of the Ganjam document you propose a Second Chamber?—That proposal is not consistent with the proposals of the Federation.

62. I am not seeking to play one off against the other, but that is so, is not it? It is proposed that there should be a Second Chamber. Just below that I see you say: When the Provincial Councils "are enlarged and when full responsible government "is conceded to the provinces at once, a Second "Chamber is necessary." Why do you think a Second Chamber is necessary when full responsible government is conceded to the provinces?—For the usual reason that a Lower House based on an absolutely democratic franchise is considered in all countries to run a little wild on occasions, or there is the possibility that it may run wild, and a check is necessary by a more sober body.

63. On page 305 you deal with the Central Government, and just above the passage which is headed "Central Government" you say: "In the "division of functions there are subjects allotted "to the Provincial Government over which the "superintendence of the Central Government is "inevitable." I do not know if you have thought out what those subjects are? I am rather disposed to agree with you, but I wondered what subjects you thought fell within that category?—My friend, the Secretary of the Ganjam Association may explain it.

64. Perhaps it may occur to somebody later on; at present I do not quite follow it. A little lower down on page 305 you suggest, apparently, that the Governor-General himself, as an individual, is to be responsible for the defence of India. Is that right?—Ultimately the responsibility will be his.

65. I was referring to the passage on page 305. You say: "We must take a plunge "forward and have faith in the future and in the "political capacity and self-reliance of Indians and "introduce responsibility in the Central Govern-"ment," and a little lower down, "In the Govern-"ment of India, the Governor-General shall be "responsible for the following subjects: (1) Defence "of India, (2) International relations, (3) Relations "with Indian States," etc.?—I conclude it means the Governor-General with the help of councillors who are not responsible to the Assembly.

66. Is that proposing dyarchy at the centre?—In this Memorandum.

67. Do you think dyarchy has succeeded in the provinces?—No. Personally my opinion is that it has not.

68. But you are proposing it for the centre?—In this Memorandum.

69. On page 306 you refer to the Services, and you say: "The existing Services must be guaranteed "all their privileges and rights, and the recom-"mendations of the Lee Commission were generally "accepted by us." Will you explain that to me? You are proposing, as I follow it, that there should cease to be any reserved subjects in the provinces, and therefore, of course, all departments would be under Ministers?—Yes.

70. Will not the future recruitment be recruitment by the province?—The future recruitment will be recruitment by the province, but the existing incumbents must be guaranteed all their rights.

71. I quite understand that people with a vested right will be given either the opportunity to retire or protection, but that is not what I am talking about; that is not what the Lee Commission proposed. The Lee Commission proposed that there should continue to be recruitment for the All-India Services?—The reference to the Lee Commission proposals has regard to the privileges and rights of existing incumbents in the Services.

72. Is that all?—Yes.

73. When you say "the recommendations of the "Lee Commission were generally accepted by us" you are not referring to the proportions of recruitment in the future at all?—No, but to the emoluments that were recommended by the Lee Commission.

74. Sir Hari Singh Gour: And not even that, if your statement is correct that all you mean is they were accepted as regards the existing servants?—Services.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: No, servants; not Services.

75. The Chairman: I think that is what he means. He means that whatever changes this document proposes, it does not propose to disregard the rights of individuals already in the Services?—Yes.

The Chairman: That is hardly what one would describe as the recommendations of the Lee Commission.

76. Major Attlee : I should like to clear up one or two points about representation. On page 305 of the Ganjam Memorandum you say the number of representatives may be based on the population of the area ; that is your general principle for provincial councils ?—Yes.

77. On page 305 you say : " The Assembly may be " reconstituted in a manner that one member may " represent one district area in British India." Do you mean one representative for each district without considering the population of the district ?—So far as the Assembly is concerned.

78. You take your district, then, definitely as the unit ?—As the unit.

79. You do not think there would be any objection owing to the fact that, let us say, Mymensingh has 4,500,000 population, while another has only 123,000 ? —It is possible that some of the district may get more than one member. I mean at least one member for each district.

80. Do you realise what sort of a sized House that would give you ?—Yes.

81. How many do you think you would have ?—About 250 members.

82. Oh, no ; if you are going to give at least one to each district, you will have to take your smallest district, will you not ? There are districts with only about 120,000 ; that means for every 120,000 of the people you must have one member ; that means a House of rather over 2,000. I was wondering whether you were getting over that difficulty—whether you thought districts should stand by themselves ?—Both these principles cannot be worked out ; both the district and the population basis. If you take the population basis, then each district may sometimes have six or eight members, if you take the smallest district as the unit of representation. That is not the idea of this Memorandum. The idea is to make the maximum district the area of representation. Now we have two or three districts as the area for a single constituency.

83. I wanted to follow on from that. You do not intend to go on the population, but you are taking the district as the particular area ?—At the same time, districts cannot be treated alike, whatever their size or population may be.

84. What principle will you adopt for giving more ?—Take an average district, not the least or the most populous.

85. I do not think there is really an average, because they vary from province to province. If you are going to take a district area there is nothing to stop Madras cutting up its districts in order to get a larger representation ?—That is possible.

86. You have not thought, by any chance, of forming the Central Government by representatives from the provinces as provinces ?—From the provincial legislative councils ?

87. Yes.—A certain proportion of the central legislature may be constituted like that.

88. Do you think you could combine the two ? —It would be advisable to constitute a certain proportion of the legislature by indirect representation from the provincial legislative councils, leaving the other proportion for direct election from the general constituencies.

89. But the more you do by indirect election it is obvious that your constituencies for direct election will be even larger than they are at the present time ?—I expect that the Legislative Assembly will be very much increased in numbers.

90. But there is a limit. We are fairly near the limit at Home, with 600.—I do not suggest an exact half-and-half division, but a certain proportion from the Provincial Councils, and the rest from direct election.

91. Colonel Lane-Fox : There is a rather interesting suggestion on page 309 of the South Indian Liberal Federation's Memorandum, dealing with the representation of communities. You suggest that the position should be left in status quo " till there is " a determination on the part of both the com- " munities to adjust their mutual rights and " obligations to the satisfaction of each other." How do you suggest that that should come about ?—It will be brought about by a pact similar to the Lucknow pact, arrived at by the leaders of both communities.

92. Then you would leave that to the Governor ; he must be satisfied that both communities were actually taking their part, and if he was satisfied you would give him the power to bring in legislation ? —The Governor-General must be satisfied that a real pact has been arrived at between the two communities, provided it is fairly unanimous. Absolute unanimity is not to be expected.

93. Are you speaking for the Madras Presidency only, or for the whole of India ?—For the whole of India.

94. The Governor-General in Council, I suppose, would have to deal with it ?—Yes.

95. In the same way as the Lucknow pact was recognised ?—Yes.

96. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : On page 309, under the heading " Hindu-Moslem Question," you say : " It should also be remembered that the system is " the result of a definite compact or compromise " between the two high contracting parties, the " Moslems on the one hand and the Hindus on the " other, arrived at at Lucknow and ratified by the Imperial Parliament itself." Then comes the next sentence, which I do not understand : " It has been " put forward and very rightly by Moslem delega- " tions that this pact should not be re-opened " without the complete concurrence of both the " contracting parties." I think you are not very accurate when you say that all the Moslems in all the provinces want to elect the proportion of representations allowed to them by the Lucknow Pact because you might remember that the delegations in the Punjab and Bengal want representation on a population basis ?—My next sentence would make the position clear : " and that separate electorates " should not go unless the Moslems are willing parties to general electorates."

97. We are not talking about separate electorates. The defect in the Lucknow Pact is that it keeps the Moslems in a minority in all provinces ?—Yes.

98. And this is what the Bengal Moslems want ; they want proportional representation on a population basis ?—But what I was referring to was this. So far as separate electorates go, apart from the question of the numbers of the two communities, the Moslems, even in the Punjab and Bengal, have put forward the claim that separate electorates should not be abolished. There are two points under the Lucknow Pact. The first is the question of separate election, and the second is the question of the number of representatives of the two communities. So far as the first point is concerned, even those Moslems who want variation of numbers say that this was arrived at by a pact, and it cannot be shifted without the consent of the community affected. Now, so far as the numbers are concerned their argument is that they should be varied, and I say, as it would be unfair to abolish the Lucknow Pact without the consent of the Moslems, so it would be unfair to alter the numbers without the consent of the Hindus. The two things stand together.

99. Sir Hari Singh Gour : You have spoken about the Governor's power of veto. I am not quite clear about the position you wish to assign to the Governor. Do you wish to give the ultimate control in the determination of policy and of day-to-day administration to the Governor because an emergency may arise not only as regards policy, but also as regards day-to-day administration ? Then you place a very heavy burden upon the Governor, do you not ?

—I do not contemplate the Governor dealing with any question of policy at all, or altering the policy of the Ministers. That must stand on the decision of the council. What I propose is an extraordinary case, where the safety of the province is endangered. It was then that I thought the Governor ought to intervene.

100. You say that the Governor should have the power in case of emergency. Who should be the judge of emergencies ?—The Governor.

101. Therefore the ultimate control rests with the Governor ?—Yes, in case of emergency.

102. Of which he is the sole judge ?—Yes.

103. Therefore you keep the autocratic power of the Governor absolutely intact, and reduce your local council to the position of a mere advisory body ? —That depends on what you mean by a responsible Governor, with responsible ideas.

104. I may have a very sharp sword, but I may not use it ; still, I have got it if I want to use it. Therefore the ultimate power is with the Governor. He may be a very good man, and he may not use it ; but so far as his power is concerned you perpetuate autocracy, and so far as the local council is concerned, you give it only a semblance of autonomy ?—I do not look upon my suggestion in that light at all. I take an ordinary Governor, and he is not an autocrat.

105. I want you to explain why you do not agree with me, because that seems to me inevitable ?— If I might put a similar example, it is always open for His Majesty the King-Emperor to veto every piece of legislation that passes the House of Commons and the House of Lords ; and you will turn round and say that all legislation by the Parliament is impossible.

106. Again, you forget altogether the main point. His Majesty the King has not got that reserved power of taking over the government of England in case of emergency.—I was referring to the power of vetoing legislation.

107. We are not talking about the same thing. I am talking of the power of taking over, not of the question of legislation. You said the Governor shall have complete power in case of emergency. I want to see, vis-à-vis the minister, who is supreme, the Governor or the Minister. You place the Governor on the one side with the ministers and the legislative council on the other side in a position of extreme delicacy, which might create a deadlock, and a very serious deadlock ?—The Governor would be responsible for the deadlock if it was due to his fault.

108. Who is to be the judge of it—the Governor ? —At the time, and subsequently, events.

109. As regards the second chamber, you say that when there is a full provincial autonomy there should be a second chamber, because it will provide a sobering element ?—That is not in the South Indian Memorandum.

110. Are you giving it up ?—I do not refer to second chamber in the Memorandum.

111. Sir Hari Singh Gour : In one Memorandum there is a second chamber referred to. Are you now abandoning the position as regards the formation of a second chamber ?

Sir A. P. Patro : No, what they mean is this. When the provincial councils are enlarged, and on a wider basis, and when full responsible government is conceded to the province, a second chamber is necessary. That is only when you have got a wider franchise and councils strengthened. Then a revising chamber would be necessary.

112. Sir Hari Singh Gour : No. Here again, if you will pardon me, the provincial councils are going to be enlarged already under your scheme. You want a larger number of members in the provincial councils, and when full responsible government is conceded, you want a second chamber ? —Yes.

113. Therefore these two contingencies that you contemplate are in the immediate future ?—Yes.

114. Therefore the second chamber immediately follows. You are at liberty, of course, to say that on reconsideration you do not want a second chamber? —May I explain the position ? The Liberal Federation, which I at present represent, does not want a second chamber, and has not asked for it. It is because we have not asked for a second chamber in this Memorandum that I have suggested emergency powers in the Governor.

115. So I take it that there is a conflict of view between the two deputations ?—I would not call it a conflict. There are two ways of having safeguards. One is content to leave emergency powers to His Excellency the Governor, and the other wants a second chamber ; but both realise that there must be a safeguard.

116. But you cannot reconcile the two views, for this reason. A second chamber is not only a chamber in which are reposed the emergency powers ; it is a second chamber which has co-ordinate rights and powers and privileges with the originating or first chamber ?—Except on financial matters.

117. Even with that. We have got the Council of State that deals with the Finance Bills equally with the Legislative Assembly ; so that to that extent the second chamber is even a revising chamber, though somewhat indirectly, in matters of finance. Consequently, when one deputation asks for emergency powers reposing in the Governor, and the other for emergency powers to be transferred to the second chamber, those are not merely differences of detail, they are differences of vital principle. Then do I take it that the two deputations differ on that point ?—Yes.

118. As regards local councils, in answer to the Chairman, page 304, you said that statement requires to be corrected or modified : "Nomination of officials "and non-officials may be continued but their votes "may not be taken into consideration, especially "those of officials." Will you kindly state to the Conference in what respect that should be modified ? —The whole of that has to be revised. Naturally their votes will not be taken into consideration.

119. Then you want to cancel the whole of that paragraph ?—Yes ; there will be no nomination at all.

120. You are against the nomination of officials ? —Or of non-officials.

121. You are against the nomination of both officials and non-officials ?—Exactly.

122. I suppose you would naturally allow the nomination of experts, supposing some great irrigation scheme or university legislation is undertaken ? —On special measures there should be power to nominate ; not ordinarily.

123. Then as regards the central government, you are for the creation of dyarchy, which you have condemned in the local governments in the provinces. Is not that so ?—There again I would refer you to the South Indian Liberal Federation Memorandum. At page 308 it is dealt with.

124. I have it before me. You begin from page 308 ?—Yes.

125. And then you go into the question of the central government. There you do not say as to whether your central government would have certain powers. You want to introduce responsibility into the central government by transferring all subjects ?—Except the few that I have mentioned.

126. It is only with reference to those few that I wish to have your attention. I want to see whether you are in agreement with the Ganjam Memorandum or against it. What you mean is that so far as those specific subjects are concerned no discussion of any kind should be permitted in the central legislature. On page 308 of the Liberal Federation document you say : "No resolution will be permitted with reference "to these subjects. No budget grants will be moved "for finding money for the administration of these "subjects." In other words, you will not even permit a discussion ?—No.

127. You are therefore taking away powers which the Legislative Assembly virtually possesses at present ?—I recognise that.

128. And which the old Imperial Legislative Council used to exercise ?—I recognise that; I say so.

129. You want to take away those powers ?—Yes.

130. You go on to say that while you would take away the power of the popular House, you want to transfer that power to the Council of State and the Chamber of Princes ?—Yes.

131. Therefore the position is this: the general taxpayer pays the money, and the policy may be modified by discussion in the Chamber of Princes, who do not pay anything at all for it, or by the Council of State, which is not financially responsible under your scheme. Two irresponsible bodies discuss a scheme, while the third and responsible body has to find the money ?—You do not expect me to agree with that !

132. I am describing what you say on page 309 ? —I do not regard the Council of State, even as at present constituted, as an irresponsible body; much less the future Council of State.

133. It is irresponsible in this sense, that it has no power to levy taxes and therefore it does not find the money. I am not dealing with its responsibility in any other sense. In regard to these subjects, the Assembly finds the money ? —Not even the Assembly, according to my scheme. They find the money, of course, in the sense that the taxes are levied by them.

134. The Assembly finds the money, and the Council of State and the Chamber of Princes dictate the policy. The Assembly pays the piper and the Council of State calls the tune ?—Yes, and for the transitional period that is necessary. Now neither of them call the tune. This is an improvement on the present situation.

135. Do you think the country at large would accept a scheme of this kind ?—I want to improve the present conditions, and I think my scheme is an improvement on present conditions.

136. You call that an improvement ? All right. Then on page 309 you fix a time-table. You say: "The Federation suggests that a Commission should "be immediately appointed to fix the amount that "is required for these services and that this amount "may be treated as the maximum amount which "can be utilised without the sanction of any authority "for the administrative departments, subject, of "course, to the control of public audit and other "departmental controls for a definite period of time, "say ten or fifteen years. Over and above this, His "Excellency the Viceroy will be given the powers to "allot, in cases of emergency, such amount as may "be required in excess of the maximum fixed by "the commission." So that if the Viceroy wishes to paralyse the Assembly, he may grant such a large amount that there may be a very heavy deficit ? —I do not foresee the existence of perverse Viceroys.

137. It is not a question of that. I will give you an example. The Assembly may think a certain course of action unnecessary and not dictated by sound financial reasons; the Viceroy may think otherwise. You want popular control to control the Viceroy and the Governors; otherwise, if that is not necessary, you do not need an Assembly or any councils ?—I think self-government is better than good government.

138. Is this a case of self-government or good government ?—It is a case of self-government.

139. No, this is a case of good government superseding self-government ?—The only point of view I had was whether it was practicable now in India to ask for control of the Army and Navy, and if anybody suggests it is practical all I can say is that there is a difference of opinion on the subject. I want to approach the subject from a practical point of view. This is a transitional stage, as I have pointed out.

140. When this scheme goes before the public, the public will criticise it ?—Naturally.

141. Is it not better that you and I should see the criticisms to which it will be subjected here, rather than that the wider public should decide ?—That is true, but it seems to me there is only one scheme which will not be criticised by the public, and that is one which gives complete self-government, full swaraj, to-morrow; and I am not in favour of that.

142. No more am I. The next point is this. You said in answer to the Chairman that at the present moment communalism is a race for power ?—Yes.

143. Do you think the perpetuation of communal electorates will strengthen the national bond, the feeling of common citizenship ?—I would say that their continuation, not perpetuation, will strengthen the national body.

* * * * * * * *

147. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: You say on page 309 of the Liberal Federation Memorandum that the Lucknow Pact was "ratified by the Imperial Parlia- "ment itself" ?—Yes.

148. When was that ?—When the Government of India Act was passed, and later by the proposals of the Franchise Committee, whose recommendations were accepted by the Secretary of State and by the Imperial Parliament. The rules were placed on the table of the House of Commons, and there was no dissent expressed, and according to the provisions of the Government of India Act that means acceptance by the House of Commons. There are two processes by which rules can be made under the Government of India Act and accepted by Parliament; one is a positive process, by which they must be specifically passed by Parliament, and the other a negative process, by which papers are laid on the table and regarded as agreed to if dissent is not expressed. These regulations became operative as statutory rules after being accepted in the negative manner.

149. But does the Government of India Act, 1919, say that this pact is ratified ?—No. The Government of India Act said rules for the qualification of electors might be made under such and such sections, and the rules were made by the Franchise Committee.

Sir Hari Singh Gour: That was mentioned in the Montagu-Chelmsford report.

150. Sir Zulfiqar Ali Khan: Did both Houses of Parliament solemnly ratify that pact ?—They ratified the report of the Franchise Committee, which incorporated the Lucknow Pact, and therefore they ratified the pact.

151. That is your own opinion ?—It is a question of fact.

152. I wonder whether it is a question of fact. Do you know that the Punjab never accepted that pact ?—I do not know what evidence they tendered before the Franchise Committee, but as far as I know it is only within the last four or five years that the Punjab has questioned it—since 1923.

153. No, the Punjab never accepted it, because in the Punjab we have a majority, and we cannot be reduced to a minority, so the Punjab cannot be expected to accept that pact ?—My impression is that in the years 1917 to 1920 the Punjab did not question it.

154. My recollection is the other way ?—You ought to know better than I do.

155. Dr. Suhrawardy: You say the pact was ratified by the Imperial Parliament ?—Yes.

156. Are you quite sure the Imperial Parliament gave the Punjab Moslems the representation recommended under the Lucknow Pact ?—That is my understanding of the subject.

Dr. Suhrawardy: You can take it from me it is not so.

157. Sir A. P. Patro: Sir Hari Singh Gour argued with you that emergency powers are inconsistent with responsible government and the Governor becomes an autocrat if he is given such powers. Do you remember the alternative suggested in the All-Parties report is that the power should be vested in the Government of India ?—Yes.

158. That in case of emergency the Government of India should intervene ?—Yes.

159. It is suggested that either there should be the interference of the Government of India in case of emergency or, if the veto is taken away and no such power given, there should be a revising chamber ?—Yes.

160. Which of these three alternatives do you prefer ? Do you want the power to be vested in the Government of India, or the power to be with the Governor, or a revising chamber ?—I am distinctly against the power being vested in the Government of India, for the reason that it is out of touch with the provincial Governments and it will really mean the exercise of that power on the advice of the Governor of the province, so you might as well make the Governor of the province directly responsible. That is why we have suggested the Governor should have these powers. As for a revising chamber, it seems to me either that or the giving of powers to the Governor would be suitable for the purpose.

161. Do you not think that if the Governor differed from his ministers, then he could dissolve the council and ask the executive council to carry out the administration ?—I do not contemplate that any Governor who had respect for the constitution would do that ; but it is possible that the second council will be of the same opinion as the first, and the Governor might still think that his responsibility was so great that an emergency had arisen when his special powers had to be utilised.

162. Do not you think in cases where a provincial Government broke down on account of a conflict between the executive and the legislature, it should be an outside power which should intervene in order to take over the administration ?—No, it is not a question of resuming administration really ; it is a question of having a specific act done or not done under particular circumstances.

163. I am putting the case of the breaking down of the administration ?—By a refusal of any recognised party to work the administration ?

164. Yes.—That will really mean that the whole thing will have to be resumed, as it is being done now.

165. In regard to representation on the Assembly when full responsible government prevails in the provinces do not you expect that there should be some relation between the provincial councils and the central Assembly, and therefore representation from the local councils will become necessary in the Assembly ?—I cannot say that it becomes necessary, but I am not against a certain proportion of the Assembly being elected by the provincial legislative councils.

166. Under the proportion to be elected by direct election ?—Yes.

167. In the Lee Commission recommendations you find that in all the transferred departments they recommended provincialisation of the services ?—Yes.

168. So ultimately, when there is full responsible government, according to the recommendations of the Lee Commission all of the services should be provincialised ?—Yes.

169. Both the Memoranda ask for responsibility to be introduced in the central legislature ?—Yes.

170. Do you think that public opinion in southern India would be satisfied if no responsibility was introduced in the central legislature ?—I think no section of the public would be satisfied if the central legislature had no element of responsibility.

171. That is, no section would be satisfied if no element of responsibility was introduced into the central legislature ?—Yes.

172. In answer to Sir Hari Singh Gour you stated that with regard to the financial element—or rather, I think Sir Hari Singh Gour said—one has to find the money and the other has to play the tune. Instead of that, for all these subjects that ought to be administered by the Governor-General in Council, do not you think that if the Commission is appointed to find out the average expenditure on those subjects, if the Commission fixes a certain average of expenditure annually, that may be non-voted ?—Yes, that is my idea ; it will be treated as non-voted.

173. Will you please explain that ?—So far as the subjects for which I have suggested transfer to the control of the ministers in the central government are concerned, they will pay the piper and they will also call an excellent tune, which they are not at present in a position to call for ; so that is a distinct advantage over the present circumstances. With reference to the army and allied subjects, I have suggested that a Commission should allocate the amount that should be necessary for the next ten years by taking into consideration what has been spent in the past, and getting expert advice on the subject. That amount will be deducted from the budget of the central legislature, and to that extent the legislature will have no power.

174. At the same time, you admit that there may be resolutions and discussions of policy concerning those subjects ?—According to the scheme I have suggested, there will be resolutions and discussions in the Council of State on that.

175. So that under your scheme discussion of those matters is not precluded in the Legislative Assembly ?—It is precluded in the Legislative Assembly, because I do not want to introduce dyarchy in the Legislative Assembly. I want to have certain subjects to be entirely under the control of the Indian Legislative Assembly.

176. Raja Nawab Ali Khan : I cannot follow that. You say you keep special subjects, and you do away with dyarchy ?—Yes. Those who are in charge of the army and navy will not be before the legislature at all.

177. If you said that these reserved subjects should not be touched anyhow, then I could understand the position ?—I see what you mean.

178. Sir A. P. Patro : Please turn to page 306 of the Ganjam Memorandum, "We have also "referred to the gradual building up of responsible "government in India."—I have it.

179. You go on to say : "We propose that a "scheme of Government may be framed which will "automatically carry forward to the goal, provided "the progress is not retarded by causes for which "the scheme is no longer responsible." What you mean is you want a scheme to be prepared which would automatically lead to full responsible government ?—Yes ; what we have suggested is that we should have full responsible government at the very next stage.

180. Diwan Bahadur Reddiyar : Your proposal is that the Governor should be vested with certain extraordinary powers so that he may intervene on occasions of emergency ?—Yes.

181. Has the Governor got similar powers of intervention even under the present Government of India Act ?—He has.

182. Under Section 72D of the Government of India Act the Governor has got the power, in case of emergency, to authorise such expenditure as may, in his opinion, be necessary for the safety and tranquility of the province or for the carrying on of the department. And similarly he has the power to adopt, suspend or reject any measure when he thinks it necessary in the best interests of the province ?—Yes.

183. Powers similar to these must be vested in the government ?—Yes, analogous powers.

184. So there is nothing new or novel in the suggestion ?—I do not claim any novelty for it.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : The novelty is the introduction of responsible government.

185. Diwan Bahadur Reddiyar : With regard to the Ganjam District People's Association, on page 303 you say : "The franchise may be extended to half " of the present qualification or tax-paying capacity " in urban areas." I understood you to say that must be corrected ?—Yes ; it should be both for rural and for urban areas.

186. So you would recommend that there should be no distinction with regard to the franchise between urban and rural areas ?—The existing distinction will continue. In each case it will be half the existing limit.

187. Mr. Thomas : You just now said, in answer to my friend's questions, that the powers which are now conferred on the Governor under Section 72 of the Government of India Act should be continued ? —Yes.

188. I take it that you confine those powers only to Law and Order ?—Yes.

189. Under the present Act he has power to carry on any department ?—Yes.

190. In connection with the carrying on of peace and tranquillity ?—If peace and tranquillity impinge on any department, naturally he must have the power to take over ; but that is not the primary object. It might concern any department at any time.

191. So that you would have the powers in those general terms ?—Yes.

192. With reference to the autonomy of the provincial government, you know that, under the present Government of India Act, for legislation on certain matters the previous sanction of the Governor must be obtained ; on certain other matters the power of veto is conferred on the Governor-General ?—Yes.

193. Would you continue those powers ?—I would certainly have the veto continued up to the King-Emperor, but the previous sanction I would remove where autonomy is concerned.

194. Supposing a question arises as to whether a subject which forms the subject-matter of legislation before the legislative council is a matter which falls within the provincial subjects or within the central subjects, what authority would be fixed for determining such disputed points ?—The Governor-General or the Secretary of State. He would be the authority to determine.

195. I take it that with reference to all moneys granted for provincial subjects there would no power of interference according to your view ?—Yes.

196. You would not consider that in certain circumstances it might be an advantage to have the disinterested view of a distant authority ?—In practice it happens to-day. In practice it really depends on the view which is adopted on the recommendation of the man on the spot. It is not going to be as disinterested as in theory it may appear.

197. But is it not possible that in certain cases an occasion might arise where a disinterested view of a distant authority might be more advantageous to the public interests, rather than the biased view of a local authority ?—That is a possibility.

198. Do you not think it would be advantageous to have a power over the Governor on certain matters ?—I think that would be fettering the responsible government far too much.

199. With reference to the question of the minority communities, you are in favour of the continuance of separate electorates ?—As at present, yes.

200. You said so far as the Moslems are concerned the number has been fixed by the Lucknow Pact, and therefore there can be no variation of that pact without the consent of the Hindu community ? —Yes.

201. I take it that the Indian Christians are not parties to that pact ?—No, there is no question of the Indian Christians in it.

202. You know that the number reserved for Indian Christians in provincial councils is five ? —Yes.

203. You know there are two great Christian communities, the Catholics and the Protestants ? —Yes.

204. And in the first council and the second council a Catholic and a Protestant respectively were nominated, to make up equality as between Catholics and Protestants ?—Yes.

205. And usually the depressed class representative who has been nominated has been a Christian ? —Yes, but that was done as a depressed class member, not as a Christian.

206. But it happened ?—That is an accident.

207. It has happened in the last three years. Very well. You know that in the present conditions there are a certain number of official representatives who may perhaps hold the scales even in conflicts between communities ?—I do not know that, because officials always vote to order.

208. Under the Government's instructions, you mean ?—Yes.

209. But you may also take it that the minority communities may look upon the Government as trying to hold the scales even ?—Quite so ; and I hope they will continue to look upon the Government in a similar way, though they may be ministers.

210. May I suggest this to you. Supposing there is a representation of five or six Christians, and supposing the number of seats were doubled, may I take it that when the large minority is a large proportion, the small minority has to be increased in more than the regular proportion in order to keep their former position intact ?—It is a very difficult problem in permutations and combinations.

211. You will bear with me if I read to you a certain suggestion which has been put before the Conference by the All-India Conference of Indian Christians, in their Memorandum* : " The real " point in joint electorates is that the represen- " tative should be elected with the voice and support " of others than that of his own co-religionists. " This can be accomplished through specially devised " constituencies. We will suggest that in these " constituencies the voters should be all Indian " Christians who are qualified electors for the pro- " vincial legislatures, and such members of other " communities who are voters to the Council of State. " The Indian Christians will continue to have the " right to vote in other constituencies, but will not " be eligible to stand as candidates." What is your opinion on that subject ?—That is having the cake and eating it too. You cannot have it both ways. Either you trust your Hindu community or you do not.

212. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-Lah Sahib : Much is talked of communal tensions and communal evils as being due to separate electorates. I want to know whether these evils were in existence even before the Reforms ?—Yes, they have always been in existence.

213. They have not increased since the Reforms, I think ?—I cannot say that.

214. I am referring to the whole of India ?—In certain provinces they have become more aggravated since the Reforms.

215. So far as our Presidency is concerned, is there much of this communal tension here ?—It is much less since the Reforms than before.

216. Therefore certainly the Reforms have nothing to do with these tensions ?—In this province, no.

217. Mr. Siva Rao : One question on page 310 of the Liberal Federation's Memorandum. You say there that what applies to provincial legislatures applies also in a large measure to the central legislature ?—Yes.

218. It follows that the present representation of the depressed classes in the Assembly is very, very poor ?—Yes.

219. Very negative ?—I contemplate the same sort of representation for the depressed classes in the Assembly as I do in the legislative councils ; the same sort of electorate.

220. I am talking about the number of seats ?

* Vol. XVI, page 326.

—That has to be taken on an All-India basis. I cannot give the number.

221. With regard to the public services, you make a recommendation that there ought not to be a predominance of any particular community ? —Yes.

222. Am I to understand that you want a statutory recognition of that principle in the constitution ? —No ; the rules framed thereunder may provide for it.

223. Then it is entirely a matter for the local Government ?—Yes.

On the Council of the Association are represented all interests affecting the Indian Christian Community of Southern India.

This Association has been carrying on its work without a break from the time of its establishment. The part that it has played in all the activities of the Indian Christian Community during the past forty years, and the close contact that it has maintained with all the sections of the Community in this Province confer upon the Association a right to speak with considerable authority not only on its own behalf but also on behalf of the Indian Christian Community in general. The Association has, in the past, made itself heard on matters political affecting the community.

The needs of our Community and the special disabilities it suffers from cannot be rightly appreciated unless its peculiar position among the non-Christian communities of the Province is rightly understood. Unlike our sister communities, we have come into existence through a change in religious belief. We are the product of Christian Missionary effort. Our members have been drawn from the various strata of society. Two adverse results have accrued from the peculiarity of our origin.

The earlier generations of our Community, by embracing a new religious faith, have had to forfeit what claims they had to a share in the property and possessions of the non-Christian families to which they belonged. They had to start life as Christians often in destitute circumstances. In most cases our Community has had its beginnings in material bankruptcy. Our economic condition has not improved much in spite of the rapid advance we have made in education. Many of our educated young men and young women could obtain situations only as teachers, largely in private and rarely in state-managed schools. The other branches of service were, for long, beyond their reach, because they had not the influence of wealth or position to open to them the doors to the higher grades of public service. It is a notorious fact that teachers in this Country are paid absurdly low salaries. About eighty per cent. of the ordinarily educated men and women of our Community are either teachers in schools or preachers of religion, and the community has no prospect of material salvation until the economic condition of teachers is bettered. Poverty has affected the Christians in the villages also. Except in the case of some districts, they are dependent upon non-Christians either as farm-hands under non-Christian landowners or as tenants under non-Christian proprietors. Social disadvantage which they experience as followers of what is looked upon as an alien religion, has stood in the way of the material advance of our Community both in the village and in the town.

The second result has been this. While we share in the common disabilities of other minority communities of this Province in the matter of securing positions in the Indian and Provincial branches of the various services, and in the Judiciary of the Province, we, Indian Christians, labour under an additional disability regarding rules governing the age of candidates entering Government service. The baptismal certificate prevents the possibility of any alteration in date of birth. While, in the case of some others, there is considerable difference between the "official" age and the "natural" age, in the case of the Indian Christian the "official" age is the "natural" age also. This fact has not been recognised in the past by those who are responsible for appointing candidates to various departments. On this account, Indian Christian applicants have had to face unfair competition. We are compelled to ask for reasonable exemption from the application of age rules in the case of Indian Christian applicants who may be otherwise qualified.

Educationally the Indian Christian Community is ahead practically of every other community in this Province, and yet it is not represented in the higher ranks of public service proportionate to its educational qualifications. This injustice the Community has been feeling for years, and the remedy has to be found, not by the Community, but by the Government. If a few among us have reached positions of importance in Government service, they are highly qualified men of exceptional merits who have had to make their way in spite of many an obstacle. We have the right to be represented also on popular self-governing bodies such as Municipal Councils, Taluq and District Boards, etc. We shall not ask for preferential treatment for charity's sake. We ask for what in justice ought not to be denied to us.

We are a minority Community whose voice has rarely been heard, but, when we do make ourselves heard, we expect that it shall not be in vain.

We feel with the rest of the country that the time is ripe for the granting of Dominion Status to India and for the establishment of complete Provincial Autonomy. No political reform short of this will satisfy the legitimate aspirations of our country.

I. The Representative System as applied to British India.

(a) The basis of franchise. In this Province, franchise based on property qualification alone has not proved a success. It is an altogether untenable position that owners of property are alone competent to exercise the right of voting or that they are necessarily competent because of property qualification. In this country there are as many illiterates among them as literates. While many graduates of the universities do not possess a vote, many an illiterate man does, all because the latter owns some property, whereas the former does not. The basis of franchise must therefore be altered to make it possible for persons other than owners of property also to secure the right of the vote. So far as the Provincial Council is concerned, we suggest that the franchise may be extended to include all those who hold degrees or diplomas of recognised universities or Completed Secondary School-leaving Certificates issued by the Government of Madras or the South Indian States.

INDIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, MADRAS. [Continued.

The franchise in the case of the Second Chamber or Senate of the Province and the House of Representatives of the Central Government—the Legislative Assembly, as it is called now—shall be based on the following qualifications:

Those who pay

(1) a Land revenue of Rs. 50 per annum;
(2) House rent of Rs. 300 per annum or own a house of that value;
(3) Income Tax;
(4) Profession Tax of Rs. 10 per annum, and all graduates of recognised Universities.

In the case of the Upper House of the Central Government (the Council of State, as it is known at present), the qualifications for the franchise shall be higher and shall include

(1) All members of Municipal Councils, Taluq Boards and District Boards.
(2) Those who pay a land revenue of Rs. 500 per annum.
(3) Those who pay Income-tax on Rs. 3,000 per annum.
(4) All Graduates of recognised Universities.

(b) Methods of Election. Communal representation on the basis of separate electorates has not been successful in the case of the Indian Christians. This has led to friction between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. It has not, so far, been possible for these two sections of the Community to come to any definite understanding. There are now five seats on the Provincial Legislature allotted to Indian Christians, two of which will never be accessible to Protestants and one to the Catholics. The Protestants, under ordinary circumstances, can never be sure of capturing more than one of these five seats. In the four constituencies where the Roman Catholics preponderate, no Protestant Candidate has the chance of being returned, for the reason that Roman Catholic priests exercise great influence over the voters.

Communal Electorates have led to political separation between us and the non-Christian Communities. In a country where social and religious differences are rampant, political separation will do more harm than good to national solidarity. As a highly enlightened community, we would desire to be represented in excessive proportion numerically. If that is not practicable for any reason, we claim representation to our numbers and to our educational qualifications—a point conceded by the Lucknow Pact of the Indian National Congress of 1916 and also accepted by the framers of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report.

We are of opinion that adequate representation can be secured for us by the reservation of seats in the general electorate. This will avoid conflicts between Roman Catholics and Protestants.

(c) Number of Seats. Indian Christians are now entitled to five seats on the Legislative Council. This number is out of all proportion to our deserts. On the basis of numbers alone we are entitled to more seats, and, when our educational qualification is also taken into account, the inadequacy of our representation becomes obvious. Our numerical position in the Province is as stated below:

Madras Province—Proportion of population.

Hindus	89·0%
Moslems	6·5%
Christians	3·2%
Tribal Religions	1·4%

Proportion of seats on the Madras Legislative Council.

Hindus	65·5%
Moslems	13·5%
Christians	5·5%
Special Interests	15·5%

It is clear from the foregoing that we are entitled to nine seats at present apart from the fact that educationally we are the leading community.

THE INDIAN STATISTICS.

(1) Proportion of communities per 10,000 of the population.

Hindus	6589	..	70·7%
Moslems	2407	..	24%
Buddhists	465	..	4·1%
Christians	123	..	1·2%
Sikhs	96	..	about ·8%

(2) Proportion in respect to Education.

	Literates.	Literates in English.
Hindus	14%	1·5%
Moslems	10%	1·1%
Christians	23%	8%

From the above statistics it is clear that the Indian Christians of this Province are entitled to fifteen per cent. of the total number of seats in the First House of this Province.

The Second Chamber or Senate of the Province ought to consist partly of elected and partly of nominated members. Here also we claim fifteen per cent. of the total number of seats.

Legislature of the Central Government. The Assembly as it is constituted at present ought to have provided for the adequate representation of the Indian Christian Community. According to statistics we are entitled to at least four seats, two being chosen from this Province. The single nominated seat allotted to us is unfair to the Community. In the new House of Representatives or Central Legislature we claim at least four per cent. of the total number of seats.

Council of State. The present constitution of the Council of State is unsatisfactory, for the reason that the nominated seats are in excess of the elected ones. In this Upper Chamber of the Central Government also we claim four per cent. of the total number of seats.

Self-governing Institutions. We claim adequate representation on self-governing bodies, such as Municipal Councils, Taluq Boards and District Boards. In some of the districts such as Tinnevelly, Madura, Trichinopoly, Tanjore, Madras, North Arcot, Salem, Coimbatore, Malabar, South Canara, and Guntur, where the Christian population is considerable, we claim twenty per cent. of the number of seats.

Minor Interests. We feel strongly that commercial interests and the Depressed Classes ought to be adequately represented in every representative body.

(d) The relationship between Representatives and Constituents. The question whether the elected representatives are guided by a sense of responsibility to the constituencies that return them is not easy to answer. Evidences are not wanting which point to a growing sense of responsibility on the part of elected representatives of the people. This consciousness is bound to grow in proportion to the measure of political privileges that are granted to the country and the extension of the franchise to educated persons as such.

(e) Growth of Parties. The growth of parties is the direct outcome of the formation of strong public opinion. Party system is an essential factor in the working of cabinet Government. The existence of parties is an effective check on the ministry, and party system worked on right lines contributes to efficiency in government. It is also helpful in choosing suitable candidates at elections. We, however, favour the formation of parties on the basis of differences in shades of political opinion only, and not on other considerations such as communal or sectarian.

(f) Growth of Informed Public Opinion. Political advance depends largely on the growth of informed public opinion. But of no country in the world can it be said that public opinion is so widespread as to cover the whole population. Much less can this be said of India with its manifold languages, castes and creeds. Increasing political consciousness resulting from enlarged political responsibilities will help the growth of informed public opinion. Experience gained from success or failure has educative value in the formation of public opinion.

Nomination of Officials and Non-Officials. Popular opinion regarding nomination of members to the legislatures is that it is a method of securing a Government majority in the bodies; and nominated members are, for that reason, looked upon as Government creatures. Whether this view is right or wrong, we Indian Christians are not in favour of nominations, except when minor interests, such as those of Commerce or Depressed Classes have to be safeguarded. Officials are not expected to represent the feelings of the people.

II. THE SUITABILITY OF EXISTING AREAS FOR LEGISLATIVE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

We see no reason why there should be a re-distribution of areas for political purposes at present.

III. THE LOCAL SELF-GOVERNING BODIES (MUNICIPALITIES, DISTRICT BOARDS, ETC.) AND THEIR RELATIONSHIP WITH THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT.

Local self-governing bodies, such as Municipal Councils, Taluq Boards and District Boards, have done good work in this Province during the period in which they have existed. Drawbacks there are and failures there have been. In a country where there are many conflicting interests like India, failures are bound to occur at the initial stages of political privileges. The remedy for this is not curtailment of such privileges but the provision of safeguards against the abuse of privileges. The basis of franchise being property qualification only, the right of voting is held by a large number of illiterate persons. This gives room to the sinister influence of wealth at elections.

One of the remedies we would suggest is that literacy, not necessarily literacy in English, ought to be insisted upon in the case of every voter. This remedy, while minimising evils in the administration of local self-governing areas, will also prove an incentive to education.

Another suggestion we would like to make is that nomination to self-governing bodies should be resorted to only to secure the representation of such minorities as the Depressed Classes and others. In most cases where nominations are now made on communal or other grounds elections would be preferred, seats being reserved in the general electorate.

We favour the continuance of the provisions for the control by the provincial government of the conduct of local self-governing bodies. Such control may be specified more definitely than it is now. It should not be possible for the Collector of a district to interfere with the working of a local self-governing body unless there is danger of a conflict between that body's policy and the policy of the Government. The Provincial Government's control should be so extended as to include finance also.

IV. THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Constitution. The Provincial Government shall be constituted on the lines of the States in the Australian Colony.

The government shall be in the hands of a Governor appointed by His Majesty. He shall act entirely on the advice of the Ministers, except in such matters as are specially reserved for the exercise of his discretionary powers to maintain the safety and tranquillity of the Province.

The Ministry shall consist of a Prime Minister and five other Ministers. The Governor shall appoint the Prime Minister and call upon him to form a Ministry.

The status and duties of the Ministry shall be the same as those of the Ministries in the Dominions. The Governor shall occupy the position of a constitutional Governor of a Dominion. The Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the people through the Legislature for the administration of the Province.

The Legislative body shall consist of two Houses on the model of the Australian Government. The Lower House shall be elected, and the Upper House or Senate partly elected and partly nominated. No bill shall be enacted until it has passed through both the Houses. The provincial laws shall relate to provincial subjects only, and laws which affect the whole of India shall be enacted only by the Central Legislature. Provincial legislation, inconsistent with any Indian or British Act shall be ultra vires. The relation between the two Houses shall be the same as is obtaining in Australia.

Working of Dyarchy. There shall be no dyarchy in the Provincial Government, though it may be necessary for some time in the Central Government.

The transferred subjects and the reserved ones, as they exist at present in the provinces, are interdependent and cannot be separated in actual administration. Agriculture is now separated from its ally, Irrigation, and Industry from Mines and Factories. Such artificial separation cannot but affect the smooth working of the machinery of Government.

The Secretaries to the various departments which are under the control of the Ministers are often found to differ from the declared policy of the Ministers, and this results in friction between the Ministers and the heads of departments.

It is an established principle of democratic Government that there should be close correspondence between the legislative bodies and the executive, and that there should be political homogeneity in the administration. At present the Cabinet is formed of the Ministers and the Members of the Executive Council who control the reserved subjects. The purse is in the hands of both. Unfortunately this arrangement disturbs the homogeneity and the collective responsibility of the Cabinet.

It is a common principle that Ministers should be subordinate to the Premier. This condition is practicable only when there is collective responsibility in the executive, which is destroyed by the existence of the dyarchy.

One of the reasons why we favour dyarchy in the Central Government is that dyarchy will be a check in extreme cases where there may be danger to law and order. Besides, the subjects controlled by the proposed Central Government will be mainly Imperial, and they do not, as a rule, interact on each other.

Position and Powers of Governor. The Governor shall be the constitutional head of the province, and if he does not adapt himself to constitutional usage, he shall be removed by His Majesty the King if a clear majority of the two Houses of the Province vote that they will not work with him.

Departments of Government. There shall be two main departments, viz. Provincial and Central. There shall not be any reserved department so far as the affairs of the province are concerned.

The Central subjects shall be:—(1) Defence of the country—naval, aerial, and military departments; (2) External relations with the Native States; (3) Inter-relations with the Provinces; (4) Posts and Telegraphs; (5) Railways, Navigation and Commerce; (6) Ports and Lighthouses; (7) Public Debt of India; (8) Currency and Coinage; (9) Penal Law and Procedure; (10) All-India Services, etc.

The central subjects shall be subdivided into Ministerial and Imperial: the Imperial subjects being Military, Ports, Railways, etc.

The Provincial subjects shall be controlled entirely by the Provincial Government, and the Central Government shall have no right of interference.

Finance. There shall be a separate purse for the Central subjects and another for the Provincial subjects, so as to avoid friction between the Provincial Government and the Central. The provincial finance shall be controlled by the Ministers. In pre-reform days the Central Government had the right of using the funds of one province for the needs of another. Even after the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, which provided that the revenues of the provinces are to be kept separate, we are often told that all the revenues are Indian for the reason that the Accountants-General of the provinces are Officers of the Government of India. We hear of " the appropriations " by the Governor-General, and understand thereby that the cash balances of a province are liable to be utilised elsewhere, though the accounts show separate revenues. There shall therefore be complete separation of the provincial funds from the central, and each province shall have freedom in the use of its funds for purposes of the province.

Constitution of the Central Government. The constitution of the Central Government shall be the same as in the Dominions.

The Governor-General and the Indian Cabinet shall be responsible to the Secretary of State and the British Parliament only so far as the Imperial subjects are concerned.

The Central subjects shall be divided into two groups, viz. (1) Indian—which shall be completely under the control of the Ministers, and (2) Imperial—which shall also be controlled by the Ministers, but subject to the supervision of the Secretary of State and the British Parliament.

The Ministry of the Government of India shall consist of a Prime Minister and at least seven Ministers.

The portfolios of the Imperial subjects shall be entrusted to the Executive Councillors, half of whom shall be Indians and the other half Europeans.

The Parliament of India shall consist of the Governor-General, the Upper Chamber of the Central Government, and the House of Representatives, as in the Dominions.

The Governor-General shall give his assent to or withhold it from Bills passed by the House, but he shall not interfere with matters which do not affect Imperial interests.

The relation between the two Houses of the Central Government shall be definitely specified in the new Government of India Act so as to avoid deadlocks, especially in financial matters.

The Position and Powers of the Governor-General. The position of the Governor-General shall be similar to the position of the Governor-General of Canada. He shall have power of ordinance-making, which shall be exercised only under extraordinary conditions, but he shall not have the right of certification.

Relation between the Central and the Provincial Governments. The extent of the power of superintendence, direction and control of the Central Government can be determined only after careful investigation.

Federal India. The Indian National Congress fears that a Federal India may not be a success, and would prefer a Unitary Government. Bearing in mind the multifarious differences and conflicting interests which characterise this country, we prefer a Federal to a Unitary Government for this country. Powerful influences may turn a Unitary Government to an autocratic one. A Federated India is a more logical growth of the present system than Unitary Government. Federation has led to the wealth and influence of the United States of America. There is no reason why the United States of India should not bring prosperity to the country.

The Courts and Judiciary. There shall be a Supreme Court in India to which appeals from the Provincial High Courts shall lie. Judges of this Court shall be appointed by His Majesty the King, and they shall hold office during His Majesty's pleasure. Judges of this Court should have practised at the Bar for not less than seven years, at least three of which having been spent at the Bar in India. The powers of this Court shall be decided by His Majesty, while its jurisdiction shall be determined by the Central Government of India.

There shall be a right of appeal from the Supreme Court in India to the King in Council under conditions specified in the Judicial Committee Act.

The majority of Judges of all courts shall be recruited from the Bar, five years' practice at the Bar being the minimum qualification. We specially urge the claims of Indian Christian lawyers in the matter of appointments to the judiciary.

No officer of Government shall hold judicial and executive powers at the same time. These two powers should be separated without any delay.

Justice in British India. Justice shall be dispensed in India with an even hand. There shall be no distinction between man and man.

The freedom of speech and the freedom of the press, the elementary rights of all self-respecting peoples, shall not be denied to India.

No man shall be arrested and kept in custody longer than a week without a trial. Every accused person shall be informed of the nature of the charge against him within twenty-four hours after his arrest, and every opportunity shall be given to him to defend himself.

Defence of India. It is a discredit to the citizen of any country that he has no share in its defence. More is the pity when he is denied this privilege. Apart even from this, a sound military training has physical and moral value in the development of a nation. Educated young India ought to be given the chance of choosing the army as a career. The educated youth of this country has very limited scope for the choice of a profession. This defect would be remedied if the Army and the Navy are thrown open to deserving young men of this country. There are many Indian Christian young men who have the abilities and the inclination for a military career, but are denied entrance into the army. Large numbers of our Community have served the country and the Empire on many a battlefield in the Great War, and not a few of them have laid down their lives. We feel that the time has come for throwing open the commissioned ranks of the Army and the Navy to deserving young Indians.

We feel very strongly that the Government should not have turned down the modest recommendations of the Skeen Committee. We expect that the whole question would be reconsidered and that the recommendations of the Skeen Committee would be given effect to without delay.

Social Progress in British India. India has had a chequered history. Many influences, indigenous and foreign, have affected Indian society in the past, and are affecting it even to this day. Differences resulting from the existence of many religious faiths and social orders have not disappeared. Bearing the same political burdens and sharing in the same political privileges will, in course of time, bring the various communities of this country together and ensure national solidarity. The caste system, which is one of the most distressing features of Indian society, had its origin in a division of labour. Increasing political responsibilities are likely to effect divisions apart from caste differences, and the barriers of caste which appear insurmountable may become surmountable. The influence of the West in this direction has been most helpful. One unified Indian society may be more than the dream of the optimist.

The status and position of India in the Empire. In area and population India occupies the first place in the British Empire, but this place has not been given to it yet. A Federal India may reach that position. But the least that can be granted to India is a position similar to that of any of the Dominions.

THE POSITION OF THE SERVICES.

The Indian Civil Service. It ought to be said to the lasting honour of the Indian Civil Service that much of what India has achieved in the fields of politics and education she owes directly or indirectly to the Indian Civil Service. That service has maintained without a break the traditions of British justice and sense of fair play all through the changing conditions of this country. But the members of this service have, for long, been holding almost autocratic powers. Such powers might have been necessary in the past. But times have changed, and the angle of vision of the Civil Service also must undergo a change. If the members of the Indian Civil Service will realise that they are the servants of the country, and give of their best ungrudgingly, they will contribute in a larger measure to the growth and progress of the country than in the past.

In the matter of recruitment to the Service, we would urge two considerations, viz. (1) There ought to be steady increase in the number of Indians, and (2) The qualifications shall be both intellectual and moral. We might suggest a character test, should such a test be possible.

Other All-India Services. All appointments to the All-India services shall be made by a body specially appointed for that purpose. The Legislature of the Central Government will appoint the members of such a Board. In every province there shall be a Committee appointed by the Provincial Legislature. These committees shall nominate candidates for the All-India services and choose candidates for the Provincial services. The central staff selection board shall not ordinarily appoint to the All-India services candidates not recommended by the Provincial committees.

In order to secure the representation of minority communities in these services, preference ought to be given to candidates belonging to such communities, other things being equal.

In this connection we urge the claims of our Community, especially with reference to appointments made to the provincial judiciary.

Indianization. Indianization of all the departments of public service, including the Army and Navy, is the ultimate end to be achieved. We desire to see this policy pursued steadily, and not by fits and starts and in answer to any agitation.

The growth of Education. That education has advanced by leaps and bounds in the last decade or two is amply borne out by statistics. Yet a fringe of the country only has been touched. The masses still need schools. The introduction of free and compulsory Primary Education is the crying need of the country. Critics are again and again condemning the methods of education and the system of education in vogue in this country. But few of the critics have quite realised where the fundamental weakness of Indian education lies. Unless a better type of teachers is secured, education is bound to fail in spite of new methods. And a better type of teachers cannot be obtained unless better terms are offered to them. An elementary school teacher is paid less than a coachman, and a teacher of the secondary grade is paid only as much as a postman. And these teachers are expected to possess a certain standard of general educational qualification and have to undergo a couple of years' professional training. Besides, they are expected to be a pattern to their pupils in every respect. The graduate teachers in secondary schools and members of college staffs are not treated any better. In India education is neglected to a culpable extent.

In this country, and especially in this province, education is largely in the hands of private agencies. Aided schools are larger in number than State-managed ones. And yet these generous private agencies are not given the support that they need. If the present state of affairs is permitted to continue, many aided institutions will perish for lack of funds.

We suggest the following remedies:

(1) The immediate revision of the grant-in-aid code, providing for a Government grant to each aided institution equal to the difference between its fee-income and its expenditure.

(2) Introduction of scales of salaries for teachers of all grades, these scales being double what are in force at present.

(3) Revision of rules regarding recognition of aided schools and colleges, making it obligatory on the part of the managements to guarantee

(a) security of tenure,
(b) adoption of Government scales of salaries, and
(c) steady Indianization of the staff.

(4) Appointment of only teachers of considerable experience as Inspectors, fifty per cent. of these posts being reserved for experienced headmasters of aided schools.

About eighty per cent. of the educated men and women of our Community are, as has been said before, teachers, and we would urge their claims to be appointed to responsible positions in the Government educational department.

We demand a thorough investigation into the educational needs of the country. The reforms we have urged would mean a much larger expenditure on education than is provided for in the present Budgets. But what additional money may have to be spent now will come back as saving on the expenditure for sanitation, medical relief, and police. When the masses are educated and a large majority are given a University training, public morality will improve and social evils disappear. It is the duty of a civilized Government to make education the first charge on its revenues.

Deputation from the Indian Christian Association, Madras.

(COLONEL LANE-FOX IN THE CHAIR).

The deputation consisted of :—

Rao Bahadur PAUL APPASWAMY, M.A., LL.B. (Spokesman).
Dr. A. C. ASIRVADHA NADAR.
Mr. S. BALASINGAM SATYA NADAR, M.A.
Mr. O. F. E. ZACHARIAS, B.A.
Mr. Y. DEVANESAN, F.C.I.

225. The Chairman : * * * May I ask first of all whether you represent only the Protestant side or have you any Roman Catholics among your members ?—We represent only the Protestant community.

226. You have no Roman Catholic members ?—No.

227. Are there any other denominations ?—We represent all the Protestant denominations; all Christians except Catholics.

228. You have 450 members?—Yes.

229. On the question of franchise your view is that there should be an additional, educational, qualification for the vote?—We are very anxious about that point, because the special qualification of the community is that it has taken full advantage of the opportunities for education now available; there are large numbers of graduates in the community who do not have votes at present. We want them to be given votes, so that they may bring their education and trained intelligence to bear upon matters of government.

230. You mean there are a great many graduates who do not possess the property qualification?—Yes.

231. You would put it solely on the basis of literacy?—No; on some qualification midway between mere literacy and graduation, such as the passing of the School Final examination.

232. Would you admit some property qualification?—In addition to the usual or existing property qualification, we want the vote for all who have reached a certain educational standard.

233. Sir A. P. Patro: That is for the Christian constituencies?—Yes. I may mention here that we have 4,000 graduates in our community, while the great non-Brahmin community has only about 8,000; but, it so happens, we are nothing like proportionately represented in the legislative council.

234. The Chairman: That is rather a different point, is not it? You limit your suggestion about making literacy a qualification to the Christian community?—We are speaking mainly about Christians; as it is, the non-Christians' electorate is very large, and if an additional qualification was introduced probably it would become very much larger; but in our community the electorate is only about 5,000 in each electoral district, and so it admits of expansion.

235. I see you say you have found that a system of communal representation on the basis of separate electorates has not been successful in the case of Indian Christians, and has led to friction between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants?—On that point I should like the permission of the Conference to modify what is said in the Memorandum. Since this Memorandum was submitted we have taken the views of a large number of people belonging to the community, and especially of some leaders, and I have now been instructed to say that we would much rather have the present communal electorate system continued, in preference to any other method of election.

236. In the Memorandum I see you advocate a system of reservation of seats?—We do not stand by that now.

237. You wish to withdraw that?—Yes. I am instructed to ask for communal electorates.

238. You prefer the present system to remain, in spite of possible differences between sections of your community?—In regard to those differences I want to make a suggestion to which the Catholics are also agreeable. It is this. Friction has arisen because in four out of the five Christian constituencies Catholic candidates usually come in by election as Catholics are in the majority; it is only in one constituency that the Protestants are in a majority. We propose, in agreement with the Catholics (I believe the Catholic representatives will support us in this when they come before you), that the whole Presidency should be divided into at least three Christian constituencies, each to return one Protestant and one Catholic.

239. That is an agreement you have come to between you?—Yes.

240. It sounds a very sensible one?—There have been three legislative councils so far. In each instance when the Protestants have been in a majority the Government has nominated Catholics to make up the balance, and vice versa. Instead of artificially making up the balance like that, we propose a regular arrangement by which each constituency (whether there are three or four or more) returns a Protestant and a Catholic.

241. That sounds a very admirable and much more dignified arrangement. I notice on page 322 of your Memorandum you say your representation is not sufficient, and you claim you are entitled to nine seats. You say you are 3.2 per cent of the population and you have 5.5 per cent of the seats on the council. It seems to me that it is not an inadequate representation, but you are not satisfied with it, and you say you ought to have nine seats?—This is a point on which we are very keen, so I want to address the Conference with some particularity about it. The Conference will notice that the Muhammadans are just twice as numerous as ourselves; they are 6.5 per cent of the total population, and they get 13.5 per cent of the membership of the council, whereas we, who are 3.2 per cent of the population, get only 5.5 per cent. If I may put it in figures, their numbers in this Presidency are just 2,800,000, and we are just about half that. Looking at that proportion, if they are to have 13 seats, we should have 7, but there are other considerations which we should like to urge. I take it the Muhammadans are given rather more representation than they are entitled to numerically because they are a minority community, and are likely to go to the wall unless they are adequately represented. We are still further in a minority; of the three great forms of faith, Hindus are ninety per cent of the population, Muhammadans about six per cent and we are about three per cent.

242. These figures are all in your Memorandum, so we have got them?—Yes. A further consideration I want to mention is that in the matter of education we are very much more likely to help efficiently in matters of administration than other communities because of the very large advance in education which, as I have pointed out, our community has made. I have already mentioned that we have 4,000 graduates as against 8,000 in the non-Brahmin community. The Muhammadans have only 500 graduates. In regard to simple literacy, both in English and the vernaculars, our people are very much ahead of the Muhammadans. Further as a community we stand for peace: and if Hindus and Moslems are in conflict, we will be the only persons interested in keeping the peace.

243. I think the Conference will probably feel there is something to be said for your claim on the ground of having better education, but as regards your claim that because the Muhammadans are given representation in excess of their proportion of the population therefore you ought to have it on the same basis, is not it obvious that if every minority community claimed a much larger percentage than it was entitled to there would be no room left for the majority at all? At present the Hindus form 89 per cent of the population and have a representation of only 65 per cent. What do you think the Hindus will say if every minority community takes the view you put forward?—I do not claim larger representation merely because the Muhammadans have larger representation, but on the ground that we are a separate community, and the principle behind all these legislative councils is that no community should be bound by laws to which it is not a party. Any great community should have an effective voice in making the laws by which it is going to be bound, and if our minority is given representation only in proportion to its numbers its representation will be so ineffective that in any conflict its interests will go to the wall, so that it is no good giving us representation. Communities ought also to have representation according to their value or importance and the place they fill in public life. A community like ours which is in the forefront of matters of education, which has done much to elevate and educate the lower classes and served to interpret the West to the East, the Englishmen and his ideals to the Oriental, ought not to be placed in such a position that they do not count for anything.

244. Let us now come to the next point about adequate representation on self-governing bodies. You do not say how you propose to get it ?—All that we can say is that in every taluk board or district board where Christians are to be found in considerable numbers they should be given one elected seat at least. As a matter of fact we have not actually suffered much by the present system because a fair number of Christians do get elected to taluk boards and municipalities, but in a time of conflict, or in a time when communal feelings run high, one can imagine a Christian not getting any seat at all. So in any taluk or sub-division where the Christians are to be found in considerable numbers a certain proportion, say 10 per cent of the seats should be reserved for them.

The Chairman : Then you go on to deal with the general constitution and on that subject we had evidence from a great many deputations and it has been the main thing we have been considering all through.

245. Mr. Cadogan : On page 321 you say, " Educationally, the Indian Christian community " is ahead practically of every other community " in this province, and yet it is not represented in " the higher ranks of public service proportionately " to its educational qualifications." But surely the public services are open to your community ? —They are open, but we are getting nothing like the proportion to which we are entitled in the higher ranks of the public service.

246. Why not ?—In the matter of appointments, the appointing authorities yield to the community which pulls the strongest weight and as we are a minority community we scarcely pull any weight.

247. There is a prejudice against you ?—There is, very distinctly. Not only prejudice, but as we do not have sufficient people of influence we do not get a large enough number of our people in the higher branches of public service. Take, for instance, the people who have got B.L. degrees. We have got five times as many people who have got the B.L. degree as compared to the Muhammadans and yet they hold exactly the same number of appointments as we hold in the judicial service. In fact, I have heard a European say that he would much prefer to be a Muhammadan, because he will then get into the higher ranks more easily. In fact, men of very much less qualification from other communities do get in and those of us who have got higher qualifications are left behind.

248. You say on page 325 " In order to secure the " representation of minority communities in these " services, preference ought to be given to candidates " belonging to such communities, other things being " equal." Why ?—We do not want more than what we are numerically entitled to, that is, according to the number of educated men in our community.

249. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-lah-Sahib : Comparing the Moslem representation and Christian representation in this province, you have been saying that you are not adequately represented proportionately. May I know if in addition to the five seats which you get by election you have not been given one or two seats more by nomination consistently in all the three councils ?—In the last two councils we have had two nominated members, but they were nominated to represent other interests. Of the two people who are there now the one represents railway and labour and the other the depressed classes. They have nothing to do with the Christians and they are not put there as representatives of Christians at all.

250. But the fact remains that there are two more Christians nominated in addition to the five elected ?—Because our community has got many educated people the Government find it easy to get representatives from our community.

251. In the matter of services you have been saying that there are not the same number of Christians in the public services as the Muhammadans ?—In the higher branches of the public service. I can give the exact figures. Of the gazetted posts the Muhammadans are holding 68 and the Indian Christians 125, while of the higher posts, we are holding 30 and the Muhammadans 32.

252. So far as the population is concerned the Muhammadans are double your number ?—Yes.

253. And in spite of that they are holding only as many posts in the higher services as the Indian Christians ?—Yes. But in literacy and education we are far in advance of them ; as regards law graduates for example, as I have mentioned already we have five times as many law graduates as there are among the Muhammadans. As for ordinary graduates we have got 4,200 graduates, while the Muhammadans have 500 only.

254. Do you concede that the Muhammadans have a better history and political importance ? —Antiquarian considerations are very good from the point of view of sentiment, but they should not weigh in matters of the Government.

255. Mr. Thomas : As regards the education of women I suppose the Indian Christian women stand far above all other communities ?—Looking at the figures I find that among the Muhammadans and Hindus there is one woman educated for every ten men educated, whereas in the case of Christians there is one woman educated for every two men educated.

256. How many women's institutions in this Presidency are manned by women teachers ?—Not only the missionary colleges and schools, but also the Government institutions have got Christian women teachers, and most of the Inspectresses are also Christians.

257. The mission institutions in the Presidency are also educating all classes of people, in primary, secondary and college institutions ?—Yes. That is another reason why we are asking for adequate representation. We very much fear that the large opportunities of education that are now available in the country owing to Christian missions may be cut short if, owing to any wave of feeling against the Christians, grants to maintain these institutions are not given and Christian institutions are snuffed out or starved. Even now very often a taluk board or district board starts a school just close to where a Christian school is already in existence and the Christian school is snuffed out. That sort of fear we undoubtedly have ; adequate representation in the legislative councils would help us to make a stand for the continuance of the existing schools or the increase of them.

258. One of the things which the mission institutions stipulate is to give Christian religious education in the schools ?—Most Christian institutions (except Catholic schools) give religious instruction.

259. And there is a growing tendency not to give public support for such institutions as give religious instruction ?—There was a movement some time ago that pupils who go to Christian schools should have the option of saying whether they would attend the religious instruction or not. That was about six or seven years ago. But I do not hear much cry about that now, but at any moment it may rise again.

260. Is that one of the reasons why you ask for adequate representation in the council ?—We feel that public education, which is the thing which has been the main plank among Christians, would suffer greatly if there is no adequate representation in the legislative council. Our mission schools and the grants made to them would suffer if a majority community makes up its mind that they have no reason to exist.

261. In the constitution of the present council there is a certain official bloc which may be expected to hold the scales even among the various communities ; is that so ?—Yes. At present, though an European official is supposed to be neutral, we know that he will at least see that no harm or injury is done to the minority community.

262. Colonel Lane-Fox (from the Chair): You advocate in your memorandum the abolition of the official bloc ?—Yes. I say that because it is going to be abolished we ought to be put in a stronger position, because the official bloc was helping us and standing behind us and will hereafter disappear.

263. Mr. Thomas: Do you want representation in the Legislative Assembly ?—At present we have no elected member at all. We have only one member who is nominated. For a community of 5,000,000 in India I think this is not fair and just. We ought to have some elected members. Even on a numerical basis we are now entitled to three seats; if the councils are enlarged we would like to have more.

264. You know the Madras Government has issued a G.O. fixing certain proportions of all communities in the public services ?—Yes, according to the latest G.O. the Christians and Anglo-Indians together will have 10 per cent. of the appointments.

265. Are you satisfied with being grouped together with Anglo-Indians ?—We are very much dissatisfied, because when an Anglo-Indian and an Indian Christian come into competition I fear the Indian Christian will not succeed. So we would rather like to be put on a separate footing, say 8 per cent. for the Indian Christians and 2 per cent. for the Anglo-Indians or something like that.

266. You have stated that the Christian community is advanced educationally ? What is their economic condition ?—I am afraid that the vast majority of our community are still very poor, because many of them are still doing agricultural work. Whereas among the Hindus 3 per cent. of the people have the property qualification, only 1 per cent. among the Indian Christians have the property qualification. That shows that we are at least twice as poor as the Hindu community.

267. The Christian community has to meet social and religious disabilities ?—There are a number of social disabilities suffered by the depressed classes in this Presidency, and with one exception all these disabilities also apply to the Christians, vide my book.

268. Sir Hari Singh Gour: On page 322 you urge for reservation of seats. That is going back to communal representation. Would it not retard the growth of the party system ?—What we feel about it is that there would be injustice otherwise; and probably also practical difficulties in the way of reservation of seats for Christians. This is the objection on principle. The Christian who is returned in a general electorate will be one who is acceptable to the general electorate, that is to the Hindus. He may not represent the Christian feeling at all. He may be a man who may be a Hindu in tone, in spirit and in thought. He may be unpopular among the Christians. He may be an excommunicated man. If on the principle I have enunciated a community should be bound by law to the making of which it is a party, it is better to make these people elected representatives who are acceptable to the community, and not people acceptable to somebody else.

269. That is not certainly the view of the Christian community of Northern India. Mr. Chatterjee, who was speaking for them, has told us that he supported national claims in preference to claims of particular communities ?—I have got here the All-India Memorandum submitted by them. I have marked two or three sentences therein. They say that they would want it as a future eventuality. But at present, they say, that if any other community is to have separate representation they should also like to have a communal electorate.

270. You stand by that ?—Yes.

Memorandum submitted by the Catholic Indian Association of Southern India.

On behalf of the Catholic Indian Association of Southern India, we have the honour to present the Memorandum to the Indian Statutory Commission.

This Association, established in the year 1899, claims to represent the Catholic Christians of the Madras Presidency. It possesses the confidence of the Catholic Hierarchy and has for its President, His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. J. Aelen, till recently Archbishop of Madras, and has ever since its establishment been recognised by Government as the representative of the Catholic population of this Presidency.

This Association welcomed the passing of the Government of India Act of 1919 as a first step on the road to Responsible Self-Government, the goal of Indian policy that was announced in the famous declaration of August, 1917, made by the Secretary of State for India and accepted by the British Parliament and people.

While the Association and the community which it represents have co-operated with the Government and other political communities in the working of the Act of 1919, the Executive Committee is clearly of opinion (1) that the time has arrived for still further steps being taken in the direction of responsible self-government; and (2) that the actual working of the constitution of 1919 during the past eight years has revealed defects which have prevented that constitution from working smoothly and realising the end of responsible self-government.

This Committee would make its observations and recommendations on the various questions of the Indian constitutional problem under the headings indicated by the Statutory Commission in their invitation to submit memoranda published in the Gazette of India of March 10, 1928 (Notification Public No. F. 143/28).

The Committee would like to preface its statement with the view that without losing sight of the needs and general progress of the country, its observations and recommendations would be made from the particular standpoint of Indian Christians of whom Catholics form, and are recognised to be, a political part. It would also introduce its statement with the observation that the total number of Indian Christians is 1,327,215, of which the Indian Catholics are 730,911; and the total number of Christian voters is 24,860.

1. The representative system as applied to British India.

(a) The basis of the franchise. The committee are of opinion that one basis of the franchise should continue to be a property qualification; literacy in the vernacular should be made an alternative electoral qualification. The property franchise might be slightly lowered although the present rate is low enough.

Even with the present qualification, the committee think that the number of voters could be appreciably increased if Government take upon itself the duty of registration of voters instead of leaving it to candidates and parties as at present. Under the present system it may be also pointed out that the votes are given to holders of pattas, and as the joint family system obtains even among Catholics in rural parts, a large estate may bear only one vote, while the number of managers and cultivators of the estate may be more than one.

(b) Methods of election. The present system of communal electorate for the Indian Christians should be retained.

In view of the large size of the average district and the lack of communications, the Committee would recommend that the district be divided into sub-districts or wards and each sub-district or ward be allowed to elect one member instead of the whole district being allowed to elect 2 or 3 members as at present.

We think that for provincial and central legislative bodies the system of communal electorates should be preserved for the representation of particular and communal interests; this system is not necessary for representation in local bodies like municipalities and district boards, as, with proper organisation and combination, it would be possible for Muhammadans and Christians to be elected as they have been, in the past, in this Presidency; if the number of seats in these local bodies were considerably increased and properly "redistributed," it would be possible to get most of the minority communities represented. As it would be desirable that, at one stage at least of Government, the largest number possible of people should have some share in the business of Government, we would advocate a very considerable lowering of the present franchise, i.e., any adult male occupying a part of a brick-built house in town or country part should be given the right of electing to these local bodies.

We would recommend that the direct methods should be introduced in all these elections; the present system of indirect election to District Boards in Madras should be given up.

We think that the present constituencies for Indian Christians are rather unwieldy, the central constituency for instance including as many as nine districts. The number of Indian Christian constituencies electing members to the Madras Legislative Council should be increased to ten, no Christian constituency being allowed to include more than three districts. We are of opinion that the strength of the Legislative Council should be increased to 300. In which case, the number of Indian Christians should proportionately be increased.

(c) The relationship between representative and constituents. In the opinion of this committee, the relations between members and their representatives are not what they should be; on account of the large size of the constituency, the political indifference of the people, the difficulty of fixing responsibility under the present system of dyarchy, communication between member and constituent is infrequent and does not lead to political education or training in responsibility in either party. It is very rarely that members tour their constituencies except at election time. Especially in Indian Christian constituencies, including six or seven districts this communication is even more difficult and infrequent.

(d) The growth of parties. The party system has little chance of establishing itself in this Presidency on account of—

(1) The difficulty of fixing responsibility under dyarchy, (2) the anti-Brahmin feeling resulting from the monopoly of political power by the Brahmins which has brought into existence in Madras ever since the Reform a non-Brahmin party, called the Justice party, which has refused up to the present to admit Brahmins as its members, (3) the refusal of the Swarajists to accept office giving them an electoral advantage to obtain which other parties are tempted to drop their original principles and form themselves into a more or less permanent opposition to the Executive Government; thus in Madras the Justice party has been obliged to jettison one or other of its old political principles of conservative progress and co-operation with the Government, (4) the scramble for appointments, either paid, as in the judiciary, or honorary, as memberships and presidentships of local bodies, school committees, temple committees, which results in individual members of parties changing their political creed, to gain the favour of the Minister who has such appointments in his gift. (5) Catholics have to this extent contributed to the growth of the party system, that they are to be found in almost all the political parties in Madras.

(e) The growth of informed public opinion. There is only one English weekly for Catholics in Madras which deals with political questions; the vernacular papers hardly concern themselves with political questions; the political opinion that expresses itself in the press and on the platform is confined to the educated minority; in regard to general public opinion there is very little of it in the districts; there are very few district vernacular papers. Administrative policies of the future might well aim at the provocation of public opinion in the rural parts by the use of the district gazettes as media for publicity propaganda on behalf of Government.

(f) Nomination of officials and non-officials as additional members of elected bodies. The number of officials belonging to the permanent service of Government nominated to legislative bodies ought to be considerably diminished or even abolished; administrative experience ought to spread among the elected non-officials who should as secretaries or under-secretaries take the place of the present officials partially in the central and provincial legislatures; in local bodies an official or two may be kept to bring into contact the official and non-official agencies of Government.

2. The suitability of existing areas for legislative and administrative purposes and for the growth of representative institutions:—

(a) Local self-government. The present local areas would be manageable if only the communications by road were developed; the lack of village roads connecting villages with first and second-class roads is a great obstacle to the progress of villages and to administrative efficiency.

(b) Provincial. In the Madras Presidency, we think Coorg is advanced enough to have self-governing institutions introduced to a partial extent; with regard to proposals for division of existing provinces, we are against any such divisions being based on linguistic grounds; for we think that would be a backward step and strengthen that tendency towards division which has been the bane of Indian political life: we are against the division of the Madras Presidency into Andhra and Tamil provinces, as the interests of administrative efficiency do not require it.

3. Local self-governing bodies.

(a) Constitution. They ought to be almost wholly elected except for a very few to ensure the proper representation of depressed classes.

(b) Functions. There is no need for adding to their present functions.

(c) Relationship with officials of Provincial Government. One official, generally the collector of the district or his deputy ought to be a member of these local bodies to ensure harmony and efficiency in administration.

(d) Control by Provincial Government. The present control ought to be relaxed and local bodies given a free hand in administration within the scope of their powers liable to punishment by suspension in the case of gross maladministration.

(e) Finance. The powers of taxation of local bodies ought to be increased.

4. The Provincial Government.

(a) Constitution. The time has come for making Provincial Government wholly or almost wholly "responsible." All subjects except perhaps Law and Order should be transferred to Ministers responsible to the legislature which is in turn responsible to the people.

(b) Dyarchy. Dyarchy, although workable with goodwill on all sides, has not succeeded in teaching responsibility, as responsibility has been difficult to fix on account of a common purse and common legislative council and one half of the Executive not being responsible to the legislative council; whatever development takes place, Dyarchy should be scrapped; whatever degree or extent of responsible self-government is granted, it should be real and effective; this can be done only by the responsible ministry being made responsible to a wholly elected legislature and by its having a purse of its own and a civil service amenable to its control and discipline.

(c) Position and Powers of Governor. In view of the large measure of self-government advocated in (a) and (b) the Governor for the defence of minorities or administrative reasons should have a real power of veto; if Law and Order are not "transferred," he should administer it through an Executive Council responsible to him and through him to the Central Government and British Parliament; to provide against obstructive tactics and deadlocks, the Governor should have real powers of administration of taxation and collection of revenue, in case the Ministers and the Legislative Council refuse to function.

(e) Relationship of Ministers to each other. Joint and collective responsibility must be insisted on from the beginning as in Madras, and not left to the will of particular Governors as in Bombay, United Provinces, etc.

(f) Growth of party system in the Provincial Councils. Already dealt with in 1 (e).

(g) Working of particular departments. No observations to offer.

(h) Classification into reserved and transferred subjects. All subjects should be transferred except Law and Order (i.e. police).

(i) Desirability of Second Chambers. The Committee is strongly of opinion that Second Chambers should be established in the provinces, if full provincial self-government is to be granted; the provincial legislature will become very powerful and its power in the interests of liberty ought to be divided and distributed; the governor's power of veto is not enough, it ought to be supported and backed up by the power of possible veto of a Second Chamber. To secure full representation of the provinces also, Second Chambers are desirable. Minorities, interests and individuals also which cannot find their way into the more popular branch of the legislature ought to find a place in it. Moreover, if "law and order" are not to be transferred, this Second Chamber would be the forum in which the acts and policy of this branch of administration could be surveyed and discussed by the representatives of the people.

(j) Question of Provincial Autonomy. Provincial autonomy in our opinion means not only responsible government, i.e., the responsibility of a provincial executive to the provincial legislature and electorate; it means also freedom in ordinary circumstances from the jurisdiction of the Central Government in regard to all transferred subjects, but as a perfect division of subjects is not possible, the Central Government may be given the power of putting an end to deadlocks and conflicts of jurisdiction.

(k) and (l) Finances of Provincial Government and Financial Control. A joint purse has not allowed responsibility to be easily fixed; if there are to be reserved and transferred halves of the Executive, they ought each to have their own revenues and full power of control over their expenditure.

5. The Central Government.

(a) Constitution. In view of the incomplete political unity of the country, the lack of a real national army and a national civil service, it would not be possible to introduce complete "responsibility" in the Central Government; but some measure of responsibility must be introduced if only to avoid the "impasse" at which the relations between an almost wholly elected legislature and an "irremovable" and "irresponsible" Executive have arrived. We would recommend that the subjects of Education, Agriculture, Industry and Law be transferred to an Executive responsible to a wholly elected Legislative Assembly, while the subjects of Army, Foreign and "political" relations, Railways and Commerce may be retained in the hands of an Executive Council and responsible to the Secretary of State for India and the British Parliament as now. The Council of State would serve as the forum of discussion for these branches of administration. Each half of the Central Government would have its own Finance Ministry and purse.

(b) Position and Powers of the Governor-General. His power of veto ought to be real; he ought not to continue to be his own Foreign Secretary as at present.

(c) Governor General's Executive Council. We think that all the Executive Councillors except those in charge of the Army and Foreign relations ought to be Indians; the Commander-in-Chief ought to be replaced by a civilian Executive Councillor; the practice of Secretaries having access to the Governor should cease; the Executive Council should be a real Cabinet; and all relations between the Secretary of State and the Government of India should be with the Governor-General in Council.

(d, e and f) already dealt with in a, b and c.

(g) Relationship between the two Houses. They ought to have equal and co-ordinate powers except that money bills should be initiated in the popular Legislature.

6. Relationship between Central and Provincial Governments in regard to:—

(a) The extent of power of superintendence, etc. Jurisdiction only in extraordinary cases to prevent deadlocks or in All-India interests.

(b) The Classification of Subjects. The present classification may continue.

(c) Financial Relations. Freedom and autonomy of each Government ought to be the rule with separate purses; provincial contributions ought to go, the Central Government having the residuary power of taxation.

7. The Courts and the Judiciary.

A Supreme Court ought to be established in India to promote the legal unity of the country. We do not think the courts ought to have jurisdiction over constitutional questions.

8. The Constitutional Problem in regard to:—

(a) Law and Order in British India. Law and Order cannot be "transferred" in the Central Government till the army becomes really national, and political unity more complete than it is now; till Law and Order is transferred in the Central Government, it would be difficult to transfer it in the provinces.

(b) Justice in British India. In view of the present position and power of the Bar, recruitment to all courts may be made mainly if not wholly from the Bar.

(c) Defence of India. India cannot be really self-governing till it is largely dependent for its national defences on itself. The gradual conversion of the present racial armies into a real national army and the Indianisation of the superior cadre of officers must be taken in hand and achieved as soon as possible.

(d) Social progress in British India. Political progress is dependent on social progress. Much more may be done by legislation and administration to speed up social progress than has been done in the past.

(e) Federation in India. On account of the unequal political development of the various provinces, and the position of the Native States, the establishment of Federal System of Government would be difficult in India. Till the provinces of British India and the Native States reach an equally advanced stage of political progress, the question of federation will not become practical and actual.

(f) The Status and Position of India in the British Empire. Geography and the politics of the Middle Far East make it imperative that India should continue to be part of the British Empire. The position it acquired by the signing of the Treaty of Versailles makes her Imperial status equal to that of the self-governing dominions whatever her internal constitution may be.

9. The relationship between the Central Government, the Secretary of State and the British Parliament.

As the Central Government becomes more and more responsible and to that extent the control of the Secretary of State of India and the British Parliament will diminish.

10. The position of the Services.

(a) and (b) The rate of Indianisation of these Services will have to be considerably accelerated, if responsible self-government is to be reached within a reasonable period of time.

(c) Provincial Service must be largely Indianised in all transferred departments.

(d) Question of recruitment. The Secretary of State should cease recruiting in all transferred departments. Provincial Civil Service Commissions should be established on the model of the present Public Service Commission.

(e) Indianisation. Already dealt with in (a and b).

11. The Growth of Education.

The Commission is expected to make a special announcement as to this branch of inquiry. And the Executive Committee will submit a separate Memorandum when that announcement is made.

Afternoon.

PRESENT:

Rao Sahib Dr. D. R. COLACO, Secretary, South Canara Catholic Association.
Dr. L. P. FERNANDES, Vice-President of the South Canara Catholic Indian Association, and Municipal Councillor.
Mr. M. S. SRESHTA, B.A., Barrister-at-Law, Retired C.C.S.
Rev FATHER R. F. C. MASCARENHAS, Consular of the Diocesan Council, Mangalore.

1. The Chairman (Colonel Lane-Fox) : I understand that Mr. Udeyar is to be the spokesman of the deputation, and that you represent the Catholic Indian Association of South India ?—(Mr. Udeyar) Yes, sir.

2. We have got your memorandum and I will just go through some of the points contained therein. I see that there are 730,911 Roman Catholics out of 1,327,215 Indian Christians in the Presidency ?—Yes, sir.

3. So you are a little more than half of the total number of Indian Christians, and I gather that your body is entirely composed of Roman Catholic Indian Christians ?—Yes, sir.

4. You suggest that the property franchise might be lowered ?—It might be slightly lowered. At present it is Rs10 in rural areas while it is Rs8 in urban and municipal areas. It may be brought down to, say Rs8 in rural areas.

5. You think on the whole that the present rate is low ?—Yes, sir.

6. And you suggest that some literacy qualification might be added ?—Yes, sir.

7. Those who have not got property qualification, but have got literacy qualification should be allowed to have a vote ?—Yes, sir.

8. I do not quite understand what you mean when you say on page 329 of your Memorandum : " The number of voters could be appreciably increased " if Government take upon itself the duty of " registration of voters." I take it that the Government provides the machinery and it is for the voters to go and get their names registered ?—We think it would be better if the Government were to take upon itself the duty of registration of voters, because especially in the Indian Christian constituencies which extend over 3 or 5 districts, morally speaking, it is impossible for the candidate to go round and get the names of those electors whom the officers have left out included in the roll.

9. Do you mean to say that the Government ought to carry out the whole investigation to find out the qualified persons ?—It is usually done by the village officers and by the staff of the municipality. So if Government could appoint some one to supervise the work and do the needful it will be better, sir. It is only a suggestion.

10. What kind of supervision have you in mind ? —The officer who is usually appointed is a revenue divisional officer. He may send for these lists and scrutinise them, and if he finds that the complaints made by the electors or the candidates are reasonable he may insist upon a further revision of the lists. We want a little more help from the Government.

11. You wish to retain the present system of communal electorates for Indian Christians. We heard this morning a deputation from the Indian Christian Association, who told us that they have made an agreement with you that there should be three constituencies for the Indian Christians, each of the constituencies returning two candidates, of whom one should be a Roman Catholic and the other a Protestant. Is that so ?—We know nothing about this. Our contention is that we should have more than three constituencies. We should like to have 8 to 10 members.

12. Sir A. P. Patro : Did they discuss this proposal with you ?—They did not meet us at all.

13. The Chairman (Colonel Lane-Fox) : Anyhow, that seems to be a reasonable arrangement which could be made amongst yourselves ?—(Mr. Sreshta) The Protestants and Catholics are not equally distributed and so there will be difficulty in working it out. (Mr. Udeyar) I think there can be no objection in giving them 3 or 4 seats, though not exactly an equal number of seats.

14. It is clearly a matter for arrangement amongst yourselves ?—Yes, sir.

15. You wish to have direct election for district boards instead of the indirect election which you have now ?—Yes, sir.

16. Why do you say that ?—At present one has to be dancing attendance on the president or the minister, whereas if we have direct election with smaller wards there is a possibility of more members being returned to these boards. Members of district boards are elected from the taluk boards. It happens that some members group themselves together, making it impossible for members of minority communities to be returned.

17. I see you say that the present constituencies for Indian Christians are rather unwieldy and that you want your representation in the Madras legislative council to be increased to 10. I think you are only about 3 per cent. of the population while you demand about 10 per cent. of the seats in the Council ? —It is not only a question of proportional representation, but also a question of adequate representation. In a body of 120 strong 6 members may exert some influence, but if the strength of the council is increased to 300, even 7 or 8 cannot make their influence felt. It is only a question of adequate representation of minorities. We want 10 seats because we have recommended that the strength of the Council should be 300.

18. I do not think that your remarks in the Memorandum convey that meaning. You say that your number should be increased to ten and remark : " We are of opinion that the strength of the Legis- " lative Council should be increased to 300, in which " case, the number of Indian Christians should " proportionally be increased." You ask for more than ten seats in case the number of the members of the Council is increased. If it is increased to 300 you want roughly, 30 seats ?—(Mr. Sreshta) May I give you some figures on this point, sir ? At present there are about 38 million Hindus. On that basis and assuming that we get 100 Hindu members, each Hindu member will represent $3\frac{3}{4}$ lakhs of Hindus ; on the same calculation each Muhammadan member will represent about 2 lakhs of Muhammadans.

19. What about the Hindus ?—Hindus, $3\frac{3}{4}$ lakhs ; Muhammadans, 2 lakhs ; and Christians, $2\frac{1}{4}$ lakhs. Our position is that if we follow the same ratio as has been taken for the Hindus we certainly get a lower representation, but we get a larger representation if we take the ratio adopted for the Muhammadans. It is not clear what principle has been followed in giving more representation for the Muhammadans. Apparently they have been given more representation on the principle that the smaller the body the larger the representation should be to make the representation adequate. I have one other point to state, the point of literacy. The total number of English literates among the Christians is more than among the Muhammadans in the Presidency. Nevertheless, we are to be given only six members as against fifteen for Muhammadans. If you consider ordinary literacy, there, too, our numbers almost equal the number of Muhammadans. Taking into consideration all these factors, it strikes me that a mean may be drawn and that the number ten may be roughly fixed as adequate.

The Chairman (Colonel Lane-Fox) : We will consider the views put forward.

20. Then, on page 330 of your Memorandum, I see you say that you wish to see the number of officials nominated to legislative bodies either considerably diminished or even abolished. Has it ever occurred to you that the Christians get considerable support from the official bloc in the Legislative Council ?—(Mr. Udeyar) It is in no way connected with lack of sympathy or encouragement on the part of the official element. They are invariably sympathetic towards us. But we want the Council to be made responsible, therefore, we want to see the official element reduced as much as possible. There is no connection whatsoever between this suggestion put forward by our community and any lack of sympathy or encouragement shown by the official bloc. They are always sympathetic towards us.

21. Then, I see, you are against the Madras Presidency being divided up on linguistic grounds. You think it would be a backward step. I can quite see the financial difficulty. But what is your particular objection ?—Not only financial difficulties, but also we do not want to see some separatist tendencies asserting themselves. Our endeavour should be to promote national unity and work for it. We should think not in terms of Karnataka or Telugu, but in terms of nationality. And then, setting up so many provinces will mount up the cost of establishments and things like that.

22. Then you think that the power of taxation of local bodies ought to be increased. What particular sources of taxation have you in view ?—Excise may be transferred to local bodies. Excise revenue.

23. You will increase the excise duty ?—No. It may be transferred to the local bodies. It is provincial now. It may be localised.

24. Then you wish to have a Second Chamber established in the province ?—Yes, sir.

25. You suggest that a safeguard for better government in the future will be the Governor's veto, but that it should be strengthened by a possible veto of the Second Chamber. You propose giving a veto to the Governor as well as to the Second Chamber ?—If there is a Second Chamber there will be no need for His Excellency the Governor to veto.

26. That is an alternative then ?—Yes, sir.

27. And you want to have some system of dyarchy in the Central Government ?—Only for the subjects, Army and Foreign relations.

28. Even though you think that dyarchy in the provinces has been a failure you will advise it for the centre ?—In the centre, only for a few subjects.

29. Though you think in the provinces it has been a failure you believe that it is likely to be a success in the centre ?—In this sense. We have no Indian Army and Indian Navy. Until these things become accomplished facts there must be control exercised by His Excellency the Viceroy over the Army, Navy, and Foreign relations. So, we say that these external subjects may be reserved.

30. Lord Strathcona : You say, on page 330, "Classification into reserved and transferred sub-"jects :—All subjects should be transferred except "Law and Order (i.e., Police)." Could you very shortly explain the reasons why you are opposed to the transfer of Law and Order ?—If you refer to the other paragraphs, too, sir, you will see that is proposed more or less tentatively. If you are going to reserve any subject, let it be Law and Order. We do not insist on it in the Memorandum.

31. It is a suggestion ?—Yes, a suggestion.

32. Khan Bahadur Khalif-Ul-Lah Sahib : You just now said that excise should be made a source of revenue for the local self-governing bodies, namely local boards and municipalities. You have got a wide experience of the administration of the province. Do you mean to suggest that excise is a fit subject for the local bodies to have a proper control of ?—There is no question of control. I mean a portion of the revenue.

33. Mr. Thomas : It was mentioned to you that you have suggested dyarchy in the Central Government, though it has been found to be unworkable in the province. May I suggest to you that whereas in the provinces dyarchy has been introduced in regard to subjects which are all internal, the subjects in the centre for which you suggest dyarchy are all external administrative subjects ?—That was my meaning.

34. Does not that make a difference between the working of dyarchy in the provinces and the suggested dyarchy in the centre ?—It does.

35. With reference to representation of Christians in the Legislative Assembly, may I know what your ideas are ? Would you ask for a separate electorate ?—For the Assembly ?

36. Yes.—We shall ask for it, because past experience shows that up to now we have not been able to return a single member.

37. During the last three periods, not a single Indian Christian has been returned to the Assembly by means of election ?—That is so.

38. So you want separate election for the Assembly also ?—Yes.

39. Mr. Hartshorn : Are you running candidates in the general electorate ?—There was one candidate, but he was defeated. That was Mr. Cotelingam. (Mr. Mariham) Mr. Lazarus also.

40. The Chairman (Colonel Lane-Fox) : Can you take part in the general electorate ?—(Mr. Udeyar) For the Assembly we have not got a separate electorate.

41. You cannot take part in the general electorate for the Local Council ?—No, not for the Local Council.

42. Mr. Thomas : In fact the general impression was that Mr. Chakkarai Chetty, who also stood for election, would have been returned if he had not been a Christian ?—(Rao Bahadur Pannirselvam) One of the arguments against his election was that he was a Christian.

43. In the Local Council—in the present Council and also in the last Council—you had five members returned and two Indian Christian members nominated ?—Yes.

44. And supposing the number of candidates for general constituencies is increased by 50 per cent., you also would expect that 50 per cent. increase to be given to Christian representation ?—Yes, especially because if nomination goes we lose these one or two Indian Christians who are nominated now. Therefore the number is put down as 10 in the Memorandum.

45. The Chairman was saying that you suggest that in the proposed reforms the official element should be abolished, that there should be no nomination of officials ?—Not exactly abolished ; very much reduced.

46. May I suggest to you that the presence of the nominated officials may be looked upon as a sort of influence which tends towards holding the scales even between the various communities ?—I do not know whether their presence actually contributes to that effect.

47. So you think that so far as the position of the Christian minorities in the Council is concerned, the abolition of the official element would not make any difference ?—I do not think it would make much difference.

48. With reference to the Services, are you satisfied ? Do you know the proportion which is allotted to the Indian Christians in Government service according to the Government orders ?—According to the new Government order, I am sorry to find that Indian Christians are bracketed with Anglo-Indians. So my contention is that Indian Christians should be regarded as belonging to a distinct community. Indian Christians should continue to be regarded as a distinct community as hitherto, and should not be merged with Anglo-Indians, who certainly form a different community.

The proportion also ought to be more satisfactory.

49. The Chairman asked you whether you were agreeable to a division of the constituencies, each constituency returning a Protestant and a Catholic. May I ask you whether that course will not promote harmony between these two great communities ?—Yes, an agreement on these lines—if it is not exactly half and half, very nearly half and half, say, 6 and or 5 and 4—will make for harmony.

50. Who is to make the agreement ?—Government itself may divide these districts or form these constituencies in such a way as to see that in the usual course this number is elected.

51. I am suggesting to you that according to your suggestion certain constituencies will always return Protestants, and certain constituencies always Catholics. I suggest to you whether a better course would not be for each constituency to return both a Catholic and a Protestant, which may lead to the Catholic section being interested in the Protestants, and vice versa. Each constituency will then feel that it is represented not only by a Catholic but also by a Protestant.—Is it practicable ? Is it feasible ? I think it will be as difficult to work it as reservation of seats in the case of minorities. So the better arrangement would be for these constituencies to be so formed as to be able to return a certain number of Catholics and a certain number of Protestants. If that is not workable, then the old kind of arrangement, a sort of domestic arrangement, may be entered into by these communities for the sake of harmony and peace.

Deputation from the Christian Depressed Classes.†

The deputation consisted of :—

Mr. S. M. GNANAPRAKASAM, B.A., B.L., Vakil, Saidapet, (Spokesman).

Rao Sahib M. R. MAHIMAI DOSS, Retired Deputy Presidency Post Master and Honorary Presidency Magistrate, Madras.

Mr. G. DAVID, Proprietor, the Hotel Mercantile, Egmore, Madras.

Mr. C. V. THOMAS, Contractor, Messrs. Mothavez & Co., Madras.

Mr. P. M. GOPALAKRISHNAN, Secretary for Economic Service, American Arcot Mission, Katpadi.

Mr. F. M. LOUIS, Teacher, Saint Xavier's St., Dindigul.

Mr. S. A. S. THANGAMUTHU, General Secretary, The South Indian Oppressed Classes Adi Dravida Union, Chingleput.

52. Colonel Lane-Fox : I understand that your chief difficulty is that, though you are Christians, you still suffer very largely from the disabilities of the Depressed Classes ?—Yes, sir.

53. That you do not find your position as Christians has improved it in any way ?—No, sir.

54. And that you are really not in any better position than the Hindu Depressed Classes, and you say that no Christian can hope to stand for a general electorate ?—Yes.*

55. What do you actually suggest as a remedy for that ?—The chief remedy is that we should be given equal privileges with the Hindu Depressed Classes ; that is, the present Hindu Depressed Classes are at present enjoying certain privileges, and if these privileges are extended to us also, our position will really improve, because we are living side by side with the Hindu Depressed Classes. Though we have been converted to Christianity, yet we live in places where these Hindu Depressed Classes also live side by side as neighbours, and even under the same roof members of the same family belong to Hinduism and also to Christianity.

56. Do you mean to say that there should be representation to the Christian Depressed Classes separately and specially in addition to what is given to the Hindu Depressed Classes ?—Yes ; as soon as we become Christians, the so-called caste Christians also oppress us ; they do not want to treat us as brother Christians, as members of the same religion.

57 You say that the caste distinction goes on even in the churches ?—Yes, sir.

58. Does that obtain in an acute form ?—Yes, sir, in an acute form. We are treated as untouchables by Christians themselves.

59. Do you mean to say that in a Christian school your children will be denied access ?—Yes, in such Christian schools where there are caste Christians also. There are no doubt certain elementary schools meant only for the Depressed Class Christians, but where there is a commingling of both caste Christians and non-caste Christians, there there is oppression and seclusion.

60. I think what you are asking for is special representation for yourself. Is that so ?—Our interests must be safeguarded.

61. Do you ask for special representation on the local Councils ?—Our grievances must be represented there and the method we suggest is this, that is the communal electorate which is existing now will not solve our problem.

Sir Hari Singh Gour : What they want is that they should be asked to vote in the general electorate and that their representative should be nominated to the Council.

62. Colonel Lane-Fox (from the Chair) : You say you wish to see the end of the communal Christian electorate so that you may have a vote in the general electorate, on the ground that in that case your weight of numbers will be felt and that those whom you elect will feel it their duty to look after your interest ?—Yes.*

63. At the present moment you are only a small party in the general Christian community, and you feel that you do not get your interests looked after as they should be ?—*Yes, in the case of the general electorate our grievances will be better represented.

64. You say, at page 339 : " We are thus against " this communal Christian electorate which has " created only an artificial Christian community and " concealed the yawning gulf of our distress under a " deceptive layer of 'Christian' body-politic " ; and you say, lower down : " We have mentioned " before how the dependence of caste-men on the " votes of the Depressed Classes forces the former to " seek the latter, study their conditions and alleviate " their distress ; and when the majority party in the " legislature furnishes the Government of the day " with the Transferred Half of the executive, the " men in power do not forget that they owe their " position to the votes of the Depressed Classes also, " and initiate effective measures themselves or " respond quickly to the appeals of the leaders of " the Depressed Classes for relief and redress." Anyhow, that is your ground for wishing to do away with the present communal Christian electorate and take part in the ordinary general electorates ? —Yes.

* Vide Appendix.

† In this case the Memorandum is printed after the evidence, on pp. 337–340.

65. In addition to that, you still wish to have a nominated seat ?—Yes.

66. As a matter of fact, if you have the power to vote in the general electorate, what sort of proportion of votes would the present franchise give you ; a large number of votes ?—The present franchise may not give us the same number of voters, because the electors being illiterate do not know how to exercise their rights.

67. You do not suggest a lowering of the franchise, do you ?—As it is, it is all right.

68. Mr. Cadogan : You belong to the Indian Christian electorate, and you have got a right to vote for a candidate in that electorate to represent your cause. But you say, on page 339 : " The few " Christian representatives who snatched our votes " for seats in the legislatures were lost in the vortex " of the Council politics and diffused themselves " almost unrecognised in the several parties with " little influence on the majorities." It is a general complaint, therefore, and we might leave it there. All the same your interest is there ; but I take it that your contention is that even those Christians whom you elect do not represent your cause, but that they represent only the high-class Christians ; is that so ?—Yes, sir.

69. Sir A. P. Patro : Your representation is that you are in the same position as the Hindu untouchables and, therefore, you want to be included among the Hindu untouchables in order that you may have proper representation ; is that so ?—Not as Hindu untouchables, but as Depressed Classes.

70. You want still to be treated as Depressed ? —Not to be treated as Depressed, but to be given the same privileges as the Depressed Classes have.

71. You want to have the same rights and concessions as are given to the Depressed Classes, though you have become converts to Christianity ; that is your position ?—Yes.

72. Mr. Siva Rao : You say, on page 337, that you form sixty per cent. of the Indian Christians of the Presidency. Do you represent the same voting strength ?—No.

73. In the communal electorate now, what is the percentage of your voting strength ?—One-fourth or so.

74. What will be your voting strength if you are included in the general electorate along with the Hindu Depressed Classes ? You think you would be more ?—No.*

75. Then how do you make your influence felt in the general electorate ?—When the candidates come for our votes we can have some influence over them and they, being in a position to form the majority in the Council, will voice forth our grievances also.

76. Cannot you have the same influence over your brother Christian representatives ?—Four out of the five representatives in the Council now belong to the caste Christians.*

77. How many are nominated from the Christian Depressed Classes ?—No one.

78. In the present Council ?—None.

Mr. Daniel Thomas : Dr. Premayya ?

79. Mr. Siva Rao : Your request seems to be that you should be classed along with the Hindu Depressed Classes, and you claim a certain proportion of the nominated seats which are now available for the Depressed Classes. What proportion do you claim out of the 10 which are now available for the Depressed Classes ?—One-fifth or one-sixth.*

80. Mr. Siva Raj : Do you want to continue still in the Indian Christian electorate even if you are given the right to vote in the separate electorate for the Depressed Classes or even in the general electorate ?—How can there be Christian electorate then ?

81. You now form part of the Christian electorate ?—Yes.

82. You want to vote in both places ?—No.

83. Do you not think that that will weaken the case of the Indian Christians that they want a greater number of seats on the ground of population and so on ?—That is their look-out. We are prepared to merge in the general electorate. Let them stand by themselves. That deputation does not represent us.

84. I am not opposed to your interests at all, but the real position will come to this. If you are treated as Depressed Classes it will be practically substituting the Government in the place of the missionaries which have hitherto been rendering what little help they could to you ?—The Government are bound to help us because we are the subjects of Government.

85. Do you not think that the Hindu Depressed Classes still feel that they would rather have all these disabilities continue rather than become Christians ?—Religion has nothing to do, because religion has not improved matters. In the name of religion everything has been mismanaged or misunderstood. Therefore religion is not the criterion.

86. Do you not think that literacy amongst the Christian Depressed Classes is much better than it is amongst the Hindu Depressed Classes ?—A little better. It is among the caste-Christians.

87. If you are included among the Hindu Depressed Classes, what will be your percentage to the total Hindu Depressed Class population ?—One-sixth, that is about one million.

88. Mr. Thomas : Your position is, so far as I understand, this : The Government allows certain privileges to the Hindu Depressed Classes, and your economic condition being practically the same as that of the Hindu Depressed Classes you claim the same concessions and privileges which are shown to the Hindu Depressed Classes ?—Yes.

89. Do you know that in the Council the Christian representatives whom you want to disown have been fighting for the Christian Depressed Classes also, and urging that they should be given the same advantages as are given to the Hindu Depressed Classes ?—They may be fighting. There has been opposition from among the Hindu Depressed Class leaders.

90. But so far as the Christian representatives in the Council are concerned, they have been pressing on the Government that the Christian Depressed Classes should be given the same concessions as are being given to the Hindu Depressed Classes because of their economic backwardness ; are you aware of that ?—A few of them may do so.

91. Some effort is being made by them ?—A few have spoken, no doubt ; I cannot deny it.

92. Of the five seats which are reserved for the Christians in the Madras Presidency, the seat in the Northern districts is held by one who comes from the Christian Depressed Classes ?—We have come to know that he is a member of the Depressed Class.

93. Though he belongs to the Christian Depressed Class you are not in touch with him ?—His influence is not felt.

94. Even a Christian Depressed Class member does not represent you ?—At times.

95. That is a matter which nobody can help ? —That is because of the fear which exists in a man by exposing himself as a Christian or as a Depressed Class man. Very often there is the desire to conceal one's self.

96. Even in the last Council the representative elected by the Northern districts constituency was a Depressed Class Christian, Mr. J. D. Samuel ?—We have come to know that he is a Depressed Class Christian.

97. Even though in the last Council and in the present Council there were Depressed Class Christians they have done nothing for you ?—Not sufficiently.

98. Apart from this you are not aware that members from the Depressed Class Christians have been nominated both in the last Council and in the present Council ?—Dr. Premayya.

* Vide Appendix.

99. You are not aware of anybody else ?—Mr. Vandanam.

100. He was nominated in the last Council ?—Yes.

101. With reference to your position that you want to take your place in the general electorate you have just now said that your voting strength in the Christian electorate would be about 24 per cent. Assuming it is so what do you think will be your voting strength in the general electorate. Would it be one in 400 ?—The same number will be there.

102. What is the proportion ?—Let it be nothing ; but we will have the influence upon the majority.

103. So you say that your present influence on the Christian community, though you hold one-fourth of the franchise, is nothing and therefore you will go to another electorate where you will be 1 in 400 ?—Our influence will be greater there, because there we will be recognised.

104. With reference to education, the attendance of the Depressed Class Christians is opposed in Hindu schools ?—Yes.

105. So that practically what education your community possess has come from the mission schools ?—There are very few highly educated men in our community.

106. Whatever education you now possess comes from the mission schools ?—From some of them.

107. From which district do you come ?—Tinnevelly.

108. Is there any mission school in that district in which the Depressed Class as such is not admitted ? —It is treated as untouchables.

109. Can you point out any mission school in the Tinnevelly district in which a Depressed Class man is not admitted ?—He is admitted, but is treated very badly.

110. The treatment depends upon the individual teacher who is there.—Not on the individual teacher but on the general policy of the Institution. (Mr. Gopalakrishnan) The conditions seem to vary between the Protestant Christians and the Roman Catholic Christians. Conditions are not so bad in the Protestant Churches as they are in the Roman Catholic Churches. The Protestant Christians are treated better even in the villages ; that is though the caste system still prevails. Conditions are not so bad in most of our districts.

111. You know Mr. John, who represents the Northern districts constituency. He is a Depressed Class man ?—(Mr. Gnanaprakasam) Yes.

112. He holds the position of a Council secretary in the present Council ?—Yes.

113. Do you think that you get the same treatment from a fellow Hindu casteman as you get from your fellow Christians ?—I think our fellow Christians also treat us equally badly.*

114. Is it in the matter of social amenities or in the case of legal rights such as the admission into schools and so on ?—I cannot generalise.

115. You say there are individual cases ?—Yes, in which we are treated as untouchables by our own Christians.*

116. You know there are certain castes just above the untouchables ?—We are untouchables and every body else is above us.

117. You admit that there is a caste just above ? —There may be.

118. Are they experiencing the same disadvantages as you experience from the class above them ?—It may be from the higher rungs ; I am not an authority on that.

119. Sir Arthur Froom : There are now five seats for the Indian Christians in the Legislative Council ?—Yes.

120. You never succeeded in securing a seat for the Christian Depressed Classes ?—With regard to the Andhra districts constituency Mr. John is returned as a Depressed Class candidate. He has been successful because a majority of the voters there belong to the same community. That is not the case in the South. The other four seats which are in the Tamil districts are contested by the caste-Christians and they succeed and we have no hope at all there.

121. You have now secured one seat ?—Yes, and that is in the Andhra districts.

122. Your idea is to do away with the separate electorate and join the electorate of the general constituency ?—Yes, we wish to be merged in the general electorate.

123. The caste-Christians will be included too in the general electorate ?—They will have equal privileges if they are also merged.*

124. The Indian Christian cannot vote in a general electorate ?—Yes, he cannot.

125. You do not want a separate electorate either along with caste Christians or as Depressed Classes ?—Not at all. In certain places where the converts are exclusively from the Depressed Classes they are treated as Depressed Classes ; and where there has been conversion from the caste Hindus they are treated as caste people only.

126. An Indian Christian is disqualified from being a voter on the electoral roll in the general constituency, is that not so ?—Yes, till now, certainly.

127. The Chairman : (Colonel Lane-Fox) You want to do away with the separate Christian electoral roll ?—Our prayer is that.

128. Sir Arthur Froom : Christian Depressed Class men are being nominated by Government ?—There is only one now.

129. So, one is elected and one nominated ?—Yes.

130. You have got two seats in the Council ?—Yes.

131. And you want more ?—Yes, but not under the present system.

APPENDIX.

Further elucidation of the evidence of the Christian Depressed Classes supplied by them after reading the record of evidence.

54. The answer in the affirmative would be correct if the question would stand thus :—And that you are really not . . . and you say no Depressed Class Christian can hope to stand for election ?

62. The answer in the affirmative would be correct if the question would stand without the words, " That in that case your weight of numbers will be " felt, and."

63. The answer in the affirmative would apply only to the second half of the question which runs, " and you feel that you do not get your interests " looked after as they should be ? " To the first half of the question which runs, " At the present moment " you are only a small party in the general Christian " community." The answer should have been : " We form 60 per cent. of the general Christian " Community," unless the question meant that by being included in the general Christian community we form a small party as against the general Hindu community.

74. The answer in the negative would be correct if the voting strength of Christian Depressed Classes alone was referred to. But it goes without saying that when we are given to vote in the general electorate, the strength of the Depressed Classes as a whole gets augmented by Christian and Hindu Depressed Classes joining hands and voting as one body as against the present disconnection owing to separate Christian communal electorate.

76. The answer would be complete with the addition, " The five representatives in the Council " are a negligible minority as against the huge " Hindu majority who now watch the interest of the " Hindu Depressed Classes.

79. The answer " One-fifth or one-sixth " would be correct if it referred to the proportion of the numerical strength of the Christian Depressed Classes to that of the Hindu Depressed Classes. But the proportion of nominated seats which the Christian Depressed Classes claim out of the ten now available for the Depressed Classes would be one-fifth or three-tenths.

113. In the answer I mean by "fellow Christians" caste Christians, and the answer presumes treatment accorded to us by both caste Hindus and caste Christians.

115. In the answer "by our own Christians" I mean caste Christians.

123. The answer is not complete. The words "with their own caste Hindu Brethren" are omitted after the word "privileges" and the whole answer must run thus:—"They will have equal privileges with their own caste Hindu Brethren if they are also "merged."

Memorandum submitted by the Christian Depressed Classes of South India.

We, the Depressed Class Christians of South India, take this opportunity to express our unstinted loyalty and devotion to the British throne and abiding trust in the benefits of British rule in India. We are proud of the fact that thousands and thousands of our men (Christian Depressed Classes) have served the cause of the King-Emperor in many of the wars of the Empire and have shed their blood for the victory of British arms. We note with particular gratification that most of the sepoys in the regiments of the Carnatic have been drawn from our ranks.

We offer a wholehearted support and welcome to the Royal Commission on Indian Reforms headed by that large-minded Liberal Statesman, Sir John Simon, and thank His Majesty the King-Emperor for having so graciously granted us the opportunity to represent the grievances and disabilities of particularly backward and oppressed Communities like ourselves.

We are by religion Christians, both Roman Catholic and Protestant. Of the total population of Indian Christians of the Presidency the converts from the Depressed Classes form about sixty per cent. When the Christian religion was preached in our lands, we, the Pallas, Pariahs, Malas, Madigas, etc., embraced Christianity. But others of our stock and origin were not converted and they are known to be the Hindu Depressed Classes, being all Hindus or adherents to the Hindus in religion.

In spite, however, of our Christian religion which teaches as fundamental truths the equality of man and man before God, the necessity of charity and love for neighbour and mutual sympathy and forbearance, we, the large number of Depressed Class converts remain in the same social condition as the Hindu Depressed Classes. Through the operation of several factors, the more important of them being the strong caste-retaining Hindu mentality of the converts to Christianity, and the indifference, powerlessness and apathy of the missionaries, we remain to-day what we were before we became Christians—untouchables—degraded by the laws of social position obtaining in the land, rejected by Caste-Christians, despised by Caste-Hindus and excluded by our own Hindu Depressed Class brethren.

The small proportion of the Christians of South India, whose representatives are found in the Legislative Council, say, in Madras, are Caste-Christians, a term which sounds a contradiction in terms, but which, unfortunately, is the correct and accepted description of high-caste converts from Hinduism, who retain all the rigour and exclusiveness of caste. Particularly in the mofussil parts and the villages, they who ought to be our fellow-Christians follow all the orthodox severity and unreason of caste exclusion; they damn us as "Panchama or Pariah" and ignore our Christian claims and in the fulness of their affluence, power, prestige and position exclude us poorer Christians from society, deny us the use of public wells and streets and rigorously segregate us to cheries and slums where we drag on a miserable existence along with the Hindu Depressed Classes. Frequent outbursts of anti-Panchama activity are the scandal of the South Indian Christian life, and the least attempt on our part to better our lot, forward our progress and assert our elementary rights calls down the wrath and fury of every man—official and non-official—Christian or Hindu, who claims a foolish superiority of birth. Denying the very foundations of Christianity, contrary to all love and charity and brotherhood, our "fellow-Christians" treat us even in the churches as untouchable and unapproachable, and relegate us to separate accommodation removed from their precincts and barricade their portions by means of iron rails and walls and fencings. There are several such churches.

In the matter of reception of the sacraments, a most ridiculous segregation is practised to avoid pollution; our claims to educate our children and train them for life are ruthlessly denied and through sheer prejudice our children are denied access to schools, convents, hostels, boarding-houses, or if admitted assigned an ignominious separate accommodation. Tracing his descent from high caste Hindu progenitors the Caste-Christian looks for social status and position and finds favour in the eyes of his fellow caste-men, the Hindus. He treats the Depressed Class Christians in the same way as the Hindu Depressed Classes are treated by the Hindu caste people.

Our people find their lodgings in "paracheries," despicable slums, full of hovels and huts, the glaring signs of poverty and distress accentuated by social tyranny. These cheries are scattered all over in the City of Madras, as well as in the mofussil towns and villages all over South India. We live with our non-Christian brethren (Hindu Depressed Classes) while the Caste-Christians live in localities where Caste-Hindus are, or in isolated quarters far away from the paracheries, and have nothing to do with us. There are, for instance, more than thirty-five cheries in the City of Madras alone, and about fifty-five in Trichinopoly town, where, under the same roof in most cases, and in closest neighbourhood the Depressed Classes—Christian and non-Christian—live in unity and sympathy, and have so lived for centuries together; and they join as a homogeneous whole, in weal and woe, and share one another's joys and sorrows, being more often than not, related by ties of blood.

In spite, therefore, of our Christianity, we are refused admission into the social fold of the Christians by those who call themselves Caste-Christians, and owing to our birth and origin are treated as untouchable Panchamas, lowest in the social ladder, less worthy of their attention and consideration than the very dog or the cat. We have thus everything in common with the Hindu Depressed Classes and nothing at all, except religion, with the caste-retaining Christians, with whom we are to all intents and purposes associated in political and administrative nomenclature.

While, however, the Hindu Depressed Classes have found favour with the Government of Madras, so much so that their economic and social conditions are being bettered day by day in various ways, by such measures as free education, liberal scholarships to children, hostel accommodations, house sites, grant of lands, etc., and of particular importance, separate political representation in Councils by nomination to Legislatures, Educational bodies, the Senate, District and Taluk Boards, Municipalities, etc., the Depressed Class Christians have been most pathetically neglected, ignored and forgotten for no fault of theirs. The glaring abuses of a social tyranny that is particularly horrible in its working are as much a feature of our lives as those of our Hindu Depressed Class brethren. We suffer from the same disadvantages, degradations, harassing restrictions on our progress as the Hindu Depressed Classes; yet by an anomaly that is painfully pressing upon us, on the one hand the Adi-Dravida representatives in the legislatures and the local bodies do not recognise our claims but ignore us, forgetting that we are their kith and kin and have been so for centuries together, and the Indian Christian representatives on the other, ignore their co-religionists completely and dance to the tune of a caste-ridden electorate which looks with unholy indignation upon any attempt to raise our low position.

The condition of the Depressed Class Christians was not properly gone into at the time of the introduction of the Reforms, through the agency of persons who on the one hand tried to conceal the sores in a supposed united Christian body-politic and on the other attempted to throw us into an obscurity out of which they might make profit; the result was that without our knowledge or consent, we have become merged in the Indian Christian body-politic of Southern India to be subservient to the wishes of Caste-Christians who have no love for us, and to help them with our votes for seats in the Council.

The reasons for the complete lack of Government support to our case, in spite of our numbers, in spite of the glaring abuses and wickedness of the Hindu social system which has lost none of its influence upon us, though Christians, are mainly three.

In the first place it is presumed that we are all Christians, practising a humanising religion which preaches equality and charity and love, that we have been united in common fellowship by bonds of religion with Christians of higher castes, and that we have a Communal electorate which gives us our representatives in the Councils.

A second reason for the public ignorance of our conditions has been the studied attempts of the leaders of the Hindu Depressed Classes to have us excluded from the privileges that they might get from the Government. In spite of the fact that several organisations of the Depressed Classes especially at the outset were largely initiated and supported by leaders of Christian Depressed Classes, the leaders of the Hindu Depressed Classes now argue that we are Christians and should not therefore be admitted to the privileges that they derive from Government help. However, there have been two notable exceptions to this in Rao Sahib M.C. Madurai Pillai, and Mr. R. Veerian, ex-M. L. C. The arguments of the Hindu Depressed Class leaders that Christian Depressed Classes are not entitled to equal privileges and concessions are based on prejudice, envy, personal motives and supreme ignorance of social conditions. To say that because of a change in religion we have become socially and materially important reveals their utter ignorance of our condition. Religion cannot be the criterion or condition of progress, and in our case Christianity has not unfortunately been effective in raising our social or material position. It is the social tradition that tells, and in the case of the converts to Christianity, the social tradition of a non-caste origin has not been removed; and therefore it is futile to quote a religious change to justify a denial of admission to protection and privilege. The Hindu Depressed Classes have been shown special protection because of their pitiable social condition, the result of age-long oppression, and not because of their Hinduism. To deny us those privileges which are justly ours owing to similar social distress, crying for relief, on the plea of our religion is illogical and bespeaks the prejudiced mind of selfish leaders.

Thirdly, it is commonly alleged against our claims that we are the recipients of the missionaries' generosity and are so much helped by missionary organisations that we have no reason to clamour for special protection. But we submit that though we cannot deny that we have gained from the missionary the light of faith and the treasure of Christian truth, the large numbers of our poor people have not otherwise benefited to any great extent. The missionary's doors are open to one and all; furthermore with the best of their intentions they are handicapped by limited resources and it would be injustice to expect them to better our condition in the material sphere to the extent our present depressed condition requires, or in the same measure the civil authority only can provide. Besides, it is a matter of option for the ecclesiastical authorities to help us materially, but never a matter of obligation. Moreover, the missionary's first idea is conversion and he spends his resources in helping the possible Hindu convert and not an old convert.

The most powerful argument against the alleged superior position that we are supposed to enjoy in Christian economy will be the actual condition of our people—Social, Economic, Educational, Political. As to social condition, we have already mentioned the fact of a social tyranny which is no less severe in our case than in that of our Hindu brethren. The idea of Christianity having wiped away these unreasonable rigid distinctions between man and man is not certainly borne out by facts and experience in the Christian tracts of the south, where it is more the rule than exception to find the anomaly of whole Christian congregation most vehemently prejudiced against all non-castemen and inextricably ridden by unreasoning caste observance and cast restrictions opposed to all laws human and divine; and the slightest movement on our part or that of the missionaries to alleviate the misery of the poor Depressed Classes brings down the unholy indignation of these Christian caste men with the inevitable corollaries of rioting, insubordination, unseemly pamphleteering and scandalous schisms. An instance in point is the recent Caste-Christian disturbances in Trichinopoly town where an organised attempt was made in 1926 by Caste-Christians to stand in the way of the uplift of the Depressed Classes and fight the non-caste men through the agency of unscrupulous instigation to riot, vilification, threat and assault.

Economic conditions are obviously very discouraging. Where a social tyranny grinds down the masses, economic elevation and self-assertion are impossible, except of course, through recourse to violent or revolutionary methods. The Hindu Depressed Classes have been suffering from the same social tyranny and the same economic distress, but through the benevolence of the Government and particularly the Labour Department are on the path to a better standard of life as a result of grant of darkhast lands and house sites, free education, and provision for more schools and increased number of scholarships to children; however we do not deny that they are far from a tolerably favourable social condition; yet in more respects than one we are worse than they. Too poor to educate their children even to the minimum, our parents send their children to serve in factories, farms or domestic establishments. The large masses of our men in general have not had the advantage of primary education. The number of our men who have had the benefit of a secondary and university education is shockingly meagre, considering the advancing tide of literacy in the higher classes. Our graduates are a mere handful; and they are not in a position to be of good to themselves or their kinsmen; and because of want of encouragement and the successful competition of their more affluent comrades of the higher castes, they have not risen to higher appointments in the State.

As to employment and profession, our people in the towns largely find their living in domestic and menial service, while the greater majority in the villages lead a servile existence as serfs under the tyranny of a land-owning aristocracy,—high caste, Christian or Hindu—which grinds down the helots into perpetual bondage. Of property in the shape of lands or houses or gardens our men have little or nothing; and not possessing the wherewithal to snatch a sufficient living for the day, they have of course not the savings that would ensure for them a more comfortable existence. The cruel spectre of a low-caste origin follows them wherever they venture and bars them from progress and prosperity. Economists lay down that no progress is possible where restrictions on mobility of labour are rigidly enforced, and our condition as labourers is a standing illustration of how a rigid artificial system can sap the springs of active labour and throw whole communities into poverty and degradation.

Politically, in the matter of representation under the Reforms, we seem to have fallen into an unpleasant anomaly and become the victims of a cruel mistake. We belong in the registers to the Indian Christian electorate and have the right of voting for candidates who can represent our cause. It would seem thus that we can elect our own representatives, but by inexorable custom and horrid caste no Christian Depressed Class candidate can stand for election to the Legislatures with any chance of success, because his caste-observing fellow-Christians would be horrified at the sight of a mere "Panchama" entertaining the idea of becoming a Councillor, an idea shocking to their notions of superiority of birth, privilege and power. Thus, with our votes given at every election, we have the disconcerting spectacle of Caste Indian Christian representatives occupying the seats of the Councils and with little or no exception voicing only the demands of their caste-brethren. We do not deny their intentions to ameliorate our condition, but from an analysis of the results of their representation up to now, they seem to have done little to raise our position or add one single item to the betterment of our condition. Frequently they are handicapped by party influences, personal antipathies and political commitments, nor can we fail to emphasise the strong influence of a caste-observing electorate upon the representation, an influence which is directly of no positive good to us, either in the shape of getting us grants of lands or scholarships, etc.

Our Hindu Depressed class brethren are in this respect in happier circumstances. They have the right of voting in the general constituency for Hindu representatives, which makes the Hindu candidates of the higher castes go and seek the votes of the Hindu Depressed Classes, study their condition, improve it and take effective legislative measures through their majority, in the Council for their uplift. This dependence of the majority community on the Hindu Depressed Classes, a fact which means that the voters have the benefits of those in power, because the latter had risen through the former, is a feature absent in our case, where the Caste-Christian candidate relies more upon the votes of his own brethren than on ours, since by property qualifications and social position they carry greater weight. The Caste-Christian representatives cannot recommend our case because of caste prejudice which however gets strengthened by the excuse that their strength when compared with that of the Hindus is next to nothing. To add to their strength in the Council, the Hindu Depressed Classes have had their number of nominated members in the local Council raised still further. Nominations of their own leaders to seats in the Councils have undoubtedly produced enormous advantages to the cause of the Hindu Depressed Classes. Their special interests have been given particular protection; their social importance has risen to an appreciable degree in the estimation of the higher castes. Their presence in the Legislatures themselves and in the several committees has given them a power and prestige which go a long way to the redress of their grievances and their elevation to the level of the caste people. By means of incessant interpellation, resolutions and bills aimed at the amelioration of their condition, the nominated leaders of the Hindu Depressed Classes have brought the question of their appalling distress vividly before the country and have successfully stirred the age-long oppressive social mind of the people. We have only to instance the facts of the personal activity of untiring leaders of the Depressed Classes, who armed with their authority as members of the legislatures have compelled the executive to remedy long-standing abuses such as the denial of the use of public wells, streets and other amenities to the Depressed Classes, the inaccessibility to public institutions such as post offices situated in caste quarters, the exclusion from schools, hostels, charitable institutions, etc., and forced the weight of legislation to bear upon the apathy of local bodies and boards and grant educational and other concessions and privileges.

We have in the above pages detailed, however inadequately, our conditions and compared them with those of our Hindu brethren, of the same origin. We beg respectfully to submit our needs and to suggest the remedies that will relieve our present unhappy situation.

The question of the Franchise and the representation in the legislatures affects us at least as much as it does any other minority community. We have detailed how, jumbled together with the Caste-Christian in a communal electorate, we are faced with the anomalous position of giving our votes and not getting their due—proper representation.

We are thus against this communal Christian electorate which has created only an artificial Christian community and concealed the yawning gulf of our distress under a deceptive layer of "Christian" body-politic.

Recently we are informed that the Hindu Depressed Class leaders have put forth a demand for "separate electorate" and universal suffrage for electing their own representatives; we are against these proposals, firstly, because we are sure a "separate electorate" produces merely the evils of a narrow communal electorate and loses hold of the influence on the majority especially the caste-men who then do not depend on our votes; nor are we prepared to assert that our political or other education is so advanced as to ensure the right understanding and practice of the methods of election and principle of honourable candidature. We are afraid, until a more progressive period, the gift of separate election along with universal suffrage will turn a danger in our hands and lead to the manœuvring of unscrupulous persons and the free play of agencies such as corruption, intimidation, vice and, worst of all, the election of unworthy men possessed with vainglory but incompetent to represent our cause. What we want, therefore, is vote in the general constituency, like the one the Hindu Depressed Classes have now, to elect caste Hindu members of the legislatures.

We have mentioned before how the dependence of caste-men on the votes of the Depressed Classes forces the former to seek the latter, study their conditions and alleviate their distress; and when the majority-party in the legislature furnishes the Government of the day with the Transferred Half of the executive, the men in power do not forget that they owe their position to the votes of the Depressed Classes also, and initiate effective measures themselves or respond quickly to the appeals of the leaders of the Depressed Classes for relief and redress.

It is this lack of contact with the general body of the electorate, a result of the narrow groove of a purely Christian communal representation, that has led to the complete submergence of our people, the Christian Depressed Classes, into sufferings and obscurity.

The few Christian representatives who snatched our votes for seats in the legislatures were lost in the vortex of the council politics and diffused themselves almost unrecognised in the several parties with little influence on the majorities.

This is the inevitable effect of our having nothing to do with the election of major communities who do not care for us and, not caring, do not know our condition, and knowledge, it goes without saying, is necessary for sympathy and relief. We, therefore, request you to give us the franchise in the common electorate to vote for Hindu or Indian leaders just as the Hindu Depressed Classes do. Our social importance will rise only in proportion to our hold on the majority community.

Secondly, in order that our interests detailed above may find adequate, informed expression in the legislatures, we require leaders of our own class to be nominated to the legislatures. As a protection of their special interests the Government very justly reserves certain seats to the Depressed Classes in the legislatures, but as pointed above our people are not represented, though our interests are identical with those of the Hindu Depressed Classes. The nominated leaders exclude our claims to protection out of motives already dealt with. We, therefore, submit that a few seats may be reserved for us in the legislatures, and leaders of our community fit to represent our case be nominated members. Nomination has, of course, its disadvantages, but we believe that in the present state of our political and social progress, as a transitional remedy at least, nomination is preferable to election within ourselves. Politically unorganised, socially backward, we believe that a system of election within ourselves will produce disruptive influences among ourselves and lead to suicidal rivalry, play of personal antipathies etc.

In other spheres our needs are easily told. Education as was shown above is at an absurdly low level among us, and it is a universal truth that education on proper lines is the panacea of all ills, especially social and economic. We, therefore, submit that our educational progress may be accelerated by the provision for more schools and free grant of scholarships to our children, the remission of exacting fees for examinations and tests. We believe that practical education, technical studies, and industrial classes will lift us up to a high level through successful business employment and engagement in trades, and we request that facilities may be afforded us, as for the Hindu Depressed Classes, for the admission of our children to industrial and technical institutes, and grant of technical scholarships and stipends. The attraction to education is proportioned to the possible benefits at the end of the course, and the Government has it in its power to give special support to the graduates and other members of the community by appointing them to high posts. The fiat of the Government obliterates social distinctions and it is obvious that an official from the Depressed Classes, occupying a responsible position through his merits and through the very necessary encouragement of Government, commands the respect and attention of his subordinates of a higher caste. Much can the Government thus do to raise the influence of the few graduates we have now, and may have in future, by giving them high appointments which are a necessity since they are of good to the man concerned and much more to the large number of helpless people scattered in the province, and by reasonable exemption from rules regarding age, and other restrictive conditions for competitive examinations and official service.

Economic measures which the poor masses need to raise their standard of life are too numerous to mention, and we indicate only a few such as the grant of lands to our people for cultivation, house-sites, redemption from indebtedness through advantageous and speedy loans, inclusion of our men in the Co-operative machinery—Co-operative Societies, banks, etc., encouragement of thrift in our midst through profitable return to our deposits. It is needless to dwell upon these and other measures which are of pressing necessity to us, as we feel that proper nominees from our leaders would from time to time suggest to the Government the ways and means to improve our economic lot. In this connection we submit that proper representatives from our community are necessary in such assemblies as Taluq and District Boards, Municipalities, Educational Councils, etc., for the self same reasons that the Hindu Depressed Classes ascribe for their representation, and it will be easy to understand how proper representation will lead to eventual redress of grievances and satisfaction of our claims.

We are sure that much of the venom of Caste-Christians will be lost when we, the Depressed Classes, make efforts through the support and active patronage of Government to improve our educational position and augment our economic resources and thus knock the fangs off social tyranny. And when the voice of our representatives in the legislatures and municipal bodies, added to the efforts of the parties in the council who may have profited by our votes, cries out for legislation and remedial proposals to remove abuses and restore us our rights, our interests might need no more special protection.

We repeat our heartfelt affection for the British Crown and the person of His Imperial Majesty and our trust in the benevolence of British administration.

This memorandum is submitted to the Indian Statutory Commission on behalf of the Christian Depressed Classes of South India. Some of the leaders of these people were granted an interview by the Commission in Madras. If and when oral evidence will be necessary, Mr. S. M. Gnanaprakasam, B.A., B.L., Vakil, Little Mount, Saidapet P.O., Madras, will be prepared to submit it. He was one of the spokesmen in the Deputation to the Commission in Madras.

On behalf of the said Depressed Class Christians the undersigned have been authorised to submit this Memorandum.

The Rt. Rev. BISHOP AZARIAH, Bishop of Dornakal, called and examined.

132. The Chairman (Colonel Lane-Fox) : We are very much obliged to you. I think the Commission would particularly like to know how much truth there really is in this idea of caste distinctions in your church. It would be very interesting if you just made a broad statement.—That a distinction is made in church life and in school conditions among Christians themselves is true only to a very limited extent. It is limited to certain areas and certain churches. I think the spokesman of the last deputation belongs to the Roman Church, and that is the church which for some reason or other has for all these centuries been indifferent to the question of abolishing caste in the church. They are taking steps now. In that community the non-caste converts have disabilities in their church life and principally, as he says, in school and educational matters also. But apart from this exception, the statements in the first page or two are not true of most protestant missions and most areas, either in the Tamil or in the Telugu country. In the Telugu country it is absolutely nil. The present member for the Andhra Christian constituency is representative of the Depressed Class converts, and so have been his predecessors ever since the Legislative Council was formed. There are very many of our pastors and some of our teachers who have been nominated to taluk boards and district boards. So that, that sort of distinction that has been made out here is not at all true of the Andhra area, nor is it true of most Tamil areas, except perhaps in the Roman Church areas, and perhaps to a limited extent in Lutheran Churches. Those are the two bodies where these distinctions are made. But if I may go on to make my statement, it is true on the other hand that the caste system being what it is, at least in working out certain provisions made by Government to help the labouring classes, Christians who come from the depressed classes have been very often neglected both in the Andhra area and in the other areas. In my own personal experience, I have been again and again appealed to by my own people in my diocese, because, though the attitude of the Government is neutrality in religion, yet owing perhaps to the religious prejudice of the men who are called upon to work out the principles, religion has very often been a disadvantage in getting for Christian Depressed Classes, the facilities afforded by Government for the Depressed Classes as such. I remember particularly the instance of a man very high up in office telling a deputation of Christian panchamas that he could only help non-Christian panchama men, and that if they would change their religion he would help them. That is purely religious prejudice, not caste. This is one of the disabilities that Christians undergo because of religious prejudice. I do not know what the remedy is. But what I feel is, the principle of religious neutrality on the part of the Government must be worked out and strictly adhered to by all the officials. That leads me to speak of the Labour Department. The Labour Department ought to help all labour, whether they are Christian, Hindu or Muhammadan. Labour officers are appointed to take special care of all out-caste people, and very many things they do for all alike; but in education, (as one representative of the missionary societies has already stated before another Commission) this department has been neglecting the Christian community. I think the Christian people and the missionary agencies desire that all such disabilities should be removed.

133. The Chairman (Colonel Lane-Fox): That is a ground for giving them representation in the council ?—I do not know whether that will remedy the matter I have mentioned.

134. If there is a question of one community being neglected that is a reason why it should be given full representation in any representative body ? —Yes. Whether it will provide the remedy or not I do not know. But I think in framing any constitution the princple of religious neutrality, of the Government and its officers being impartial in their administration, ought to be emphasised. I do not at the present moment speak of representation at all.

135. Sir A. P. Patro: May I just explain ? There is a departmental rule that help and grant-in-aid should be given to the Depressed Classes or the backward classes, backward in the matter of education, and all these classes of people who are backward in education are classified in the educational rules for the purpose of free scholarships and grant-in-aid. The result is that the Christian community is classed as a very highly educated community, more educated than other classes. So as soon as a Depressed Class man becomes a convert, for educational purposes he is classified as belonging to a community or class which is highly educated. Therefore the preference which he would otherwise have as a depressed class man is lost to him.—That is what I mean.

136. The Christian community in this province is largely an educated community and it is classed as No. 1 in the rules and therefore as soon as he joins in this community and merges in it he loses that privilege or that concession which he would have received when he was a member of the backward community ?—Yes.

137. Rao Bahadur Rajah: But that is not the case now. The rules have been changed.

Mr. Thomas: Not in the Labour Department.

Rao Bahadur Rajah: Sir A. P. Patro referred to the educational rules. He quoted rules mentioned in the grant-in-aid code. It was true that Christians of Depressed Class origin were not given these concessions, but now the rules have been changed and a Government order has been issued that if a proper certificate is attached to show that he was a member of the Depressed Classes before becoming a Christian the concession would be allowed to him.—Not in the Labour Department. The Labour Department has in its hands over a thousand scholarships for technical and primary and secondary studies, and the Labour Department has the order of the Government that they have nothing to do with Christian Depressed Class people. That is the grievance.

138. Rao Bahadur Rajah: The point, sir, is this. The money voted for the Labour Department is voted for the untouchable classes and not for the Christians. That is the point.—Of course these people maintain, and I maintain, that religion should not become a disqualification. It is the social and economic condition that ought to determine it.

139. The Chairman (Colonel Lane-Fox): Therefore you ask for special grants for Christians ?—Not for Christians as such. In the Telugu country, for instance, during the last ten years hundreds and thousands of people have changed their religion from Hinduism to Christianity. Now, at least in the first or second generation, it is contended, and I believe justly, that these people ought not to be deprived of the privileges that they would have enjoyed if they had not changed their religion. The Government should not place a disadvantage on these people becuase they have changed their religion.

Sir A. P. Patro: Within the last ten years there has been what is called the mass movement in Christian work. Christian aid and Christian endeavour societies have been doing a great deal in the matter of improving the condition of some very depressed class peoples. This elevation work has been very beneficial to them, and the problem is whether they ought not to be treated as depressed classes still though they have changed their religion. They belong to the poorest labouring classes.

140. The Chairman (Colonel Lane-Fox): As depressed classes they had certain advantages. Now that they have become Christians they lose them ?—Yes. It is an administrative problem.

Sir A. P. Patro: It is an administrative problem which we began to consider two or three years back. Certain concessions were made, and I believe that is being considered again.

Mr. Thomas: The same disabilities applied in the Education Department also, but that has been cancelled as a result of agitation.

141. The Chairman (Colonel Lane-Fox): We are interested in this from a constitutional point of view, and therefore is there any point that you would like to bring before us by which we may alleviate the condition of the Depressed Classes ?—Another point is this. These people have been urging about Christian representation in the Council. I think opinion differs on that subject, but I am one of those who believe that the introduction of communal representation for Christians is not in the interest of either the Christian religion or the followers of the Christian religion.

142. There is a difference of opinion ?—Yes, there is a difference of opinion. Communal representation stereotypes a religious community as a distinct section of the nation, which it is not. I know that it has introduced a great amount of bitterness as between depressed classes and caste people, and between different denominations. From my experience of the Telugu country I would certainly urge that communal representation for Christians should go and that they should be merged in the general electorate with reservation of seats. I think reservation of seats is really a concession to the present conditions in India. I should not like even that.

143. But you wish to keep reservation of seats? —Yes, I should like that under the present conditions.

144. Will it not be possible to get some agreed arrangement between the Christian communities as to how these seats should be allotted?—Probably we shall divide along Catholic and non-Catholic lines.

145. That is inevitable?—Yes.

146. But you could do it?—Yes, we could do it among ourselves.

147. Mr. Thomas: You suggested that there should be reservation of seats for Christians. Is that because you expect that a general electorate would not return any Christians?—Not because I expect, but I think I foresee that in the general electorate probably they will not get even the five seats that are now allotted. I think we have got men who may be on the top in any one constituency or other, but I do not think we will get adequate representation simply by merging ourselves in the general electorate.

148. Are you sure of one at least?—I think so. It is, however, only an opinion.

149. If there are seats reserved, of course you realise that the number of non-Christian votes would be out of all proportion to the Christian votes?—Yes.

150. And you realise that there will be the danger of a man not supported by the community being returned by the strength of non-communal votes as against another who was supported by the community?—I quite foresee that. I think the Indian Christian Association have proposed some remedy for that. They want the community itself to put up a panel, from among whom elections will be made.

151. You want that safeguard so that a man who is not wanted by the community may not be returned by the constituency?—Yes.

152. You also realise that supposing five or six seats are allotted for the Christian community for the whole province one Christian candidate will have to canvass an area covering 3, 4 or 5 districts with a total electorate of something like 3 lakhs?—They do that now.

153. But the number of votes which a Christian candidate will have to canvass for an electoral area will be something like 3 lakhs?—Since Christians are fairly distributed all over the Presidency, certainly the local voters could be instructed and captured by the local Christian people who act on a candidate's behalf. I do not think there is much difficulty.

154. There should be a multiplicity of agents in every district?—There are people who can speak for the Christian nominees. So I do not think you can say that voters in a district may not know sufficiently to vote for a particular candidate.

Memorandum submitted by M. R. Ry. N. SRINIVASA ACHARYA, Avl., B.A., B.L., High Court Vakil, President, All-India Varnashrama Dharma Conference (1927) and Vice-President, All-India Brahmana Mahasabha, Madras.

Sir,

In pursuance of your notification, re enquiry into the Reforms, I have the honour to submit the following statement with reference to the matters notified in so far as they are concerned with orthodox Hindus.

2. The All-India Varnashrama Dharma Conference and the All-India Brahmana Mahasabha (which is but a phase of the former) are essentially spiritual and social movements of the orthodox Hindus, Brahmanas and Non-Brahmanas, who constitute the bulk of that community, aiming at their unity and advancement on the basis of their ancient religion. The current party politics is mainly run by persons saturated with notions and ambitions antagonistic to the long-cherished religious and social ideas and practices of the people at large whom they profess to represent in the Councils of the country, but whose opinions they really treat with indifference and often ruthlessly violate. The voice of the people is seldom heard in the Council when religious and social matters are sought to be legislated upon; and so appeal has to be made from time to time to the Executive Government to stay the hands of hasty and revolutionary legislations. I pray that my letter to you dated 22nd February, 1928, enclosing my communication as President of the All-India Varnashrama Dharma Conference forwarding its resolutions to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General of India and His Excellency the Governor of Madras, may be read along with this statement. The Conference requests the Parliament and your Commission that "having regard to the assurances of religious neutrality given by the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 which forms the bed-rock of the constitution and the permanency of the British Indian Government, any Constitution that may be framed now, shall be made with due regard to this fundamental principle," and that you "must not leave the ancient Hindu Religion, the Varnashrama Dharma, helpless to the views of persons belonging to varying and opposing creeds and religions." Further, "the Conference strongly disapproves of the interference of the legislature in matters relating to the socio-religious discipline (Achara) of the Hindus," such as marriage.

I invite your attention prominently to the following passage in Her Majesty's Proclamation :—

"We do strictly charge and enjoin all those who may be in authority to abstain from all interference with the religious beliefs or worship of our subjects on pain of our highest displeasure." The italics are mine. The word "all" includes those who come to power under the new Constitution through election and so a provision should be made in the Statute itself for enforcing strict obedience to this injunction and making the Executive Government responsible for its being carried out.

3. In this connection I may quote the following from Lord Meston's article in the January number of "The Asiatic Review" (Page 2) on the Statutory Commission. He says, "Behind and below all the stagey manœuvres of Swaraj is a demand for developing India on their own lines. Those who make the demand are a section of Indians trained in European ways, few in number, compared to the vast ignorant masses of the population, but with a wholly disproportionate power of swaying the proletariat. Their strength lies in the support of orthodox Hinduism, which is going through a period of revolt against Western dogmas."

This is quite true and applies to all phases of the present Indian politics, for they all aim at "Swaraj," their methods only varying.

4. The masses, however, are not quite ignorant, although Western democracy is yet new to them. Every village knows something of government. When any measure affecting their religion or social customs is brought forward, their spontaneous voices are loudly heard by government, though the press and the "elected" representative may not publish or heed them. For the rest, it is a fact that not a fair percentage of even the voters, themselves a drop in the population, yet realise the power of the vote or exercise the franchise with a consciousness of it or intend it to be felt on the representative or Government. Votes are still given as a matter of obligation, condescension and such considerations. Voters are approached only at the election and left alone thereafter. Political principles do not sway elections, which go mainly on personal grounds. There is no such thing as "the mandate" of the electorate; and the worst of the Council crises do not necessitate any "appeal to the country." The elected Council only furnishes opportunities for ambitious persons to secure office emoluments and patronage; and they hold on with Government help against the less fortunate, until obliged to go. The Council parties are divided mainly with an eye to ministerships and places of power for its adherents, or to wreck the ministry or obstruct Government. Changes in the ministry or "No-Confidence" motions relate to ministers as individuals rather than to their politics. For the rest, the working of the Reforms is utterly barren of result; and Government has to help ministers to remain in their places. Naturally, therefore, the political principles of the parties in the Council change according to circumstances, from rank hostility to unconditional subservience to Government. The cries, too, of "communal representation" are made only for offices and emoluments; but democratic politics as such is not different for different communities. The events of the Madras Council during the past eight years bear out all these and even more. The race after power and the element of obstruction have ignored the concerns, the wants, and the susceptibilities of the people on whose behalf "responsible Government" is to be evolved.

5. In this state of affairs one is tempted to ask for a return to the order of things before the Reforms. That, however, is not to be; and the world-changes cannot be ignored in India. A foreign government over a people of diverse religions and races cannot indefinitely manage as the circus-master does his menagerie of lions, tigers, horses, cows, sheep and monkeys, making them fraternise at lunch, staring at him, and at each other within the railed cage and under the show of his whip and the loaded guns of the attendants! The function is similar, but the methods must differ. The Government must be strong, impartial, and sympathetic; but the loving co-operation of the ruled through the improvement of their material prosperity and scrupulous regard for their religious susceptibilities, must also be secured, alike in their interests and that of the rulers. The changes to be introduced in the reforms should be based upon this fundamental principle.

6. In the above review, it is brought out that responsible government through ministers in the Provinces has failed; but that "responsibility" there must be, and free from communalism, which has brought on bitterness, antagonism and all their woes in an unprecedented degree among the peace-loving people of this Presidency. The virus of communal hatred is now being inoculated even in the school-going population by certain propagandists. To secure the end indicated herein, the following changes in the present constitution are, therefore, suggested. They are briefly as follow :—

I. PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT.

(a) Dyarchy as it now exists shall go.

(b) The Governor's cabinet shall consist only of members, five in number—two Europeans and three Indians recruited mainly from the elected Councils. An outsider also may sometimes be desirable. The present cabinet is needlessly overmanned.

(c) If among the Europeans the civilian would give room for a non-official elected member, the result is expected to be greatly advantageous.

(d) Of the Indian Members there may be ordinarily a Brahmana, a non-Brahmana and a Muhammadan. But this need not be an inviolable rule; for only the very best men fitted by integrity, ability and statesmanship should be appointed to this responsible position of administration. In the words of a Provincial Governor, recently reported, "judges are appointed to decide cases properly and not to represent communities."

(e) The system of ministers has already been shown to be unsatisfactory. Moreover, the best men have not been always secured on this basis and there is no justification for a top-heavy executive without necessity or adequate return.

(f) Responsibility to the people may be secured by marking out the subjects upon which the decision of the Council should be binding on the executive. The subjects not so marked shall be only a minimum, having regard to the exigencies of the State. If the member in charge of a portfolio is not willing to carry out such a decision, he shall have option to resign, as the late Sir K. Srinivasa Aiyengar did with reference to the Madras Irrigation Bill. If the Governor in Council considers that the decision of the Council in any matter is perverse and detrimental to the interests of the country, the Council may be dissolved, the Governor recording his reasons for the same.

If Indian conditions require special treatment in any matter, it is so pre-eminently in shaping the form of responsible government. Under the ancient Hindu policy the Council or the parishad who decided questions on the law (dharma) did not look up for any office or favour and so they commanded universal reverence and obedience.

II. The Provincial Council.

Communal representation means denial of democracy for all time, and perpetuation of differences and promotion of bitterness and unrest in the country. However, to satisfy such demands for the time being, and at the same time to help to develop union among the people and real self-government, it is necessary to have a bicameral system in the Provinces also. The Chambers may be named, the "Popular Assembly" and the "House of Representatives," respectively.

(a) The "Popular Assembly" shall consist only of elected members. All communities, including the Depressed at one end and the Europeans at the other, should freely compete in the same electorate. The franchise must be based upon property, tax, or rent-qualification, however small. Universal adult suffrage is unworkable and inexpedient. The electorate shall be a rural area, preferably a revenue division of the district, each division returning one member. Electoral divisions may be constituted for large cities, like Madras. A very small number of seats may be kept to be filled up by nominations of experts for any special legislation, when necessary, and by members of the Depressed Classes in case the general electorate does not return them, and not otherwise. It is desirable that the candidate must reside or have a place of residence within his constituency. Council parties should be encouraged to eschew communalism in toto and crystallise on sound political principles. It should be the duty of the elected members to confer with their constituencies periodically and thereby help the growth of "informed public opinion." Such a Council will bring into existence healthy public organs of diverse creeds on broad principles and exercise a healthy influence on the public in general. It will promote union and goodwill among the various classes of the people and towards government.

(b) To the "House of Representatives" may be credited all the virtues claimed for an Upper Chamber and the correction of possible wrongs to communities. "Communal," "Social," "Economic" and other particular interests may receive representation in it through special electorates. The franchise and the method of election may be the same as those for the present Legislative Council. The relationship between this and the "Popular Assembly" may be similar to that between the present Legislative Assembly and the Council of State.

(c) The members of the Cabinet shall be ex-officio members of both the Houses.

(d) The budget and the bills must pass in both the Councils, being first introduced in the "Popular Assembly." The Councils shall have power to alter or vary the several heads of the budgets.

(e) The power of Veto and certification of the Governor is to be retained in subjects not marked for the final decision of the Council; but they should be exercised only in cases of extreme necessity, the Governor assigning his reasons for his exercise of such powers.

(f) The oath or affirmation of allegiance by the members of the Councils shall include a declaration that they "Shall abstain from all interference with the religious beliefs or worship of any class of British subjects in India."

(g) In this scheme the points mentioned in question 4 of your notification practically do not arise.

III. Local Bodies.

It is surprising that after eight years of "popular government" the patronage of nomination to the District and Local bodies has not been given up altogether, although every party wants "Provincial Autonomy." It is, therefore, a matter of first importance to make the local bodies absolutely autonomous and elective, with powers to the Executive Government to interfere in the event of corruption, gross neglect or detriment to the public. The local administrative officials may ex-officio have a seat in these bodies. The Legislative Councils, of course, have their voice over them.

IV. The Central Government.

From the view-point of this statement, the important matter to be urged is that Dyarchy is absolutely untenable in the Central Government as desired in some quarters, as it might give rise to more undesirable results there than in the Provinces. In other respects the principles hereinbefore stated for Provincial Councils may pari passu apply to the Central Legislature. The classification of All-India and Provincial subjects, and also finance require revision in the light of past experience.

V. Courts and Judiciary.

The poison of communalism that has of late been allowed to spread in the recruitment to this most important branch of public service should be eradicated in toto. Upon the integrity of the courts, the internal safety of India depends. The morbid idea that Government is run to find appointments for the members of communities and in proportion to their population should be fought out with a firm hand. In such a calculation the British proportion would be nowhere. Direct recruitment to Dt. Judgeships is not desirable, except under extra-ordinary circumstances.

7. The other questions do not call for special representation from the standpoint of the bodies to which I belong. A separate statement will be submitted on "Education," when your notification is published.

8. In my communication referred to in paragraph 2 above, it is stated that the Conference over which I had the honour to preside, in December last, contained about 1,500 delegates of orthodox Hindus, Brahman and non-Brahman from all parts of the Madras Presidency and outside, and was thoroughly and truly representative of the people. I herein give the views that I gathered in the course of the elaborate proceedings of the Conference.

9. I beg to offer myself for oral examination by the Commission. If the Commission is to hear inclined, I shall give also names and particulars of other responsible and representative persons who would come forward as witnesses. For want of time I cannot append their list here.

10. If I be permitted, I venture to suggest that in view of the Legislatures' reticence to elect committees to co-operate with your Commission, you may require the Government to nominate a Committee of representative Indians outside, for the purpose. The Council parties and leaders do not necessarily mean the entire public opinion of India. The people in the main are very conservative, as already stated.

MADRAS.

2nd March, 1929.

PRESENT :

ALL THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION (EXCEPT LORD BURNHAM, COLONEL LANE-FOX AND MAJOR ATTLEE), OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE (EXCEPT MR. KIKABHAI PREMCHAND, SIR HARI SINGH GOUR, SARDAR SHIVDEV SINGH UBEROI AND RAO BAHADUR RAJAH), AND OF THE MADRAS PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE.

Deputation of Orthodox Brahmins.

The deputation consisted of :—

Mr. N. SRINIVASA ACHARYA, B.A., B.L., Advocate.

Dewan Bahadur V. R. KUPPUSWAMI AYYER, Avl., B.A., B.L., Retired District Judge, Mayavaram, Tanjore District.

Rao Bahadur T. M. NARASIMHA CHARLU, B.A., B.L., Advocate, formerly M.L.C., and President of the District Board, Cuddappah.

Mr. C. V. KRISHNA RAU, Landholder and formerly Municipal Chairman, Ongole, Guntur District.

Dewan Bahadur GOVINDA DOSS CHATHURBHUJA. DOSS, Merchant and formerly Sheriff of Madras.

Mr. A. SUBHA RAU, B.A., District Superintendent of Police, Triplicane, Madras.

Mr. N. SUBRAMANIA IYER, M.A., Retired Dewan Peishkar of Travancore, Mylapore, Madras.

1. The Chairman : We have read your document, which is an interesting one. If I follow rightly, you and your friends would be rightly described, would you not, as orthodox Brahmins ?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) Yes.

2. The first thing which you are anxious to insist on is religious freedom ?—Quite so.

3. And Government abstention from all interference in religious beliefs or worship ?—Yes.

4. A thing which is important for us as a constitutional conference is this. Do you think that there ought to be some statutory provision for that purpose? —Yes. (Dewan Bahadur Kuppuswami Ayyer) That is our object. Of course, such a neutrality is proclaimed in the Queen's Proclamation.

5. As you gentlemen appreciate, there is a difference between saying that a matter should be included in a Proclamation, where the Crown's representatives are enjoined to do this, and trying to put a provision about it into the Statute ?—Yes, that is so.

6. And I gather that your suggestion is that, if possible, something should be put in the Statute ? (Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) It must be made positive.

7. I will ask you a question about it in a minute. There is one difficulty. You say in page 343 of the Memorandum, paragraph 2, "A provision "should be made in the Statute itself for enforcing "strict obedience to this injunction," that is to say, abstaining from all interference with the religious beliefs or worship, "and making the Executive "Government responsible for its being carried out." Now I will put the difficulty, so that you may deal with it. It is no use putting words into a Statute unless people who think the Statute is being disregarded have some remedy, some means of enforcing it. Some people have tried to enact for some people that all men are equal. I dare say they are, but you do not get very much further by saying so, and the whole point is, it is no good putting a word into a Statute such as this particular provision is to be strictly observed, unless you have got some machinery—some sanction, as lawyers call it—to secure that it shall be observed, or to enable people who think it is being disregarded to make their complaint effective. Now, how do you think it should be done ?—What we mean by asking for the provision is this. It should be declared that the Council or the Government shall not have power to introduce legislation affecting our religious beliefs.

8. Let us suppose that is done. I can imagine a case where some people will think that the legislation does have that effect, and others will think that it does not. For instance, there is legislation promoted by some people which would raise the marriage age, or something of that sort. Now, some people may regard that—I do not know whether they do—as a religious matter ?—Many.

9. And some other people may regard it as not a religious matter, but as a social matter. Now, supposing there is dispute ?—(Mr. Subramania Iyer) Every person entitled to be called orthodox, and every Hindu, looks upon that as a sacrament ; otherwise he is not a Hindu. I am prepared to say that every person who looks upon marriage not as a sacrament is not a Hindu, just as a Christian who does not believe in Jesus and His revelation is not a Christian.

Sir A. P. Patro : But the orthodox Hindus do not allow a sacrament in the case of motherhood other than the Brahmins.

10. The Chairman: That is not the point, if you will allow me to say so. The point is not whether one set of people and another set of people deny and affirm it; the point is that there may be controversy on such a thing. Then who is to decide the controversy?—(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) Either the Governor or the Court.

11. Then that would mean, would it not, that you contemplate that if some Bill is introduced which, in the view of anybody in India, conflicts with his religious principles, not limiting the matter to orthodox Brahmins?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) Not limited.

12. Then he is to go to the law courts?—Yes; it is the only remedy.

13. I think you face the difficulty quite fairly; but it is a difficulty, you know. Anyhow, I understand what you say, and as an illustration you tell me that in the view of this deputation they would regard any law which sought to raise the marriageable age as in conflict with their religion?—Exactly. I would go further, and say from my observation, from the number of memorials that went to the Viceroy, that the Viceroy's hands are simply being coerced by members of the Council who have no faith in their religion. That is why we ask for such a safeguard.

14. If that is so—and I am not discussing whether it is or not—it is important to discover what the safeguard is. Do you think, for instance, that a law court which might not contain any orthodox Brahmin would be a good body to decide whether or not the religion of the orthodox Brahmin was offended by some Bill or other?—(Mr. Subramania Iyer) We do not want an orthodox Brahmin or a Hindu orthodox judge; if he were true to the principles of justice it would be quite enough.

15. We call that a righteous judge, or an upright judge?—Yes, who would act without fear or favour on the issue before him.

16. I entirely agree with you to this extent, and you, no doubt, know many cases which have been decided, I hope rightly, certainly justly and uprightly, which involved many difficult questions of Hindu law and tradition, not always by people who were Hindus?—And in this connection may I submit that the people as a whole, as far as I have been able to observe them, have got more confidence in the judgment of the European Judges than of Hindu Judges. I am very sorry to have to say it, but I find that most of the judgments given in the High Courts which have been repugnant to the traditions, instincts and usages of the Hindu people have come not from Europeans but from social reform minded Indian Judges whose mentality is neither wholly Hindu or wholly Christian.

17. In these matters everybody is entitled to his opinion.—(Mr. Subha Rau) May I submit that that is not our opinion.

18. I was just going to say, I should not treat that observation as a thing which bound the deputation; but, of course, each gentleman is entitled to express his view?—Yes, certainly.

19. That is the first point, and I tell you frankly I think the difficulty of finding a machinery is the difficulty of finding one which will secure what you want.—(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) I venture to submit one other point, that members of the Government, whether they be ministers or executive council members, should not by their presence or speeches encourage speeches and meetings which have for their sole object the decrying and the destruction of Hindu religion. For instance, we observed ten days ago a meeting was held which was called the Self-Respect Conference, in which no less than five members of the Madras Government were present, and the cry was "Down with the idols; down with Brahmins; down with Sanscrit"; and what will the people think? That the Government do encourage such conferences, whereas their presence distinctly indicates that they encourage such speeches and conferences. There must be a provision in the Statute that Government members should observe neutrality, whether they are elected members or appointed by Government.

20. We will not go into the detail of it, but when you say Government members, do you mean Indian members?—In the present example I have quoted, all of them were Indians.

21. Now the next point you make is on page 343, and you make a suggestion as to the executive. You propose that dyarchy should go, and that there should be a ministry of five. You think that there should be two Europeans and three Indians recruited mainly from the elected council, and "of the Indian Members there may be ordinarily a Brahmana, a "non-Brahmana, and a Muhammadan. But this "need not be an inviolable rule. For, only the very "best men fitted by integrity, ability and statesmanship should be appointed to this responsible "position of administration." So long as there is an objection as to how you would pick your Indian members, you recognise, according to this document, that you could not put that into the Statute?—(Dewan Bahadur Kuppuswami Ayyer) The object was that there should be Europeans in the Cabinet. It is the most important item that we want to press, that unless Europeans are at the top of the administration to a certain extent, the administration is likely to go to pieces, as it has already done in many parts of this country. We Brahmins are interested in seeing that law and order are preserved properly, and unless there is a sufficient and satisfactory European element, both at the top and in the districts, we are afraid that the administration as a whole will go to pieces.

22. I do not think that is the view of all Brahmins, is it?—(Mr. Subha Rau) No. (Dewan Bahadur Kuppuswami Ayyer) At least of orthodox Brahmins. (Mr. Krishna Rau) One thing has to be recognised, that there has been a great deterioration in efficiency since the Reforms. (Dewan Bahadur Kuppuswami Ayyer) It has to be recognised. It cannot be gainsaid.

Mr. Siva Rao: It is because there have been no Brahmin ministers so far?

23. The Chairman: I should like to know on what grounds you put it. It is an opinion, and we have to listen to all things; but I would like to know one or two things about it. You have been living in this province. Do you think the roads of the province, as compared with ten years ago, have improved?—(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) May I say a few words? I have been in the Council for two terms, six years. I know the working of the Council. I have been chairman of the Cuddappah Municipality and I have been chairman of the District Board for eight years. My experience of local board administration extends over 25 years. I may say that my experience of the inner working of these boards is this, that after the introduction of the Reforms the working has considerably deteriorated, and I may say that we are on the backward step now during the last eight years. That is my considered opinion—that during the last eight years the working of the local board administration is going backward. There is less efficiency, less honesty and less public spirit. I say this with my experience, not merely as an onlooker. I tender that evidence, and if you want me to deal with any particular points I can do so.

24. If that is so, what do you think the deterioration is due to? What is the main cause of it?—The main cause is, we were given the Reforms rather too much; the dose is too much for the infant to feed on, and we have given this liberty of election rather too much. The result is that only people who have got a voice, who have got physical strength, get into the department; it is not the people who have got brains, who have got decency with them. The result is that because it is election, therefore the elected man has to depend upon the good will of those who elect him, and to satisfy them the person elected has to go out of his way to satisfy their needs.

That, I submit, sir, is the real cause of the downward course. The elected man is not a free man now; he is attacked on all sides; every supporter of his comes to him and says, "Well, I put you up to the highest point of the ladder; show me some concession; appoint my friend; nominate this gentleman, nominate that gentleman," and so on. What would the poor head of a department do? He must either resign, or, if he wants power, he must satisfy his supporters; and when he satisfies these people, the result is that efficiency goes down. (Mr. Krishna Rau) I may be permitted to say a few words. I find the defect in the representative system itself. The foundation of the administration should be the village, but at the present time in this country the centre of power has been removed from the villages to the town and cities, where the elected members become irresponsible, or at all events have a tendency to act in an irresponsible fashion. The village should be made the unit of administration; village autonomy should be created first, and the centre of power removed from the towns to the village by panchayats being created in every village and being the basis of the administration. There should be complete local autonomy; the taluq should be abolished and after the village should come the district, and after the district the province.

25. I think we must keep to the lines of this document. We have heard a great deal about that from other deputations which have specially dealt with it in their Memoranda?—I was just explaining my position.

26. I do not quite understand from this document what is to be the relation between the executive and the legislature. Is the executive to be bound by the decisions of the legislature or not?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya)—It is to be bound to carry out the decisions of the Council; it will be bound by Statute. I may quote the analogy of the Madras Corporation, where the Commissioner is bound to carry out the resolutions of the Corporation, but he is not elected by them.

27. I think you are in favour of two Houses, are not you?—Yes, and the second chamber will provide for the representation of commercial and other interests, and if any wrong is done in one chamber it may be corrected in the second. That is the only way of reconciling people who are strong on communalism with democracy. (Mr. Subramania Iyer) The only communities to be recognised should not be based on birth, but be based on economic interests and industrial, commercial, agricultural and religious interests.

28. You say community should be recognised on the basis of religion?—It might be. I would not say that of the Hindu, because in the case of the Hindu the position is so vague. It is not an organised religion having some kind of discipline. Anybody can be a Hindu. A Catholic Christian has to conform to certain doctrines and practices, or be turned out and be no longer a Catholic. It is the same with other Christians, but with Hinduism even a man who has definitely thrown off Hinduism and adopted Christianity may pass as a Hindu. This is a great trouble to us.

29. I should like to ask you a question about that. You have been telling us about the views of the orthodox Brahmin, and how far proposals for legislation might conflict with those views. We all listen with great respect to any views sincerely held in the name of religion. I wish you would tell me what would be the view of a body like yours to a resolution which provided that all wells should be available equally to Depressed Classes and to Brahmins?—(Mr. N. Srinivasa Acharya) It does not matter at all. We should have nothing to say to it.

30. What would be your view as to what is to be done about the Depressed Classes?—(Mr. Subramania Ayyer) It is a large question. Do you mean those castes in regard to whom certain ceremonial rules of pollution now exist?

31. I do mean them?—Will you tell me what you mean?—I understand what you mean by Depressed Classes, but tell me once more what you want to know.

32. What I want to know from this deputation is this. Is it your view that the present condition of those people is satisfactory and that there is nothing to be done except to leave things as they are, or is it your view that this is a very serious problem which has got to be dealt with by very important changes? What do you think?—I am under the belief that India as a whole is a depressed nation, and that every person who is carrying on his old traditional calling, which is not in very much demand by the people and who therefore gets low wages and less honour, is depressed in the real sense of the term. If it is meant that in certain Brahmin streets certain classes do not travel through, and do not touch certain wells, then I say there are certain social rules based upon distinctiveness between class and class which have not only religious but social and economic purposes.

33. What is the economic purpose that is served by providing that members of these classes are not to go down a particular street?—What I mean to say is that Indian society believes in distinctiveness between these occupational groups. (Dewan Bahadur Kuppuswami Ayyer) That is an individual opinion; it is not the general opinion of all of us.

34. I do not wish to trouble you unduly, gentlemen. I understand the sort of answer you are giving, and that is your answer to the question whether you think the Depressed Classes (on the general definition of which we had previously agreed; I do not mean the whole of India!) are in a situation which calls for special change?—(Mr. Subramania Ayyer) It calls for change.

35. You think it does?—Certainly.

36. What sort of change?—So long as the economic situation of a country is depressed in regard to all sections of people, and added to that certain religious conventions are acting on this economic depression. (Mr. Krishna Rau) I may just be permitted to say a word about the actual conditions existing. Ths question of the Depressed Classes is now put as opposed to the higher classes of Brahmins and the non-Brahmins. But there are among the Depressed Classes themselves a number of sub-castes; in my part of the country there are many Depressed Classes who are known as Malas and Madigas——

37. The Chairman: We need not bother about that. That is not my question at all. I will just put one other question. Is it your view that the Depressed Classes should be represented separately from the rest of the Hindus, or is it your view that the Hindus should be represented as a whole without any distinction between the Depressed Class and other people?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) : I have already submitted in my Memorandum that all communities should freely compete in the same electorate. Other people must assist these Depressed Classes to compete in the general electorate, and if they are not returned in larger numbers, they must be nominated. (Diwan Bahadur Kuppuswami Ayyer) The Brahmins as a class have the least objection to their being elevated.

38. You say in your Memorandum: "A very "small number of seats may be kept to be filled up "by nominations," and then you say after referring to nomination of experts for any special legislation, "and by members of the Depressed Classes in case "the general electorate does not return them"?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) Yes, that is only for one chamber; the upper chamber provides a separate electorate for them.

39. Lord Strathcona: Your scheme of the Government as set out at pages 343-4 means that all the subjects will be in the hands of Ministers and there will be no reserved subjects?—(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) So far as the subjects are concerned, we would allow every subject to be under members of Government except law and order, whose ultimate control must be in the hands of the Governor, and also to a certain extent in the matter of finance, if the expenditure proposed proves to be a wastage, the Governor may interfere; in other respects the members of the Government may have full authority.

40. Sir A. P. Patro: Mr. Srinivasa Acharya, you represent the orthodox Brahmin section and you believe in the righteousness of the Code of Manu, do you not?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya): I believe in the authority of the Code of Manu, sir. (Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu): Is that question permissible, sir, to ask an orthodox Brahmin whether he believes in the Code of Manu?

The Chairman: I do not think we need go very far into this. This deputation is a deputation of orthodox Brahmins, and it is important to know what it means by orthodoxy.

41. Sir A. P. Patro: Orthodox Brahmins as you are, you believe in the righteousness of the Code of Manu?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya): We would rather like that you do not use the word "righteousness."

42. You accept and follow the rules laid down in the Code of Manu. The Code of Manu which you all obey and carry out in practice lays down that the tongue of the Sudra should be cut if he reads the Vedas, and if he hears the chanting of Vedas molten lead should be poured into his ears?—(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) Manu also said that if a Brahmin ploughs the land, his hands shall be cut off; that is only to preserve each occupation quite distinct from the other. The object of it is that Brahmins must be learned, agriculturists must be agriculturists, the King must be a King; in that way each occupation was kept separate so that one may not overlap the other and quarrel with the other. My learned friend wants to use it as a sort of weapon against the orthodox Brahmins, and while saying that he forgets the context and everything else. (Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) In the present day we do not bother with all that.

43. It prescribes the punishment for a Sudra if he reads the Vedas . . . (Diwan Bahadur Kuppuswami Ayyer) If my friend will excuse me, I will put him another question. In the old Catholic dogma if it were considered that the world was round, people were being flayed and tormented. Are we to say that that belief is being inculcated by the Catholics to-day?

44. Sir A. P. Patro: That is the spirit of the orthodox Brahmins . . . ((Mr. Subha Rau) May I submit, sir, that several non-Brahmins read the Vedas now, and no Brahmins have the courage to cut off their tongue?

Mr. Siva Raj: They have not got the power.

The Chairman: It is very interesting to listen to it, but we must pay equal attention to the question and answer. At the same time I see the sort of point you make. Do you not think, Sir A. Patro, that we had better go to specific suggestions?

45. Sir A. P. Patro. Mr. Srinivasa Acharya, an orthodox Brahmin as you are, the orthodox Brahmin ought not to do paricharya, that is any service; he ought not to be under Government service, or do any other service?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) What bearing has it on this occasion?

46. I will come to that presently . . . (Mr. Subramania Iyer) We decline to answer such questions.

47. Sir A. P. Patro: Mr. Srinivasa Acharya, according to the orthodox Brahmin creed, Shanti, i.e., Kshama, is your Brahmana Dharma, is it not; that is, he should not do any service for wages, or be a parichariya: is that not the orthodox Brahmina Dharma?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) Nowhere is it stated that Brahmins should not take up office. Only menial service is prohibited. Paricharya is menial service.

48. That is to say, according to your Sanatana Bharma creed, it is the Sudras who have to do menial service, is it not?—My good sir, those were written three thousand years ago for the condition of society existing then. We are talking now about political reforms.

49. But you are the president of the Sanatana Dharma Sabha which wants to preserve all the old dharmas?—Yes, we want to preserve the dharma.

50. And perpetuate the dharma prescribed in your Dharma Shastras?—That is the object of my Association, but what has that got to do here?

51. Is there any Association called the Varnashrama Dharma Association, in Madras?—I said Varnashrama Dharma Conference.

52. When you wanted to hold a meeting in Triplicane to get the approval of the conference to place this document before the Commission, was not that meeting broken up and people protested against it, and as such the document was not accepted at any meeting?—Not for the substance contained in the document, but because they were boycotters who wanted to boycott the Commission. For that purpose they came and quarrelled, but that has nothing to do with the contents of this document.

53. On behalf of the deputation Mr. Narasimha Charlu said that after the Reforms there has been great deterioration in local self-government. Is it because Mr. Narasimha Charlu was defeated by a non-Brahmin at the district board election last year? Has the light dawned upon him only last year when he was defeated by a non-Brahmin?—(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) I think, sir, the question attributes motive to me for expressing an opinion. He says "Is it because you were defeated by a non-Brahmin you are now maligning the efficiency of the administration?" I do not know, sir, whether I should really answer that question. Anyhow, I do answer that question by saying that it is not on account of that. It is on account of the inefficiency, corruption and want of public spirit that I find that I said so. I can show it to you if I take you to the villages and prove by example what I have just now said; and I said so not because I was defeated. (Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) I simply invite the attention of Sir A. P. Patro in this connection to what the Local Self-Government Secretary said here, that 50 per cent. of the local self-government is bad; of course that is sufficient for our purpose.

The Chairman: I think the best thing is to treat everybody's views as being views that he holds, but not necessarily, of course, the views of the other people here. We have listened with equal patience to all, but I find that all could not agree with one another.

54. Sir A. P. Patro: Mr. Narasimha Charlu stood for election to the legislative council on two occasions, and on the last occasion he was defeated by a non-Brahmin?—(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) No; I think he was defeated by a Brahmin, Mr. Parasurama Rau.

55. Was it not Mr. Koti Reddi who defeated you?—Mr. Koti Reddi was already with me. I was the Brahmin member, and the person who succeeded me is a Brahmin, sir. My learned friend forgets it; he is in the Council and he does not know facts yet.

Sir A. P. Patro: I remember you were defeated both in the Legislative Council and District Board elections.

56. Mr. Siva Rao: Mr. Srinivasa Acharya, Rao Bahadur Narasima Charlu told us that the local self-government was not satisfactorily working. Is that view shared by all?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) We are almost all unanimous on that.

57. And you were referring to the evidence given here by the Local Self-Government Secretary. He said that it was mostly satisfactory, that about 50 per cent. of them were working on very satisfactory lines and that about 50 per cent. were not quite so satisfactory. Are you prepared to modify your opinion in the light of the evidence given by the Local Self-Government Secretary?—I am not prepared to modify it.

58. One of the reasons given by Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu as to why the Local Self-Government was not working satisfactorily was that he was not satisfied with the system of election. Is that view shared by all of you?—That is shared by all, but there is also another and more important reason, namely communal feelings.

59. Is that view shared by all that election is not a satisfactory method of choosing representatives in the Local Self-Government departments ?—We share the view that elections are not properly done.

60. Is the view that election is not a proper method of choosing representatives shared by all of you ? —It is a proper method ; certainly election is good.

61. Mr. Narasimha Charlu, while advocating provincial autonomy or responsible government in the provinces, wants to exempt law and order and finance. Is that opinion shared by all ?—Yes, sir.

62. But you have made no mention of it in your Memorandum ?—I have not ; but we have discussed it afterwards.

63. You are aware that law and order have been in the hands of Indian members for about nine years now ?—Indian or European does not matter. I know . . .

64. Have they not been working satisfactorily under men like Sir C. P. Ramaswami Ayyar, and so on ?—I do not place it on the ground that the Indian is a failure.

65. Has it not been working satisfactorily ?—The question is if it is handed over to a popular body, what would happen ?

66. Therefore, they have been working satisfactorily so far ?—The member in charge of the portfolio may be an Indian or a European ; that would make no difference. We only object to the system which gives it away to the council or the minister, who are always actuated by communal and factious feelings.

67. So far have not the Madras Legislative Council been acquitting themselves well with regard to these subjects of law and order ?—I think they have been doing very well.

68. Can you quote any instance in which the Madras Legislative Council did not support any measures for the promotion of law and order ?—I cannot say definitely that it did not support any such measure ; but then the subject is with the Executive Council Member and not with the Minister ; that gives us all the safeguard.

69. But when those measures came up before the Legislative Council, have they not acted with sobriety and with a full sense of responsibility so far ?—(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) : What were the measures that came up before the council about law and order ?

70. Measures regarding the Malabar Moplah rebellion, the non-Co-operation movement at Guntur and the passive resistance movement in Chirala and Perala, and a number of other question came up before the council, and do you know of any instance when the Legislative Council did not acquit itself well ?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) Those were not occasions on which power could have been exercised by the council ; the subject was in the hands of Government members.

71. Do you insist on a European being in the Ministry or do you say it is desirable to have a European ?—In my scheme there is no Ministry.

72. Do you insist on Europeans in the Executive Council ?—I should like to have them so that Indians and Europeans may move on terms of equality.

73. You mean a European elected member of the Legislative Council ?—Or an outsider.

74. Diwan Bahadur Kumaraswami Reddiyar : Mr. Narasimba Charlu, you say that you were defeated by a Brahmin in the last Council elections ; was it not so ? —(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) Yes.

75. Was he a man of the orthodox type or of the unorthodox type ?—He was a Swarajist. In that all Liberals were drowned. The elections were not contested on orthodox or unorthodox basis. The question then was whether he was a Swarajist or non-Swarajist.

76. You know the man ; you can distinguish between orthodoxy and unorthodoxy ?—He was neither this nor that.

77. And the electorate chose a Brahmin who was neither this nor that ?—The electorate never considered whether he was Brahmin or not. They were bent on having a Swarajist and they had him.

78. You were the president of the Cuddapah District Board for many years ?—Yes, from 1919 to 1927, both inclusive.

79. So after the Reforms were introduced you were the president for seven years ?—Yes.

80. Was the administration of the Cuddapah District Board efficient or inefficient during those seven years ?—It was efficient during those seven years, but it has deteriorated since. I do not like to boast myself, but the question has driven me to say this.

81. The efficiency during that period was due to the gentleman presiding over the District Board ?—It largely contributed.

82. And the present deterioration is due to the fact that some other gentleman is the president ?—Some other gentleman who finds himself in a dilemma to help his supporters, as well as efficiency.

83. The presidentship of the Cuddappah District Board was thrown open to election very recently, that is in 1927 ?—Yes, very recently.

84. And the present President stood for election ? —Both of us stood for election.

85. You were defeated ?—Yes, by one vote.

86. Mr. Srinivasa Acharya, is it the view of the whole of your deputation that the whole of India is depressed ?—One of your members stated that it is not only the depressed classes, but the whole of India is depressed. It is because the British people are ruling us ?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) I understood the answer to mean that the Indians as a class are economically and politically poor.

87. It is the view of the whole of your deputation ? —It is not merely the individual opinion of Mr. Subramania Iyer.

88. Do you really mean to say that the orthodox Brahmins have no objection to take water from a well from which a panchama takes water ?—I will put it the other way. We have no objection to the panchama taking water from any well. (Mr. Subramania Iyer) : From a public well. (Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) : There may be a few people who may go away without taking the water from the same well, but they may not trouble you.

89. Would an orthodox Brahmin like yourselves take water from a well which is used by the Adi-Dravidas ?—Even orthodoxy does not prescribe any limits for taking water in a large reservoir. Even in a small one some people take water and some do not.

90. There are different degrees of orthodoxy ?—It does not necessarily mean that. (Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) : Is it your point to help the Depressed Classes or is it your point to bring down the Brahmin ? We are prepared to give water to the panchama. There is no objection. But what is the meaning of putting a question, Are you prepared to take water along with him ? (Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) : In the first Legislative Council of Madras there was a resolution proposed which required the Brahmin and the panchama to take water in the same well !

91. The Chairman : I want you to tell me this. Does the orthodox Brahmin, who adopts a strict orthodox creed, seriously object to take water from a pipe ?—There are many who take serious objection to it.

92. Because, I suppose, the waterworks employ people of all sorts ?—Yes, and also because it is a pipe.

93. Diwan Bahadur Reddiyar : In your Memorandum you have not said anything about the transfer of subjects to the ministers ?—I have not recognised the ministerial system at all.

94. You call them members of Government ?—Yes.

95. You say that subsequently to that you discussed among yourselves and came to the conclusion that Law and Order should be reserved for the control of the Governor ?—There was no discussion before. Brahmins have no separate politics of their own apart from the rest of the community. I submitted my Memorandum long ago. But we had informal discussions afterwards.

96. You discussed informally with some Brahmins ?—With many.

97. And you have now come to the conclusion that Law and Order should be under the control of the Governor ?—Yes, in the interests of public safety and, seeing the development of anti-Brahmin movement all along, we thought it safer.

98. That is not the view of any particular body ?—If ten persons call themselves a body it does not become sacrosanct.

99. Was this Memorandum placed before the All-India Brahamana Sabha ?—No.

100. It was prepared by you individually ?—Yes, and shown to many people. The Brahamana Sabha is not a political body and it is prevented from taking part in politics. That is why I took the views from various people and also the matadhipathis.

101. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-Lah Sahib : Do you say that there should be no form of responsibility at all ?—No. I provided for responsibility. I say that many subjects should be within the control of the council. The Legislative Council passes resolutions and those resolutions must be carried out by the Executive Council. Is not that responsibility ?

102. I am only asking your opinion of the matter ?—I take into consideration the Eastern conditions and the conditions to which we have been accustomed during all these centuries. If we are not troubled with patronage in the matter of appointments and so on, our people are the best to give very sober opinions. The Chairman elicited the answer from the Government witness, as to how the Government of India managed to be successful and carry on its measures in spite of the fact that there were no ministers in the Central Government. I apply the same principle. People are quite competent to be given responsibility provided they have not got to look for patronage, and ministers have not got to look for votes for being retained in their positions.

103. You do not want any Minister to be dependent on the votes of the council ? That is the sort of government which you recommend ?—Yes.

104. Mr. Narasimha Charlu, during the non-Brahmin ministry, so long as the power of nomination of District Board Presidents was in the hands of Government, the Ministry had been standing by you, a very orthodox Brahmin, in nominating you to the Presidentship ?—(Rao Bahadur Narasimha Charlu) There was no Ministry before the Reforms were introduced, and His Excellency when he came to Cuddappah offered the presidentship to me and I accepted it. Therefore, the beginning of my career as President of the District Board was not dependent on the Minister.

105. My question was with regard to your continuance as President. When the Reforms came in, the non-Brahmin Ministry was in power, or say the Justice party, and even when they supported an orthodox Brahmin like you and nominated you as President not only once, but more than once, in spite of the protests ? Is that not a fact ?—I do not know whether the nomination was entirely in the hands of the Minister. It was the Minister and the Secretary.

106. The Chairman : The point is that after the Reforms were introduced and during the days of the Justice Ministry there were the appointments which were in the hands of the Government, and one went to a Brahmin ?—My only doubt was whether they gave it to me because I was a Brahmin or because I was efficient for the work.

107. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-Lah Sahib : When there happened to be an efficient Brahmin they did appoint the efficient Brahmin ?—You put it generally. Mine was only an exception.

The Chairman : I cannot see how a Government says that the only people ever to be appointed to official posts are people who are drawn from a particular class.

108. Khan Bahadur Khalif-ul-Lah Sahib : That is my point. Has not the Council now taken a Brahmin Minister ?—The Council has not taken. His Excellency has nominated one Brahmin.

109. Sir Sankaran Nair : You say here that in this state of affairs one is tempted to ask for the return to the order of things before the Reforms. That is really your feelings, that we must go back to the pre-Reform days ?—(Mr. Srinivasa Acharya) Yes ; if that were impossible, we suggest alternatives.

110. If that is possible we must go back, so that the Queen's proclamation that there should be no interference in religious matters, and so on, might be strictly observed ?—Yes, and also that there should be no discrimination between one community and another.

111. That is the general view ?—Yes.

112. Would you be prepared to accept the rulings of the head of your community in matters of religion, that is Sankaracharya for Smarthas, Ramanuja for Vaishnavites and so on ? Supposing in cases of religious disputes he gives a ruling that a certain particular matter is not repugnant to the Hindu religion. Would you accept the verdict of the head of your community ?—Yes.

113. And if he supports the view which may be put forward by the reformers or which may be put before the Legislative Council, then you would not object to legislation being passed ?—No.

114. So you say that any change in any custom based on religion may, if necessary, be carried out with the consent of the heads of the different Maths ?—The heads of Maths alone do not exhaust all the people to be consulted. All of us are not disciples of Maths. There are people with different views. Therefore, along with the heads of Maths a committee of orthodox Pandits should also be appointed in such matters.

115. If you can say that the heads of Maths may determine the question, whether a certain legislation may be passed or not, then you have a definite and clear instrument which voices your feelings ; but, on the other hand, if you say that you will not accept it, it must be done by a committee of Pandits and so on, that means an indefinite body and the question will never be settled. As between the two, are you prepared to say that if the heads of Maths give a ruling, legislation may proceed and you will not dispute ?—I accept it. But there may be some people who may not. (Mr. Subramania Iyer) Many of the Maths in India as now constituted have not got specific territorial jurisdiction, but to the extent they have, I think their opinions ought to be accepted, or rather, they may form the basis of any action when action has got to be taken.

116. Sir Sankaran Nair : Is that the general view ?—Diwan Bahadur Kuppuswami Ayyer) Yes. (Mr. Subramania Iyer) I am able to foresee a time when, as things now go on, the Maths may be presided over by people who may themselves encourage the breach of social customs, but then there will be time for sane orthodoxy to organise itself and to depose the Mathage. But till that time comes we must accept the Maths as our chief arbiters in these matters. I might also add, sir, that the only points on which all of us are agreed are that the State should not undertake social legislation, and that there should be no discrimination against any particular community entering the public Services. As for the other matters contained in the Memorandum our individual views prevail.

Memorandum submitted by Dewan Bahadur C. V. RANGA REDDI GARU, B.A., B.L., President, Hindu Religious Endowments, Royapetta, Madras.

Having been connected with the Local Self-governing institutions for over sixteen years, till April 1928, in fourteen of which I was President of a Taluk Board and a District Board, and having been a member of the Reformed Council from its inception till March, 1925, I may fairly claim to have some experience of the working of Local Self-governing bodies, and of the Local Legislature; and that is my excuse in venturing to submit this Memorandum before the Commission.

I shall place before the Commission my views on the following subjects:

(i) Local Self-governing institutions,
(ii) The Representative institutions,
(iii) The Provincial Governments,
(iv) The Central Government.

I. Local Self-Governing Institutions.

Local Boards were re-constituted in the Madras Presidency in the year 1920; Union Boards for big villages with a population of 5,000 and more; Taluk Boards for Taluk Board areas consisting of one or more taluks, and District Boards for each District. In each of these bodies, three-fourths of the members are to be elected and the rest to be nominated to give representation to the minority communities.

For the first few years after the Reforms, the Government were unable to give to the Local Boards all they expected in the way of grants, thus retarding their progress. In spite of that, civic consciousness was awakened gradually in the people. As financial conditions improved, people responsible for the work of Local Self-governing institutions have justified the policy of the grant of wider powers by Government. Since the Reforms, the interest taken by the people in these institutions has been growing to a considerable extent. From 1920 onwards, people have come to take real interest in local affairs. Even people without English education are coming forward in large numbers to take prominent part in these institutions. Some of them have done excellent work as Presidents of Local Boards, and it does redound much to their credit and public spirit. The work turned out by the Local bodies during the short time of 7 or 8 years after their re-constitution has been remarkable especially with regard to medical relief, public health and sanitation, and village communications. With regard to Elementary Education, there has been some progress, but it has not been satisfactory on account of the paucity of funds. Local bodies in the Madras Presidency form real training grounds for public men.

Franchise and Elections.

The franchise for voting in the Union Board is the payment of a house-tax of not less than Re.0-8-0; for the Taluk Board, payment of Land-revenue of not less than Rs. 10. For the District Board, there is no direct election. Each Taluk Board in the District elects a certain number of members to the District Board. There is no separate representation for Muhammadans or Depressed Classes, but nominations are provided to give representation to minorities. Generally, Presidents of Local Boards are elected, though in a few districts, Presidents of District Boards are nominated to give representation to minorities.

Since the Reforms, keenly contested elections have become the order of the day. High percentage of voters are going to the polling-booths, even illiterate persons taking part in the elections. In places where Brahmin and non-Brahmin feelings run high, officials take undue interest and interfere in the elections. This is a thing which ought to be deprecated, but, somehow, it has been going on unchecked. Even after elections, officials try to annoy the particular persons who are responsible for the defeat of their protégés. This is rather unfortunate, but it is inevitable for some time to come so long as the preponderance of any community in the services is allowed to continue. I do not blame any community in particular, but the community which is largely represented in the services has a decided advantage over the others in the elections. Sometimes, even high officials take part in these elections and try to influence the voters through their subordinates. Steps should be taken to remedy the evil, but it is a difficult problem, and has to be tackled somehow. One of the remedies I would suggest is to post the District Officers of the Revenue and the Police Departments to other provinces if that is feasible. A beginning may be made in this direction by posting successful candidates of this Province in the I.C.S. Examination to other provinces, and those of other provinces to this province. People of other provinces can have no such leanings, and they might be excepted to have detached views on communal matters while those of this province, whatever training they might have in foreign countries, and however long the period of such training might be, cannot be expected to act impartially in such matters on account of the communal tension prevailing at present; moreover, it will be in the interests of the candidates themselves, if they are posted to provinces other than those to which they belong by birth, in which case they would not be inconvenienced by any local ties or interests and they will be in a position to carry out their duties much more satisfactorily, without compromising their official position.

Adult suffrage for the Union and Taluk Boards, should be the goal, just as we have at present for the village panchayats. In order to attain that goal in the near future the franchise should be broadened. For the District Boards, the system existing at present may continue; or, half the members may be elected as at present by the Taluk Boards, and the other half by direct election.

I would advocate the abolition of nominations as far as possible. Seats may be reserved for the Muhammadans and Depressed Classes, who may not be able to get into local bodies through elections by the general electorate.

Even now the financial condition of the local boards is not very sound, though it has been gradually improving. The resources of the local bodies are insignificant, compared with their functions, and a way ought to be found for providing them with sufficient funds. They are responsible for education, elementary as well as secondary, medical relief, public health and sanitation, village and other communications in the District.

There is a proposal to abolish Taluk Boards. Though not for any other reason than the training of the rural population in the art of self-government, they should not be interfered with at present. In every revenue village, panchayat system should be introduced.

Mistakes might have been committed; corruption might have been practised in elections, and official interference in elections there might have been; in spite of all these, local self-government has made considerable headway in the Presidency since the Reforms.

II. Representative Institutions.

According to the present franchise about three per cent of the population only or about six millions are entitled to vote, and I am afraid, the percentage is too small. The franchise should be extended in such a way as to give the vote to at least thirty or forty millions. Even this should be treated only as a stepping-stone to adult franchise. The adult franchise would solve a number of problems.

Muhammadan representation and the representation of the Depressed Classes could be secured only in that way. Till then, either through special electorates if the communities concerned so will it, or by reservation of seats in general electorates, their representation should be secured. There seems to be no special grounds why people should fight shy of special electorates. It would not be correct to say that it was on account of special electorates, the whole communal trouble has arisen in this country. One of the chief reasons for this trouble is the competition of communities for representation in services. If that is satisfactorily settled, there would not be much trouble.

The relationship between the members of the Council and their constituents is kept up by personal touch as well as by conferences held by the party organisations. In this Presidency, there are only two well-defined parties, the Justice Party and the Swarajya Party. There is, no doubt, the Liberal Party with eminent leaders as members, but it does not seem to have any hold on the masses.

I am of opinion that plural constituences should be done away with, and single member constituencies should be introduced. As I am for abolishing the reservation of seats to non-Brahmins, there will, I believe, be no difficulty for introducing single member constituencies. The necessity for reservation of seats to non-Brahmins has disappeared. The masses have realised the value of the vote, and in them has awakened the consciousness of the power of the vote. I do recognise that even now it is possible to influence the ordinary voter to some extent by official pressure, but all the same, I expect him to exercise his vote to his advantage and to the advantage of the people generally. My remarks regarding how the official exercises undue influence over the voters in the Local Board elections applies to the Legislative Council elections also. As I have already stated above, this can only be remedied by taking steps to do away with the preponderance of a single community in the services.

Unless there is the introduction of responsibility in the legislatures, there will not be formation of parties on well defined political principles. There is no responsibility in the Central legislature, and that is the reason why all the political parties, whose common object is to secure the transfer of control from the hands of the bureaucracy to the people, have joined together to attain that object. Huge expenditure has to be incurred for the organisation of parties and till responsibility is introduced, there is no motive for incurring such expenditure.

So far as the Madras Legislative Council is concerned, from the beginning it has started on a kind of party system. Even in the first Council, the party system was not based on purely communal lines. The opposition also consisted of some non-Brahmins. In the second Council, there was a regular party system based on somewhat well defined principles. The opposition consisted of many non-Brahmins, the leader and the Deputy-leader also belonging to that Community. In the third Council there was nothing like Brahmin and non-Brahmin parties. Among the Ministerialists, there were Brahmins, and the opposition also contained Brahmins. The party system has been growing on definite principles. The principle of the non-Brahmin party, otherwise known as Justice Party, from what I understand, is, among other things, equal opportunities for all, and representation of un-represented communities in the services, etc., due regard being had to efficiency. Rural reconstruction also seems to have been one of the planks of their programme. It may also be noted that in the present Council, one of the Ministers is a Brahmin.

Public opinion has been gradually shaping itself. The people have become more articulate and have begun to assert themselves. The experience of elections to the Panchayats, to the Local Boards, and to the Legislative Councils have made them realise the value of the vote. But there is no denying the fact that the masses are still ignorant and are liable to be misled by sinister political and official influences. There is also corruption in elections. These are only passing phases, and I do not think they should stand in the way of granting full responsible government.

Political training and popular education will follow in the wake of the introduction of responsibility in the government. The party organisations will carry their campaign into the rural areas and thus train the electorate. The Vernacular Press which is responsible even now for awakening the people in rural areas will be much more in evidence with the introduction of responsibility.

The system of nominations of officials and non-officials should, as far as possible, be done away with. Then the question as to how to secure the representation of the important minorities arises. As I have already stated, for important minorities like Muhammadans and Depressed Classes, special electorates may be provided, or, seats may be reserved for them in the general electorates.

The method of securing representation for minorities by nomination has been tried and found wanting. There are so many minorities in this country, that it will not be possible to satisfy anybody except the persons nominated for the time being. This system is bad in itself, and has not been popular from the beginning.

III. THE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

The hybrid system of Dyarchical government was treated as a transitional constitution and was worked by the Ministers in the various provinces more or less successfully. The very nature of the constitution was such that it was found difficult to work. However much the Ministers tried to work it, they failed for no fault of their own for these among other reasons :

(i) Administration of transferred subjects being with the Governor, acting with Ministers' advice, and not with the Ministers themselves.
(ii) The tyranny of the Finance Department and its unnecessary interference,
(iii) The Ministers having to work the system through the officials of the Imperial Service over whom they have no manner of control,
(iv) The anomalous nature of the classification of subjects into reserved and transferred departments,
(v) Want of joint deliberation between the two halves of the Government in many provinces,
(vi) Want of collective responsibility of the Ministers as in the case of the Executive Council.

The Executive Council has corporate existence and collective responsibility, but the Ministers have no such existence and no such responsibility. With all these difficulties and draw-backs of the constitution the Ministers and the members of the Legislative Councils have tried to work the system. Whether they have succeeded or not, they have gained experience during these transitional stages on the basic principles of Government. The Ministers have fully availed themselves of the opportunities and shown themselves fit for full responsible government.

As I have already stated the party system in Provincial governments has been gradually growing, and there is no denying the fact that it has come to stay.

Under the present system of government, the powers of the Governor have been almost unlimited. As I am of opinion that responsible government on Colonial lines is the only form of government that can be given to India, no question of transferred and reserved subjects arises. No subject should be reserved, not even law and order. There can be no justification also for reserving law and order. An Indian member of the Council has been in charge of law and order in the Madras Presidency ever since the Reforms, and there seems to be no doubt that the Department has been successfully administered. Moreover the members of the Legislative Council even under the Dyarchy have been fully alive to their responsibilities and have not shrunk from supporting the Government when that support was really needed.

The Governor shall be the constitutional head of the province as in the Dominions, and he shall act entirely on the advice of his Cabinet. He shall choose his Prime Minister, who, in his turn, shall select his colleagues. The Government of India Act should provide, on the lines of the Australian and South African Acts, for the establishment of the Executive Councils, the members of which shall be the King's Ministers.

The establishment of Second Chambers even in the provinces is desirable. What should be the basis of franchise for the Second Chambers is a matter of careful consideration, and it must be determined by the circumstances of each province. In some countries, they are nominated by the Ministry; in some they are chosen by electorates composed of persons holding property qualifications; and in some they are elected by the same electorate as the Lower House, but by larger constituencies and in some by the members of the various local bodies. I would prefer the latter method.

The strength of the Lower House may be about 240 or 250 and that of the Second Chamber about 80.

The division of the subjects between the Central and Local Legislatures should be clearly defined. The residuary powers should be given to the Central Legislature.

The power of the previous sanction of the Governor-General-in-Council for any Legislative measures in the provinces should be done away with. There is no great risk in this course being adopted, because the Governor-General has the power of veto as also the Crown. At present, any measure affecting the public revenues of the province cannot be introduced without the previous sanction of the Governor. That also should be done away with.

Powers should be reserved to the Provincial Councils and Central Legislatures to provide for their own parliamentary privileges and immunities.

Financial relations between the reserved and transferred side have been anything but cordial; and in all the provinces about seventy per cent of income has been spent for the reserved side, leaving only a starvation allowance of thirty per cent for the transferred departments.

IV. CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.

The general constitutional position of the Governor-General-in-Council, as laid down in Sec. 33 of the Government of India Act, is that the superintendence, direction and control of Civil and Military Government of India is vested in the Governor-General-in-Council, who is required to pay due obedience to all such orders as he may receive from the Secretary of State.

In the Dominions, the Crown is an integral part of the Executive Council, but not so in India. India is governed in the name of His Majesty, but the Governor-General-in-Council has only certain delegated functions, subject to the control of the Secretary of State.

The powers of the Governor-General are :—

(i) Administrative,
(ii) Financial,
(iii) and Legislative.

His administrative powers relate to the appointment of persons to certain offices, and to maintenance of peace and order in the country. His financial power consists in his authority to sanction appropriation of any revenue for any purpose. His legislative powers are :—

(i) Power of giving previous sanction for introducing some measures, affecting relations with foreign states, discipline, and maintenance of any part of His Majesty's Military and Naval forces, etc,
(ii) Power of certification,
(iii) Power of veto,
(iv) Power to promulgate ordinances,
(v) and Power to veto bills passed by the Local Legislature.

His powers are very wide, and in a self-governing colony, these powers except the power of veto are not exercised. The Governor-General has also got under certain circumstances power to override his Executive Council, which the Governor in the Dominions cannot do. Responsibility is inconsistent with the exercise of such wide powers by the Governor-General as under the present constitution.

Time has come for granting real responsibility even in the Central Government. Responsible Government can no longer be delayed. At present, the Crown is not responsible to the Assembly. The Assembly, in spite of its elected majority cannot carry out any of its policies if the Executive Government is against it. The Legislative Assembly is supposed to be the constitutional part of the Government, but it has not got any effective voice in the administration. It has no power over half the Central expenditure, and the other half over which it has control, can be restored by the Governor-General's certification, if thrown out by it.

INDIAN CONSTITUTION.

There should be classification of subjects into Central and Provincial, as far as possible, following the present classification. Full responsibility should be granted in the Central Government except with regard to defence which shall be reserved to the Governor-General who shall appoint a Committee of experts in consultation with the Executive Council to advise him. The Committee shall have power to recommend a minimum of expenditure on the Defence Forces of the Indian Government, and also to report on the progress made in the Indianisation and training of these forces. The expenditure recommended by the Committee shall be voted upon by the Indian Parliament.

As regards the relationship between the Government of India and the Ruling Princes, for some time to come, it can, if so desired by the Princes, be left in the hands of the Governor-General, who shall be assisted by two non-official Indians, chosen by the Governor-General-in-Council, from among persons having administrative experience in the States or in British India.

INDIAN LEGISLATURE.

The constitution of India should be on the example of the constitution of Canada and Australia. There should be two houses just as at present :—

(i) the House of Representatives,
(ii) and the Council of State.

The House of Representatives shall consist of at least four hundred members, and shall be wholly elected. The minority communities, including Muhammadans and Depressed Classes shall have seats reserved for them, or have separate electorates, till adult suffrage is introduced. Property qualifications of the electorates should be so reduced as to give vote to at least thirty or forty millions. The strength of the Council of State should be about one hundred and fifty to two hundred. The franchise for the Council of State should be the same as at present.

India having started on the road to responsible Government, there is no half-way house between the present dyarchic system of Government and real responsible Government. Anything less will not satisfy the people. Dyarchy either in the provinces or in the Central Government is unthinkable. Legitimate aspirations of the people have been roused, and they should be satisfied. Sitting tight on National aspirations will not be in the interests of the Empire. National sentiment should be respected. It is still the wish of the bulk of the people to remain within the Empire, but, unless something is done very soon to satisfy their aspirations, it might be too late. There is already a movement for independence, and that will grow by leaps and bounds, if real responsibility is not granted.

Memorandum on behalf of the Moplahs of the Malabar Coast submitted by Mr. MAHMUD SCHAMNAD, M.L.C.

1. I have been waiting to see the result of the All-Parties Conference, and also sometimes attending its meetings with a view to see whether its conclusions would be agreeable. In fact, my community was very anxious to fall in line with the decisions of the Conference if they were satisfactory to a certain extent.

2. But finding the decisions of the Conference quite unacceptable and harmful, especially to the interests of our Community, chiefly those dealing with communal representation, etc., we have decided to submit this Memorandum separately. We hope the delay will be condoned and this Memorandum will be duly taken into consideration.

3. As India is a vast country with a very large population unacquainted with the representative system of Government, it is not yet time to think of adult suffrage. Though the ultimate aim should be adult suffrage, the present system, with some modifications towards widening the electorate should be continued for some time more. For instance, a property tax of Rs. 5 may be fixed as the minimum qualification of a voter to the provincial Council, and Rs. 10 to the Lower House of the Central Legislature. I am of opinion that both the Central and Provincial Legislatures should be bicameral. All those who pay a property tax of Rs. 500 or more and those who are or have been members of the Legislatures or those who are members of District Boards or municipalities shall be electors for the Upper House of the Provincial Legislatures. All those who pay a property tax of Rs. 1,000 or more and all those who are or have been members of the Central and Provincial Legislatures should be entitled to vote for the Upper House of the Central Legislature.

4. Voting must be direct throughout, except in the case of women, who may be allowed to vote by proxy or by post as in the case of the Council of State. The constituencies must be made smaller in area, while the Legislatures will have necessarily to be enlarged.

5. Important minority communities and other groups who have got special interests to protect have to be given separate electorates. Moslems, who form the largest and most important minority, having several clashing interests with the Hindu majority, certainly require separate electorates. It is wrong to think that communal tension is the outcome of separate electorates. On the other hand, communal electorates help to avoid occasions of conflict and unhealthy rivalry between the different communities. Special electorates will be necessary until the people learn to think and act nationally and cease to think communally. In the present condition of affairs, when an election takes place in a general constituency, as in the case of Local Boards, etc., in the Madras Presidency, people begin to canvass votes by appealing to the communal passion of the voters. In a special electorate there is no scope for exciting the racial or religious feeling like this. Therefore, it is quite necessary to continue the system of separate electorates in the case of Legislatures and extend it in the case of local and other representative bodies. It is not yet time to try mixed electorates with reservation of seats, as by this means the minority communities may not secure the right sort of representatives they require.

6. Indian mentality, being what it is, cannot be easily understood by a European. There are so many peculiar customs and notions in India that an ordinary European might sometimes even think that Indians are no better than savages; and an ordinary Indian might think vice versa.

7. Therefore, Indian needs and requirements cannot be measured by European standards. Though special electorates might look antiquated according to Western ideas, we think it otherwise and consider it an absolute necessity, at least, for the time being.

8. Proportional representation will not be sufficient properly to safeguard the interests of the minority communities. Therefore, it will be quite necessary to give the Moslems more seats than their proportional share in all the representative bodies in the provinces, in which they are in a minority. The Hindus cannot complain about this, as they, also, will be given adequate representation similarly in all the provinces in which they are in a minority. But neither Moslems nor Hindus should be reduced to a minority in any province in which they are in a majority.

9. The relationship between representatives and constituents is yet very loose and undefined, as informed public opinion has not yet developed, and consequently elections, etc., are not contested on party system. There are no organised political parties as are known in European countries. Public opinion is just beginning to be formed as mass education has not yet gone ahead. The present political agitation is only a ripple on the surface.

10. In order to give representation to Backward Classes and small minorities, and also to have official points of view represented, it is necessary to nominate officials and non-officials to the elected bodies.

11. The same reforms and legislative and administrative institutions as are obtaining in other provinces should be introduced into the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan. The fitness of the people of these provinces for Home Rule cannot be questioned. They are as advanced as any other people in India. Their demand for reforms is day by day becoming stronger and stronger. A resolution to grant reforms to the North-West Frontier Province was moved in the Assembly when I was also a member of that body, and carried without a division. There cannot be any objection to the introduction of reforms even in such small provinces as Coorg.

12. The distribution of provinces as they exist at present is not made on any reasonable basis. Unless they are redistributed on a linguistic basis representative institutions cannot thrive in them. For the present, Sindh and Oriya country may be separated and made into two separate Governor's provinces. Eventually Andhra and Karnataka also may be made into separate fully-developed provinces.

13. "Back to the Village" is the cry at present. I am also a believer of that slogan. There should be a small local self-governing body for each village or group of villages. Villages must be fully developed by making them the centre of all activities. In bigger villages and towns there should be municipalities, each body having one-fourth of its members nominated by the Government at the recommendation of the Collector. The Revenue Divisional Officer should be one of the nominated members. So also for each district there should be a district council, one-fourth of its members being nominated by Government, the Collector being ex-officio member.

14. Every adult person should be entitled to vote for the Village Panchayat, while for the District Board the members shall be elected by the members of the Village Panchayats. These local self-governing bodies shall look after local roads, elementary education, health, and sanitation.

15. The Head of the district should be responsible for the efficient working of these local bodies. This is the best way to secure the co-operation of the District Heads who are at present charged only with the duty of reporting to the Government about the shortcomings of these bodies. This sort of criticism only leads to antagonism. Therefore, the District Heads must be encouraged to take some interest in the successful working of these institutions.

16. Each Provincial Government will be responsible for the welfare of its province. It shall be in charge of all the subjects and shall exercise all powers not specially reserved for the Central Government. The Provincial Government will consist of a Governor, a ministry of four to eight ministers and a double-chamber Legislature. The ministry will be responsible to the Legislature, but will be appointed by the Governor out of those recommended by the Legislature, with a view to secure the representation of the important communities.

17. The Central Government will consist of a Governor-General, a cabinet of six or seven Executive Council Members and a Legislature consisting of a Lower House and an Upper House. Regarding the Upper House, I suppose, the suggestion of the All-Parties Conference is, perhaps, an improvement, viz., that the Provincial Legislatures may be the electorates of the Upper House or the Senate, a certain number of seats being allotted to each Province according to the population. This may be considered as an alternative to my suggestion already made. The Central Government shall be given the widest discretion to deal effectively with the subjects specially allotted to it. These subjects shall include foreign relations, defence, education, justice and order, shipping currency and credit, customs, tariffs, and income tax, railways, posts and telegraphs.

MOPLAHS AND THEIR EDUCATION.

18. This is a subject which I want to emphasise particularly. Under this head I wish to say all about the Moplahs. They are a virile race and a very important people on the West coast. They number about a million and a half and form nearly half of the entire Muhammadan population of the Madras Presidency.

19. Their chief defect is want of modern education. It is this defect that enabled the extreme political agitators during the terrible Malabar rebellion of 1921 to exploit their credulity and to make them take the chief part in the rebellion and bear the chief brunt, not only during the nine months they held out and the rebellion lasted, but also till to-day they are the chief sufferers. So much so the rebellion itself is known as the Moplah rebellion.

20. These Moplahs are the descendants of the Moors, who came and settled as merchants on the Malabar Coast from Egypt, Palestine and Arabia, even before the time of Solomon, as can be inferred from the Old Testament, also. After the introduction of Islam in their mother country most of these settlers here also became Moslems. In Cochin and Travancore even now there are many Jews and Christians known as Yehudi Moplahs and Nazarene Moplahs; most of the trade on the Malabar Coast is even now in their hands. There are many thriving Moplah merchants in Ceylon, Burma, Malaya and other parts of the world. They are also expert seafarers, like their ancestors, who had to fight with the Portuguese when they first came and tried to usurp their trade here.

21. Though their chief profession has been, and is even now, trade and seafaring, yet they are gradually being ousted from these professions by their more advanced neighbours on account of their backwardness in education.

22. The Government has not yet started for their education either a College or even a High School, in spite of several representations made and resolutions of important meetings and educational conferences submitted to Government. No earnest effort is made even to spread elementary education among them. It is true a special officer is appointed to supervise Moplah education, but he is not given independent jurisdiction and is placed under the District Educational Officer of Malabar. Sufficient money is not provided for Moplah education. The progress made by the Moplahs in education is so very deplorable that the All-India Moslem Educational Conference at its last session, held at Madras, during the last Christmas, had to appoint a special All-India Moplah Education Board consisting of twenty-one members including myself, to look after Moplah education. This big community has not produced even a score of graduates, whose number at present being only about sixteen.

23. Under the circumstances we are strongly of opinion that if education is not going to be made a central subject as is suggested above, Muhammadan education, at least Moplah education, must be included among the subjects to be dealt with by the Central Government, and it should be in the portfolio of a member who deals with European education and such other reserved subjects.

24. Most of them are so very poor that their participation in the last Malabar rebellion and the several previous risings have also been attributed to their poverty and economic conditions. This is the opinion of Mr. Dance, also, who was the Collector of Malabar for several years. As the leader of the Commission appointed by the Government of India to go to the Andamans and examine the Moplah Colonisation Scheme and also the condition of the Moplahs, I have also come to the conclusion that poverty, religious fanaticism and want of education are the main causes that made them fall an easy prey to the exploitation of the agitators and led to their participation in these rebellions.

25. The only panacea for all these evils is education. But being very poor they cannot have schools of their own, and being over-jealous about religion they do not send their children to schools in which religious instructions are not given. The only High School started by themselves at Calicut, known as the Himayatul Islam High School, where instructions are imparted free is on the point of being closed for want of sufficient funds to maintain the same.

26. Therefore, it is essential in our opinion that at least one College at Calicut, or Tellicherry, and half-a-dozen High Schools at such Moplah centres as Ponnani, Malaparom, Walluvanad, Badagara, Cannanore, Kasaragod, etc., where instructions will be given cheaper and in which religion also will be taught, should be started for them.

27. To give them a start, to encourage them in the pursuit of education, and also so that there might not be any communal injustice in their case, it must be provided that a certain proportion of all new appointments must be given to competent hands among them until their number in all the services in the West Coast districts attains one-third proportion. If the Government will not do this, which is only a sheer act of justice, discontent will continue to increase.

28. All these statements I am prepared to prove and to throw further light on any subject necessary if I am called to give oral evidence.

29. I am expressing these views about the future constitution, etc., from a personal knowledge of the working of the Montford reforms from their very inception, first as a member of the 1st and 2nd Legislative Assembly and latterly as a member of the Madras Legislative Council. I know their special requirements. Being a Moplah myself I was the one person that worked and succeeded in speedily restoring peace during the Moplah rebellion of 1921 by negotiating between the Government and the people.

30. This Memorandum was passed at, and is submitted on behalf of, a very largely-attended joint meeting of the members of the South Kanara Moplah Moslem Educational Association and the members of the Moslem League and other leading Moplah gentlemen; and I am prepared to give oral evidence in support of the Memorandum. My address is: "Mahmud Schamnad, 'Sea View,' Kasaragod, South Kanara, Malabar Coast."

31. The South Kanara Moplah Moslem Educational Association has a membership of over 500 members and the Moslem League has a membership of over 150 members.

Memorandum submitted by Diwan Bahadur Sir T. N. SIVAGNANAM PILLAI, Kt., Ex-Minister, Madras.

I have the honour to present this Memorandum to the Indian Statutory Commission for its kind consideration while making its recommendations to the Parliament for effecting further reforms in the Constitution of British India.

2. (1–a) The Basis of the Franchise. The principle on which franchise is extended to the people in India, fixing the taxpaying capacity at Rs. 3 and Rs. 10 a year as the minimum qualification for electorship in the urban and rural constituencies respectively, is sound enough for the present, and may continue till, with the introduction of compulsory education all over the country, time shall come for extending franchise to all adult men and women.

3. (1–b) Methods of Election. While yet recognising the claims of all ratepayers with the necessary minimum qualification for registering their names in the respective electoral rolls, provision must be made to discourage the recording of "illiterate votes" by denying to give ballot papers to such voters as seek the assistance of the Polling Officer for recording their votes on grounds of illiteracy. The present system which makes it obligatory on the part of the Polling Officer to help the illiterate voter who seeks his assistance to record his vote has encouraged corrupt practices enormously, negatived the virtue of secret balloting and retarded the growth of informed public opinion. It affords unlimited scope for exploitation by unscrupulous election agents who help candidates, otherwise undeserving of popular support, to oust men of sterling worth from the field, with the result that the legislatures and local self-governing bodies are commended more by men of purse than of brains. The present system, therefore, needs modification in the light of my suggestion above.

4. There are now 98 constituencies; but the number of single constituencies is only 35; of the vast bulk of plural constituencies most of them occur in the rural area. Viewed from the theoretical point of view, the plural constituencies system cannot adduce any good arguments in its favour; and from a practical point of view the arguments are all against the plurality of constituencies. It must, therefore, be replaced by single-member constituencies in order to minimise the labour and cost involved in doing electioneering propaganda. In a constituency like the Vizagapatam Non-Muhammadan Rural, which has a total electoral strength of 66,407 with two seats to be filled, a candidate seeking election has to dissipate his energy traversing the whole length and breadth of the district and trying to secure the support of a large number of voters dispersed over an unwieldy area. The situation is identically the same in the Madras City Non-Muhammadan Urban constituency which throws open four seats to be filled by 22,534 voters. The difficulties experienced may be minimised by splitting all plural-member constituencies into single-member constituencies.

5. (1–c). Particular Interests—Landholders. At the time when evidence was taken for drafting the Government of India Act, provision was made for giving representation to certain interests which then appeared to have a distinct claim for such representation, but they have since ceased to be such in the light of later experience. I may instance here the cases of the six Landholders, the Natukottai Nagarathar Association and the Vizagapatam and Cocanada Non-Muhammadan Urban constituencies. The Estate Landholders do not deserve any seat specially earmarked for them, as the present arrangement makes an invidious distinction between the Estate Landholders and the Ryotwari Landholders, which latter in many cases pay much larger sums to the Government as Land Revenue than the former. It must also be remembered that they do not represent their tenants, as they are themselves included in the electoral rolls for the respective rural constituencies. They have no special interests to safeguard. There is absolutely no communion of interests among the various Zamindars who are grouped into one or other constituency. Again, in the case of five constituencies out of six, the total electoral strength varies between a maximum of 89 for the North-Central and a minimum of 47 for the South-Central constituencies, and this sets on edge the feeling of a candidate for a constituency like the Vizagapatam Non-Muhammadan Rural, which has an electoral strength of 66,407.

6. (1–c) Particular Interests—Nagarathars. There is again the Natukottai Nagarathars' Association constituency which has an electoral strength of 938, and which is to return one candidate. This constituency was originally meant to protect the banking interest among the indigenous moneylenders known as the Natukottai Nagarathars. It may be observed here that the Nagarathars do not form the only moneylending class in the provinces, and that invariably all the electors of this constituency are also otherwise qualified for electorship. It is, therefore, desirable that this constituency be abolished.

7. (1–c) Particular Interests—Vizagapatam and Cocanada Non-Muhammadan Urban Constituencies. Lastly, there are two Non-Muhammadan Urban constituencies in Vizagapatam and Cocanada. They have an electoral strength of 1,929 and 1,850, respectively, and return one candidate each. The electoral strength of the other Non-Muhammadan Urban constituencies which return only one member varies between a maximum of 11,534 in Madura and a minimum of 4,643 in Tinnevelly-cum-Palamcottah. The urban characteristics of Vizagapatam and Cocanada are not well-developed, and, therefore, they have no right to claim equal representation with the other cities and town groups. These two constituencies may also be abolished.

8. (1–c) Particular Interests—General. Thus on the whole, nine seats made up of Landholders (6), Nagarathars (1), Vizagapatam (1), and Cocanada (1) can be liberated, and these can be utilised for easing the situation in the Non-Muhammadan Rural constituencies which have to their credit a disproportionately large electoral strength.

9. (1–c) Particular Interests—Backward and Depressed Classes. The seats reserved for particular interests like the University, the Planters, the Chambers of Commerce, etc., and for groups like the Muhammadans and the Christians formed on a religious basis may, however, remain unaffected. With seats made available by abolishing the Landholders' constituencies, for instance, facilities can be afforded for forming fresh groups like the Backward Classes and Depressed Classes, and these latter must be made to get representation by the open door of election.

10. (1–g) Nomination of Officials and Non-Officials. The number of seats meant to be filled by nomination may be reduced from thirty to twenty to be distributed in such proportion between officials and non-officials as His Excellency may consider desirable, the difference being allotted to the creation of new Rural non-Muhammadan constituencies to reduce the huge numbers of the present large constituencies. There is a growing disfavour even among the nominated members of the policy of nominating non-officials to the Legislatures. They are conscious that they owe their seats to the Government, and therefore do not feel free to act conscientiously. This handicap has often been unequivocally expressed on the floor of the House by the nominated members themselves when they were face to face with political crises.

11. (3–a) Local Self-Governing Bodies—Constitution. As regards the local self-governing bodies, it is my opinion that the District Boards are functioning properly and subject to adequate control by the Provincial Government. The Taluk Boards, however, form, as it were, a fifth wheel in the stage coach. It is painful that in most cases Taluk Boards are constituted by men of third-rate abilities or of a doubtful sense of public responsibility. The Taluk Boards may be abolished and their responsibilities transferred to the District Boards. Better provision must however be made for developing a system of local self-government, which will recognise the individual village as the unit of civic administration. The attitude of the Provincial Government has been rather step-motherly in this respect. With a view to develop such local self-governing bodies, the Madras Village Panchayat Act XV of 1920 was passed, but the application of the same has been inadequate as provision has not been made for a responsible salaried field staff. I may suggest as a remedy that either provision must be made for constituting a department on analogous lines with the Co-operative Department, or the responsibility must be entrusted to the various District Boards, and these latter must be helped with substantial subsidies from the provincial funds.

12. (4–b) Provincial Government—Working of Dyarchy. The system of Dyarchy has worked successfully in the Madras Presidency. I make this statement from my own personal experience. I was a minister with the Madras Government and in charge of the Development Department for full three years from November 1923 to December 1926. I served in the régime of two successive Governors, for a period of five months with His Excellency Viscount Willingdon and for the rest of my term with His Excellency Viscount Goschen. Both of them had stated the principles underlying the Government of India Act and followed the instructions issued by His Majesty. The Executive Council Members and the Ministers were all imbued with the one feeling that they must make the administration a thorough success, as they fully realised that the further delegation of power depended in a large measure on the verdict as to how far the ministers had contributed to the result. So far as the ministry which was in power from 1923 to 1926 is concerned, I must say that it was a success. We were led to rejoice that we found ourselves members of a joint cabinet, generally called " The Happy Family." It must be admitted that the members and the ministers as a whole respected each other's feelings, and consulted each other even in matters which were exclusively their own concern. On all important occasions there were full discussions. As instances I may mention the discussion we had once in connection with the Mettur Project which is a reserved subject, and again in connection with the grant of State aid to the Carnatic Paper Mills, which is a transferred subject. It is not to be contended, however, that there were no differences of opinion amongst us. On the contrary, there were plenty of occasions on which we differed. In the end, however, we came to satisfactory conclusions having regard to the various aspects. In some instances the power of the four Executive Council members as against the three ministers was felt, but it was not exercised in a spirit in which the Reserved section stood against the Transferred as such. On the contrary, such differences would have been felt even if it were a joint cabinet. Throughout, there was absolutely no spirit of unholy combination, either among the members or the ministers.

13. (4–j) Provincial Government—Provincial Autonomy. So far as the Madras Government is concerned we have made out a case for full responsible Government. Important subjects were assigned to the ministers and to the Indian members of the Executive Council, but neither the one nor the other showed any sign of weak administration. The Madras Government has acquitted itself honourably and demonstrated its fitness for Provincial Autonomy on Dominion Status.

14. (6–c) Financial Relationship between the Central and Provincial Governments. The Meston settlement is an iniquitous arrangement and must be abolished. The Central Government must reserve its control only over the defence of India from foreign aggression by air, sea or land, and the irreducible minimum of finance that may be required for maintaining such defence. The finance may be raised by a tax which the Central Government may impose on the country exclusively for the purpose on an equitable basis, taking into consideration the varying degree of liability to foreign aggression to which the different provinces are exposed. It must be made possible that the income-tax levied by the Central Government must be the sole source of revenue for the defence of India.
